Nevertheless, if the movements of the Church, if the developments of the world, at any time, exhibit such facts or phenomena as might constitute the ground of special, extraordinary effort, it is proper for us to be influenced by them. It is, indeed, our duty to search them out and set them in order, that our zeal may be thereby inflamed.

The present time, if we are not mistaken, affords such supervenient considerations, as might be brought to act as powerful motives to enlarged and sustained effort in the cause of the world's conversion.

In the first place, look at the accelerated movements of the age. The present age has no precedent; there is no period like it in the annals of the past; the dreams of poets can not furnish its parallel. They had their golden age: their silver, brazen, iron ages. But what shall we call the present age? Without controversy, it is an age of gold. Talk not of Havilah and Ophir, Sheba and Uphaz: our gold-hunters would scarcely consider the placers of those ancient Californias and Australias deserving regard; and the Pactoli aurum becomes the worthless sand of Sarabat alongside of the "gold, yellow, glittering, precious gold" of Sutter's mill-race or Forester's Creek.

An age of gold, indeed, when the mines yield us precious metals, chiefly gold, to the value of one hundred and fifty millions of dollars per annum. How different from the golden age of the poets, which was utterly innocent of any use, or even knowledge, of this or any other metal. Curious enough, they adjourn the discovery of gold to the iron age; and, instead of locating the placers by sunny fountains and sparkling streams, the place them, Stygiis umbris, by the river of Hell. They make its discovery at once they effect and the cause of man's degeneracy. They thought iron bad enough, but gold is more mischievous still. Now it can not be denied that ours is an iron as well as a golden age. We make our roads of iron, our machinery for locomotion, annihilating time and space, as well by sea as by land, is of iron: we have sought out thousands of inventions in which iron is the staple material: it is, in a word, the type of physical progression; the age of progress is essentially an iron age.

Paradoxical as all this would have seemed to the poets of antiquity, it is perfectly plain to us. Virgil tells us, in his Pollio, that when the Golden Age shall have a reinstauration, when the godlike Saturnius shall have grown to ripened manhood, there will be no further use for iron or for gold: the bounty of nature, and the recovered virtue of our race, will dispense alike with all the instruments of warfare, the implements of husbandry, and the appliances of commerce. But he shrewdly says, that during his minority the "Saturnian times" will be golden, but not without some alloy of the baser metals. The merchant shall still plow the seas for gain, the agriculturist shall still vex the ground for its produce—

"Another Typhis shall new seas explore,
Another Argus land like chiefs upon the Iberian shore."

That is descriptive of the present age, which is emphatically the age of enterprise; a golden age, for gold is the great object of pursuit; an iron age, for iron is the grand instrument of progress. By these great motive powers the world is propelled with astonishing force. It advances with miraculous celerity: it takes no time to rest.

Now, if the Church is to keep up with the world, she must likewise move with steam and lightning speed. Her past rate of progress will not do for the present age. She must bestir herself, and bring out all her undeveloped energies, or she will be left in the lagging distance. It is her imperative duty to keep abreast of the foremost rank of those who are in the rapid, breathless race of the world: nay, she must keep ahead of them all, pointing them continually to the goal of a nobler ambition than that by which they are influenced; opening up to their view those golden mines which are filled with the unsearchable riches of Christ, and guiding them by the polar star of revelation to that undiscovered country, that pacific land which is a very far off.

In connection with the progressive spirit of the age, and as the effect and proof thereof, look at the intercommunication of the different races of men. In regard to this phenomena there never was before such a time as the present. By steam and lightning, by iron and gold, the ends of the earth have been brought together, and those who heretofore dwelt far off in the sea, not only separate, but widely diverse and hereditarily hostile nations and tribes have been brought together in intimate, if not fraternal intercourse.

The wall of China has been virtually broken down, and we are getting familiarly acquainted with the Celestial Empire, and the breaches which have admitted the outside barbarians into the heretofore secluded and barricaded territory of the Brother of the Sun and Moon, have also facilitated the exodus of thousands and tens of thousands of his semi-barbarian subjects, who are at this moment commingling with our own citizens, and casting off, in a day, the stupid prejudices and absurd antipathies, the growth of many an age.

The iron tyranny of caste has been weakened, if not entirely destroyed, in India, and Brahmins themselves will sometimes associate with Western philosophers, whose scientific revelations have tremendously shaken the foundations of Hindoo belief. Meanwhile, not a few of the servile class, the Coolies, have deported themselves, or voluntarily submitted to deportation to other countries, our own included, and in this way they are brought into daily contact with a race of whom their forefathers for centuries had no knowledge.

In a manner somewhat different, yet not wholly dissimilar, millions of Africans have been brought into close communication with Asiatics and Europeans, particularly in this country, and on the western and southern coasts of their own continent. Enterprising travelers, moreover, are penetrating into heart of Ethiopia, and exploring the heretofore hidden sources of the Niger and the Nile.

The Turk himself has become half a Frank, and his haughty and orthodox predecessors, were they now to rise up in Stamboul, would not know him, or knowing, would disown him with contempt and scorn. Western steamboats are disturbing the sluggish waters of both his Asiatic and African dominions; and the iron horse is about to supplant the Arab steed and the dromedary on the Isthmus of Suez and the deserts of Arabia.

The Czar has invoked the aid of a higher civilization, and Russia—every part of Russia—will be put in connection with the Southern and Western worlds. And the example of the plenipotentiary of his imperial majesty in Washington has been followed by others of his subjects who have expatriated themselves to our republic: they have contracted matrimonial alliance with the daughters of the land, and their posterity will be completely amalgamated with ours.

The jealous policy of the Austrian despot can not shut out his degraded vassals from all communication with the rest of mankind: nor are Italy, Spain and Portugal able to remain longer asleep when all the world is so wide awake around them. We are startled at sound of steamers on the Guadalquiver, the Tagus, the Tiber, and locomotives at Lisbon, Madrid and Rome; or, if they are not at all those places yet, they will be soon, and then shall also the interior of those benighted, misruled, yet beautiful countries, be open for ingress and egress to the rest of the world.

With regard to other nations—English, Scotch, Irish, French, Swiss, German, Norwegians, Swedes, Americans—thousands and tens of thousands of them are at this moment seized with an indomitable spirit of emigration, the amor patriæ being apparently quenched in their bosoms, and they may be found in vast conglomerations, particularly in the Northwestern States of our Union—in California, Canada and Australia. There is no law of God, there can be no law of man, to keep those various tribes apart. The present generation may try to maintain their national peculiarities; but amalgamation and absorption is the manifest destiny of them all.

But what a scene does this unprecedented intercommunication, this astounding and almost incredible drawing together of the ends of the earth, present to the enlightened vision of the Christian philosopher and propagandist! What an incentive is here for missionary effort! How does the great Macedonian mission-field spread out to our view, inviting our entrance at a thousand openings, and thundering forth the call by millions of voices, "Come over and help us." Nay, the heathen are coming over to us, for gold, perhaps, in their low imaginings: but in the scheme of Providence, and in the purpose of grace, they are coming over to us for spiritual help. That help we deny them at our peril.

It is a consideration of no small importance in this inquiry that those nations that have ascendency in the world are Christian, Protestant nations.

There is now no Assyrian, Medo-Persian, Macedonian, or Roman power swaying the sceptre of quasi universal dominion, preventing the spread and menacing the life of revealed religion in the earth. There are no Scandinavian rovers to lay waste the heritage of the Lord: no Tartar hordes to pile up pyramids of Christian bones, even the Turk himself is almost powerless in his opposition to the faith of Christ. A pitiful manikin, like Abdul Meschid, is a sorry representative of the power, and no very formidable guardian of the inheritance of those ferocious and fanatical moguls and sultans—the Selims and Mohammeds—who subdued a third part of Christendom with the Koran and the sword. The Crescent is not now in the ascendant. That is certain.

Russia maintains considerable sway by brute force, to which its commercial and moral influence in the world bears a contemptible proportion. The introduction of the arts and sciences into that semi-savage empire, partly by means of Americans, has had a tendency to abate the arrogance and military avidity of the czar, so that he may not be expected to present any formidable obstacle in the way of the Gospel. He dares not make the experiment.

We may say nearly the same of Austria. Her recent subjugation of Hungary, and unremitting persecution of Protestants do not by any means prove that she has entrenched herself in a strong position as a leading government among the powers that be. So far as her own territory is concerned, both the legitimate and the usurped, she is sitting upon a volcano, which is preparing for a fatal eruption, and she seems to be aware of the fact; and she can not but know that every where else she is looked upon with hate or scorn; no where with fear; and as to love, even the Pope himself has no cordial affection for Austria.

With regard to the rest of Germany, Switzerland, and more northern continental countries, it is enough to say they are divided into so many small States and cantons, some Protestants, some Papists, some despotic, some liberal—all jealous of one another and incapable of confederation—that their influence in the world is comparatively unimportant.

As to the Italian States, Spain and Portugal, they have gone so utterly into "the sere and yellow leaf" that as kingdoms and commonwealths they are not worthy of mention in this connection. And we are half inclined to put France in the same category. Certain it is, the Prince-President, Emperor, or whatever may be the present style of Napoleon the Little, be his inclination what it may, has not the time, the means, the faculty to do more harm to Christianity than what grows out of the patronage which he extends to infidelity, Popery, licentiousness—whatsoever will further his impious and imprudent usurpation. He is no Louis at a Revocation, or even Charles at St. Bartholomew. The fickle people and the fickle government can continue at one stay long enough to do either much good or much evil outside of their own country.

How different the scene when we turn to Great Britain and the United States of America. What a wonderful people! We call them the Anglo-Saxon race; and so they are. But have they not British, Roman, Celtic, Danish, Norman blood flowing also in their veins? And in what proportions, who can tell? We can only surmise by noting the combination of the physical, intellectual, and moral qualities, which distinguish those various tribes and tongues, and which are marvellously blended in the character, and developed in the history of this remarkable people. In some particular art or accomplishment they may be excelled by others: but where have there ever been a people who have manifested so great a commixture of the cardinal attributes of a nation—love of liberty, of constitutional government, of power, of fame, of property, of enterprise, of learning, genius, talent, tact—as the British and Britannico-American race! Then look at its gigantic strides, as it extends its sovereignty over the earth. Victoria sways a sceptre over an empire on which the sun never goes down. In addition to her home dominions, she has vast possessions on this continent, and with the exception of the West Indies they are flourishing too: she has subjects in India equal in number to about one-seventh of the population of the globe; she has a large territory in Africa; she has a new world in the Pacific; Australia itself, if cast into the Atlantic, would constitute a highway from the coast of Ireland to New York. Nor is it a small matter that Great Britain, in connection with this country, controls the commerce of the world, when "commerce is king." Her military prowess is implied in the status which she has gained, and nothing else is necessary to be adduced in its illustration except the pregnant fact that her own offspring alone can successfully cope with her on the land or the sea.

This great Britannico-American race is a Protestant race. Its language, literature, laws, institutions are all Protestant. Papists there are, indeed, and also infidels and pagans, under the government of both Great Britian and the United States; nevertheless, the nations themselves are Protestant nations, and so will they continue to be.

To these Protestant nations, with all their vitality and vigor, has been entrusted the golden world of California, Australia to the one, and California to the other. Remarkable coincidence—wonderful Providence. The discovery of these gold regions was postponed until the middle of the nineteenth century, when the multitudes of people from all the winds of heaven, attracted by the glittering dust, should be brought together under the auspices of the two greatest Christian nations that ever existed. Happy for Australia that she is a British colony; happy for California that she is an American State; happy for both, and for the world, that they are under Christian and Protestant rule.

There is a Providence in all this; and it has evidently an evangelical aspect. It is not merely to improve the temporal fortunes of so many tens of thousands of people; but it is to bring them into contact with great spiritual redeeming agencies, such as are in operation in no other part of the world. What a powerful call is this to the Church of those lands. British and American Christians have a fearful and a glorious responsibility develved upon them. They seem to be called upon even now, by these admonitions and indications of Providence, to solve the great problem of the practicability of the world's conversion. If the representatives of every nation under Heaven, gathered together in this new-found Pacific world, can be brought under the redeeming power of the Gospel of Christ, what an earnest of the conquest of the world will such a demonstration present! And what an impetus will be given to all the missionary onsets of the Church in every other part of the earth! And, thank God! neither Britain nor America seems disposed to ignore the responsibility, or to shrink from the undertaking. Were this the case, we should expect divine Providence to change the proprietorship of those immense regions which are destined to teem with millions of our species; and to raise up another people who should, with a generous heroism and a holy chivalry, respond to the call, and cast themselves on the enterprise. The language of Mordecai to Esther would be appropriate were there any ground of suspicion or fear: "If thou altogether holdest thy peace, at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place, but thou and thy fathers' house shall be destroyed; and who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?"

Were any other considerations needed to influence us to renewed ardor in the missionary cause, it is supplied by the activity of antagonistic agents.

Look at the astounding efforts of Popery, even in England itself. The Papal aggression in the headquarters of Protestantism has amazed the world. Through the aid and comfort afforded the minions of the Pope by the Oxonian Puseyites and their followers, the former have made no inconsiderable progress in England, and that too at the very time that they are losing their vassals by thousands in consequence of the New Reformation in Ireland.

Look at France. Under the auspices of the usurper, Popery has kindled into new life, and she is at this moment menacing the existence of Protestantism in the republic or empire, or whatever else the misgoverned country was styled in the advices of the last steamer. Popery accommodates itself to all the political changes which are continually taking place; blesses liberty-poles one day, and the cannons and colors of despotism the next; flatters every party, so as to make every party subservient to its arrogant pretensions and ambitious aims.

Look at Austria, placing its iron heel upon Hungary, and swaying its leaden sceptre over the Protestant population of that heroic realm 'tention of prescriptive rights, hereditary claims, solemn contracts, and common justice; and making all its barbarous achievements inure to the aggrandizement of the Papacy, the greatest obstacle on earth to the conversion of the world.

Look at our own country. There is not a State in this Union in which Jesuitism is not pulling all its wires to accomplish its ulterior aims. Popery is indeed compassing sea and land to make proselytes; and nothing will stop its progress but powerful and sustained effort on the part of the Church to counterwork its nefarious operations.

Look at the various forms of infidelity, and observe with what insidiousness and pertinacity the deadly antagonism to the Gospel is maintained. No matter where; no matter by what method; the opposition is unmitigated, and is increasing in a fearful ratio. It is allied with literature, and even theology: and German Rationalists, Westminster Reviewers, and Socialists of every style, while they profess and call themselves Christians, set themselves to demonstrate that Christianity is a stupidly devised fable. It is allied with ignorance, fanaticism and superstition: and European mobs, American Mormons, and Asiatic, if not African, Mohammedans and Pagans, are halting between two opinions, at embracing both—that there is no God or that there are a million Gods—that there is no Divine Revelation, or that Confucius, Brahma, Buddha, Mahomet, Joe Smith, Jean Jacques, Rousseau, and Charles Fourrier are all prophets, all and singular, more worthy of credence than Moses or the Messiah. As to Christianity, they know enough of it to reject it; and this they do with a cordial and bitter hatred. The opposition to the Gospel realized in Christendom from the literati and illiterate masses has at length produced its counterpart in the unenlightened portions of the world, which can now lay claim to the distinction of "infidel" in the ancient and modern, the negative and positive sense of the designation. The vulgar blasphemy of Tom Paine, the shallow pratings of Volney, the impudent libels of Strauss, are now retailed on the Bosphorus, the Ganges, and the Nile. The history of ancient Paganism and of modern Popery shows that the most heartless infidelity can flourish side by side with the most brutish superstition; and when both are associated they present an insuperable barrier to the progress of the Gospel; insuperable, unless extraordinary efforts are put forth for its propagation.

Paradoxical as may be the observation, increased effort is invoked by the consideration of the success of the missionary cause, and from the promise given in the signs of the times. Each succeeding year is marked with increased activity in the different departments of the Church, and for the most part accompanied with correspondent prosperity in their various fields of missionary enterprise. To this remark our own communion by no means forms an exception. The increase of laborers, converts, and contributions, is a cheering and exciting fact; $100,000, which ten years ago was more than the M. E. Church in the United States expended for foreign and domestic missions, falls at the present time below the missionary revenue of the third part of the Connection which constitutes the Southern portion of the Church.

But into the details which might be spread out in this direction we may not now enter. We have produced reasons, numerous and weighty enough to induce special extraordinary effort in the missionary cause; the accelerated movements of the age, the unprecented intercommunication of the different races of men, the ascendancy of Protestant, and Anglo-American nations, the new-born activity of antagonistic influences, these, all these, are powerful considerations which can not be dwelt upon and appreciated by right-minded Christians without operating as impulsive motives. Meanwhile, the great moving influence is to be found among considerations higher than these; the will, the explicit command of Jehovah, the great brotherhood principle and sentiment of humanity, the fortunes of the Church, the love of Christ; these must constrain us, and constrain us they will, if so be we have tasted that the Lord is gracious.

At the last session of the Alabama Conference twenty-three missions were recognized within the bounds of this conference. The following synopsis of the reports of the missionaries will show the condition of the fields which they were appointed to cultivate:

1. The Mobile German Mission was supplied by the Rev. Carl Herwig, a native of Germany. He has served the Society faithfully, added eight or ten to the church, and his return is desirable.

2. The Mobile City Mission was established at the last session of the Conference, and W. H. Milburn was placed in charge of it. He reports that Bishop Andrew suggested the propriety of trying it a year without forming a "society." The regular place of preaching is Franklin Hall, a room seating three or four hundred people. This has been generally filled, mainly by young men and others not accustomed to attend church. There is reason to believe that good has been done. When circumstances permitted there was preaching in the circus to large audiences. The Mission supports itself, without abstracting a cent from the resources of the Methodist Churches in Mobile.

3. Dog River Mission was served by Z. Dowling. It is mostly in Mobile county; a thickly settled and barren region. It has 12 appointments; 48 white and 32 colored persons have been taken into the Church, and 16 children baptized.

4. Arcola Mission was served by A. McBride. Four new appointments being added swell the number to 14; members, 244; catechumens, 200; population, 4000; $281 15 raised on the mission. A house is to be provided for the missionary next year. The missionary thinks that more attentions from presiding elders and other influential ministers would favorably affect the missions, and is indispensable to its full success; a suggestion which merits regard.

5. Magnolia Mission is reported a failure.

6. Dayton Mission was served by Isaac Taylor, who reports $55 collected for missions. It numbers 125 colored members.

7. Prairie Creek Mission was served by H. T. Rew, who was kept from his work by sickness until May; since then he has labored faithfully and with marked success. He reports 12 appointments and four more to be added. On one plantation a handsome church has been erected, 30 by 40, with eight large windows, pulpit, comfortable seats, Bible, hymn book, etc. There are 410 communicants, 89 received during the year; 1025 receive catechetical instruction; population 2500; 58 children and one adult have been baptized; some $300 have been contributed by the patrons. The missionary thinks two men could be profitably employed on this mission.

8. Plymouth Mission was served by L. F. Schoolar, who reports it prosperous. It has 16 appointments, 12 being filled on the Sabbath; 187 members, 30 having joined this year, besides 40 or 50 who have joined the Baptists, though converted by the instrumentality of the missionary. Planters and overseers take commendable interest in the mission; one of the latter was converted. The servants prayed for him: "Lord, bless my master, overseer!" and when he received the blessing they shared the joy.

9. Walker Mission was served by E. Sullivan, who reports 240 whites, 4 blacks, 4 local preachers, 3 deacons, 1 elder; $65 received. The general state of the mission is good.

10. Pikeville Mission was served by J. B. Warren; it has 13 appointments, 208 members; 500 or 600 preached to; one flourishing Sunday school with 25 scholars; others receive catechetical instruction; $41 55 raised on the mission.

11. Wahalak Mission was served by A. Watson, who reports 17 appointments, 195 white and 4 colored members, one local preacher, one Sunday school; 55 have joined the Church this year, and ten have been baptized; $64 25 has been received, and the mission is promising.

12. Sand Mountain Mission was served by Wm. Rhodes, who reports 296 white members, 190 having been added this year; 85 have been baptized. There are four local preachers; 8 new churches have been built, and one camp-ground constructed; $67 71 has been received on the mission, which is in a healthy state.

13. Catoma Mission was served by W. M. Shockley. It has 1 white and 11 colored appointments, 9 white and 241 colored members; 35 have been received, 8 dropped, 1 expelled, 8 or 10 have died; 251 children have been catechised; $264 50 has been received from the patrons.

IMMORTAL HOPES.... Wilson.

O, what were life,
Even in the warm and summerlight of joy,
Without those hopes, that, like refreshing gales
At evening from the sea, come o'er the soul,
Breathed from the ocean of eternity!
And O! without them who could bear the storm
That fall in roaring blackness o'er the waters
Of agitated life! Then hopes arise
All round our sinking souls, like those fair birds,
O'er whose soft plumes the tempest has no power,
Waving their snow-white wings amid the darkness,
And willing us, with gentle motion, on
To some calm island, on whose silvery strand
Dropping at once, they fold their silent pinions.
And, as we touch the shores of paradise,
In love and beauty walk around our feet!

THE SONG OF THE VIRGIN.... Mrs. Hemans.

Yet as a sun-burst flushing mountain snow,
Felt the celestial touch of fire ere long
On the pale stillness of thy thoughtful brow,
And thy calm spirit lighten'd into song.
Unconsciously perchance, yet free and strong
Flow'd the majestic joy of tuneful words,
Which living harps the choirs of Heaven among
Might well have linked with their divinest chords,
Full many a strain, borne far on glory's blast,
Shall leave, where once its haughty music pass'd,
No more to memory than a reed's faint sigh;
While thine, O childlike virgin! through all time
Shall send its fervent breath o'er every clime,
Being of God, and therefore not to die.

Cromwell and Milton—Their Domestic Genius.—Look at Cromwell and Milton. Here are two men having so striking a family likeness that they may be considered brothers. They were both men of genius; men of stern and earnest temperaments; men whose days were spent in strange and unknown ways, with precipices and deep waters on every side; but who were always upheld by a solemn enthusiasm and calm determination, that made them set at naught all the powers of the world. For them the ordinary attractions of life had no charms. They were sent into the world for other purposes than to eat, drink, and be glad. What to them were seventy years of luxury and pleasure, if they were to be purchased by an eternity of misery? Was the Bible true or false? Were heaven and hell truth or lies? They looked into their hearts, and a fluttering spirit told them that the Bible was true—that heaven and hell were true—that life, death, and eternity were true. Each then labored under his great Taskmaster's eye. But how different were their lives, and yet how much the same! How unlike are their portraits, and yet how like! Yet could Cromwell have been any thing more than the statesman and the soldier? Could Milton have been any thing but the philosopher and poet? Was not Cromwell essentially a man of action, and Milton not less essentially a man of speculation? Could Milton have won the battle of Worcester? Could Cromwell have written Paradise Lost? It was not assuredly for want of opportunities that Cromwell was not a great poet; for his youth and early manhood were spent in retirement and obscurity, such as were likely to nurse habits of thought and meditation, and induce the mind to apply itself to the quiet study of literature and philosophy. We know well that Milton devoted his life to study, and how conscious he was, even in his early days, of his vocation. The design of some great work, which posterity would not let die, was formed in youth, health and happiness, and carried out in old age, defeat, blindness, poverty and ruin.

THE DUTCHMAN'S EXPERIENCE.

The testimonies of our brethren who have attested that God is merciful and good, as I have often heard them in our love-feasts, are not only instructive, but also always animate and cheer the soul. And, although some of our Dutch brethren cannot speak English correctly, yet to hear them relate the means of their conversion, as I have heard some, at once evinces their sincerity, and is evidence of the work of God's grace in their hearts. I wish I could relate one as it was spoken in love-feast more than thirty years ago, when the Methodists first began to preach in the Northern part of the State of New York. I have forgotten his name, but the substance of his testimony was as follows. He said—"Mine dear brodren, I want in tell you some mine experience. When de Medodists first come into dese parts, I tot I was doing very well; for mine wife and I had two sons, Ned and Jim; and we had a good farm dat Neddy and I could work very well, so I let Jim go out to work, about fourteen miles from home. But te Metodists come into our parts, and Neddy went to dare meeting, and he get converted, and I tot we should be all undone; so I told Ned he must not go to dese Metotist meetings, for so much praying, and so much goin' to meetin' would ruin us all. But Neddy said, 'O, fader, I must serve de Lord, and save my soul.' But I said, 'You must do de work, too.' So I gave him a hard stint on de day of dare meeting; but he work so hard dat he got his work done, and went to de meeting after all. While I set on de stoop and smoke mine pipe, I see him go up de hill to de Metotist meetin, and I said to mine wife Elizabet, 'we shall be undone, for our Ned will go dese meetings;' and she said, 'What can we do?' Well,' said I, 'den I will stint him harder;' and so I did several times when de meetings came. But Neddy worked hard, and sometimes he got some boys to help him, so dat he would go off to da meeting. While I set on mine stoop and smoked mine pipe, I could see Ned go over do hill. I said one day, 'O, mine Got, what can I do? dis boy will go to dese meetings after all I can do.' So when Ned come home, I said, 'Ned, you must leave off going to dese meetings, or I will send for Jim to come home, and send you away.' But Neddy said, 'O, father, I must serve de Lord, and save my soul.' 'Well, den, I will send for Jim.' So I sent for Jim; and when Jim come home, den I heard he had been to de Metodist meeting where he lived, and had been converted too. And Ned and Jim both said, 'O, fader, we must serve the Lord, and save our souls.' But I said to mine wife, 'Dese Metodists must be wrong; da will undo us all for dey have got Ned and Jim both. I wish you would go to dare meeting, and you can see what is wrong; but Ned and Jim can't see.' So de next meeting-day de old woman went wid Ned and Jim; but I set on mine stoop and smoked mine pipe. But I said to mineself, 'I guess dese Metodists have got dere match to get de old woman, and she will see what's wrong.' So I smoked mine pipe, and lookt to see dem come back. By and by I see dem coming; and when da come near enough, I see da tears run down mine wife's face. Den I said, 'O, mine Got, da have got de old woman too.' I tot I was undone, for da have get Ned and Jim, and de old woman too;' and when da come on de stoop, my wife said, 'O, we must not speak against dese people, for da are de people of Got.' But I said nothing, for I had not been to any of de meetings; so I was in great trouble. But in a few days after I heard dat dere was a Presbyterian missionary going to preach a little ways off. So I tot I would go; for I tot it would not hurt any body to go to his meeting; and I went, wid Ned, and Jim, and mine wife, an ho preacht; but dere was noting done till after de meeting was done, and den dere was two young men in de toder room dat sung and prayed so good as any body; and da prayed for dare old fader too. And many cried, and I tot da prayed very well. After dis I was going ont of de door to go home, and a woman said to me, 'Mr.——you must be a happy man, to have two such young men as dem dat prayed.' I said, 'Was dat Ned and Jim?' She said, 'Yes.' O! I felt so mad, to tink da had prayed for me, and exposed me before all de people. But I said noting, but went home, and went right to bed. But now mine mind was troubled more dan ever before, for I begin to tink how wicked I was to stint poor Neddy so hard, and try to hinder him from saving his soul; but I said noting, and my wife said noting. So I tried to go to sleep; but as soon as I shut mine eyes, I could see Neddy going over de hill, to go to his meeting, after he had done his hard stint, so tired and weary. Den I felt worse and worse, and by and by I groaned out, and my wife axt me what's de matter. I said, 'I believe I am dying.' She said, 'shall I call up Ned and Jim?' I said, 'Yes.' He came to de bed and said 'O, fader, what is de matter?' I said, 'I believe I am dying.' And he said, 'Fader, shall I pray for you?' I said, 'O yes, and Neddy too.' And glory be to Got, I believe he heard prayer; for though I felt my sine like a mountain load to sink me down to hell, I cried, 'O, Got, have mercy on me, a poor sinner.' And by and by I feel something run all over me, and split mine heart all to pieces; and I felt so humble and so loving dat I rejoice and praise Got. And I am resolved to serve Got wit Ned, and Jim, and mine wife, and dese Metodists. [Rev. B. Hibbard.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, January 1.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

This ecclesiastical body convened at Jackson, the capital of Mississippi, on the 15th of December.

Jackson is a thriving town of some three or four thousand inhabitants, and the centre of a large cotton trade. By railway it is connected with Vicksburg, and soon will be with New Orleans, by the Great Western Railroad, extending indefinitely far North, and by another line towards the Atlantic, will be connected with the East.

The various Churches are well represented, the Methodist, however, being the largest body. The health of the location, the excellence of the public and private schools, the morality and intelligence of its population, combined with the facilities of trade and travel, make it a most desirable residence.

The Conference held its session in the Hall of Representatives in the capitol. The Presbyterian and Baptist churches were courteously tendered to the Conference, and their pulpits were filled by our preachers during the session.

Owing to the affliction of Bishop Andrews' family, he did not arrive in time to take any part in the proceedings; but, nevertheless, was in time to attend to the ordination of quite a number of deacons and elders.

Dr. Drake was elected to the Presidency, and by the urbanity, promptness, and enlightened intelligence of his administration fully justified the choice of the Conference.

There were quite a number of rather more than ordinarily valuable accessions to the Conference. The various educational interests under the patronage and care of the Conference were represented to be in a healthy and improving condition. The missionary collections amounted to nearly eight thousand dollars, which, we believe, is a considerable advance upon any previous collection. The missionary meeting was held in the Methodist church on Saturday evening of the session. Bro. Watkins and Dr. Parsons were the "chief speakers" on the occasion. A novel method of getting money and speeches was resorted to at this anniversary, to wit: making propositions to raise fifty or a hundred dollars for some brother to make a speech of ten or twenty minutes length—as we were made the victim of one of these propositions, we can not say that we altogether approve of this new device of filling the missionary treasury. A speaker totally unprepared, suddenly called forth to make a speech under such circumstances, does it with extreme reluctance, and feels as though he had been suddenly submerged in a cold bath. The collection was respectable, though we have not heard the amount.

The session was one of unsurpassed harmony. The pulpit ministrations commanded solemn attention, and were powerfully efficacious for good. Some six or eight had professed faith in Christ when we left, and there was every prospect of a great and glorious work.

The next session will be held at Port Gibson, Mississippi. W.

THE PLEDGE OF INCREASE.

The preachers of the Alabama Conference have done much, and promise to do more, for the Advocate. We ask every local preacher and layman within the bounds of that Conference to read that resolution—To obtain thirty subscribers, each, the ensuing year—read it, that you may see what manner of spirit they are of, and help them to carry the good purpose out.

The Publishing Committee have well set forth the reason for bringing down the subscription price to the unprecedented low figure of one dollar and a half. "It is more important that the paper should be in the hands of the many," etc.

But the advantage to be gained, by this reduction, to our Church; the advantage of getting hold of the mind and attention of the million, of putting an "Advocate" of Methodism into every family and house, important as it is, can only be really secured by an effort on the part of the friends and agents of the paper for its enlarged circulation. The paper will go, if it has a chance. Ask, and you will obtain subscribers. Who can refuse and give a good reason for it?

More than a hundred preachers, sending up thirty subscribers each, will give from Alabama over three thousand additional paying names to our list for the coming year. We expect them all, and have good reason for it, in that unanimously and heartily passed resolution.

From the Mississippi Conference we also look for favors to the Advocate—no small ones either. Much to our disappointment we were unable to be present at the very interesting session just closed at Jackson. Bro. Walker, however, who kindly represented the interests of the New Orleans Advocate there, reports progress cheeringly.

The Louisiana Conference will be in session before this writing reaches many. Though this Conference is young and small among the tribes, it is fast developing, and has a bright future before it. The Advocate will share fully in all the brightness and success of that future. Then, calculating on the patronage that comes from the "regions beyond"—from those preachers and people, who, notwithstanding all Conference affinities, etc., will read the New Orleans Christian Advocate, and circulate it, too—shall we not expect much? Four more numbers will complete our second volume. We should like to enter upon the third with a few thousand additional names. Can you send them? An extra number will be struck off, and orders waited for.

PLEASE REMEMBER—The cash invariably in advance. Also, while obtaining new subscribers, to attend to renewing the old ones.

THE 27th!

The 27th December, 1852, will long be remembered in the Crescent City. It was a quiet day; no gun firing, and "garments rolled in blood;" but there was work—serious work, going on at the polls. In connection with the State elections "License" and "No License" was submitted to vote. The result was significant, if not decisive. The friends of Temperance lifted up their heads as the counting went on. It was even rumored about, that "No License" had carried! Too good to be true—but it created a sensation, better imagined than described.

	License.	No license
First District	1243	2006
Second District	1989	347
Third District	1304	254
Fourth District	525	425
	5061	3032

Majority for License, 2029.

Well! there is some hope for the "No License" cause, when in this city 3032 responsible citizens cast their votes against the iniquitous traffic. The Southern Organ did its duty nobly, shaping and preparing for the issue. The First District is the American portion of the city. Its thrift and intelligence, its position and influence, put it far in advance of other portions of the city. But while the battle was going well in the First District, the French of the Second District came to the rescue of Liquor, as they did formerly to the rescue of the Pope. Equal nuisances both, for which Rome and New Orleans are alike indebted to Gallic influence.

The friends of the cause will not be disheartened. Having failed in the "Omnibus bill," they will now take it through by pieces. Let them be firm, and advance.

We extract the following section from the act under which the license question was taken:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana in General Assembly convened, That from and after the passage of this act, the Police Juries of the parishes, the Selectmen of the towns, and Mayor and Aldermen of the cities, shall have the exclusive power to make such laws and such regulations, for the sale of intoxicating liquors, as they may deem advisable; and to grant, or withhold licenses from drinking houses and shops, as a majority of the citizens and voters of any ward, parish, town or city, may determine by ballot.

Under this reading it would appear that it is competent for the Common Council to close all drinking houses in the First District, as in each ward of that District a majority of votes was cast in favor of No License.

Sunday School Union.

Resolutions of the Mississippi Conference concerning the Sunday School Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South:

Whereas, This Conference has learned that a Sunday School Union for the M. E. Church, South, has been recently organized in the city of Louisville, Ky.; and whereas, the constitution of said society provides that the whole movement, constitution, funds, location, etc., shall be submitted without reservation to the action of the next session of the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, therefore

Resolved, That we will, as early as convenient during the coming year, make collections in our respective charges in aid of this important enterprise; and that we will remit the proceeds of such collections to the Rev. E. Stevenson, assistant book agent at Louisville, to be by him handed over to the Treasurer of said Union.

From the minutes.

H. JAMES HARRIS, Sec'y.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.—We have changed the address of the preachers of the Conferences just held, guided by the list of appointments and private advices. If the "Advocate" should not reach the proper address, brethren will please notify us, and we will endeavor to suit them.

VISITORS.—Drs. Parsons and Stevenson and Rev. Mr. Bristow, en route for California from Louisville Conference, and several other ministerial brethren are now in our city. They will supply the pulpits of the Methodist churches to-morrow.

BAPTISTS IN NEW ORLEANS.—Our friends of the Baptist Church have taken no half measures in their plans upon New Orleans. Their cause has long languished, but is near a change. The Conventions of Mississippi, Alabama, and a few others, have resolved to plant and sustain here, through the Board of Missions, four ministers, to be located at eligible points in the city. We shall be glad at their coming, and hope, from the spirit in which it began, that this evangelical enterprise will have abundant success.

Bishop Amss, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was a passenger on the steamer Illinois, which left New York for the Isthmus on Monday week. He goes out on a visit to the California and Oregon Conference.

From Dr. Parsons, we learn that an interesting revival of religion was visited upon the Church at Jackson, in connection with the labors of the Conference. He left on the 22d ult. There had been eight or ten conversions, and the meeting in spirited progress.

The collections of Missionary money reached nearly $7,000: an advance over last year. The collection at the anniversary of the Conference Missionary Society, was about four hundred dollars.

LIBERAL.—The Methodist Church in Jackson, Miss., Rev. W. H. Seat, pastor, contributed to the Fifth Conference collection, four hundred dollars. Well done. This is not giving to this cause, as many do, the parings of the nails.

THE NEW FIRM.—See the advertisement of H. D. McGinnis, 4th page. M. McG. did business with the late Mr. Bull, at 56 Gravier, and will make an excellent successor to that popular gentleman. He is well acquainted with the business, and has taken hold of it spiritedly and with advantage. We are glad still to have a quasi Methodist Book Concern in our midst.

REV. THOMAS CROWDER.—This amiable, zealous and useful minister of Christ, died in Charlottesville, Va., Dec. 3. Dr. Lee, in paying eloquent tributs to his memory says:

"No member of the Virginia Conference was more extensively known or more generally beloved. His loss will be long felt, and his place will not be soon or easily filled. Scarcely six weeks have elapsed since our close, and yet two of our brethren, beloved and useful, have been gathered to the recompense of the just. The workmen die, but the work goes on.

THE SACRAMENTO FIRE.—In the great fire which recently devasted that city four church edifices were destroyed. The Catholic, the Baptist, the M. E. Church, South, and the M. E. Church, North. The last was a noble brick edifice in process of construction; $16,000 had been expended upon, and it was about to receive the pulpit and pews when destroyed.

THE CHURCH SUIT IN NEW YORK.—Judges Nelson and Betts are divided in their opinions concerning some points in the report of the referee on the amount to be paid to the Church, South, and on some other points in the report. In consequence of this division in the opinions of the judges, the points in dispute between them are to be sent up to the Supreme Court. Consequently, says the N. Y. Spectator, a final decree can not be entered in the case until the directions of the Supreme Court upon the points submitted to it shall be sent back to the Circuit Court. Nor can the defendants, should they elect to appeal from the decree of November, 1851, deciding the main question of the right of the South, take such appeal, until the final decree in the cause is entered.

Dr. Winan's Sermons.

The following report of a Committee of Mississippi Conference, on the forthcoming volume of Dr. Winan's Sermons, which is anxiously expected by the Church, will show our readers the status of the matter:

The committee entrusted with the duty of examining the manuscript Sermons in the course of preparation by our venerable friend and brother, Dr. Winans, and which this Conference requested Bro. Winans to prepare for publication, beg leave to report, in part, as follows:

Dr. Winans has submitted for the examination of the committee his Sermons on the following subjects, to-wit: "The Evidences of Christianity," "The Being and Attributes of God," "The Trinity," "The Divinity of Christ," and "The Creation."

Your committee are fully satisfied, that so far as Dr. Winans has been able to devote himself to this work, he has met the highest expectations of his brethren, and sustained the reputation he has won by his long life of labor and study. From the plan proposed by Dr. Winans, and pursued in the arrangement of the Sermons already prepared, we expect a system of Theology which shall be regarded as a text-book by the Conference, and a more full and faithful exposition of the doctrines of the Bible, as held and taught by the Methodist Church, than has ever been published.

We regret that Dr. Winans' health has been so infirm as to prevent his proceeding more rapidly with the work assigned him, and recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That we feel gratified to learn that Dr. Winans is engaged in preparing a volume of Sermons for publication, as requested by the Conference, and with earnest prayer to the Great Head of the Church for his preservation, request him to prosecute the work as speedily as his health will permit.

B. M. DRAKE,
W. H. WATKINS.

Report of the Periodical Committee, Alabama Conference.

The Committee on Periodicals beg leave to make the following report:

The committee do not deem it necessary to notice the claims and prospects of all our periodicals in detail. The Conference has received, in communications from the different offices, statements of the fiscal condition of each. Their other peculiarities appear in their own columns, and speak their own praises or censures.

Those which circulate most largely among us, and which form the staple of the religious reading of our Church, call for more special attention.

The Nashville and Louisville Christian Advocate:

Resolved, That the Nashville and Louisville Christian Advocate continues still to sustain nobly the doctrines and usages of Methodism, although, from circumstances, its circulation is greatly diminished in our bounds; nevertheless, we will continue our agency in forwarding subscribers and collecting its dues.

The Southern Christian Advocate, always ably conducted, now occupies a higher stand than ever before in our Church literature.

The substantial character of its selected articles, and the thoroughly Wesleyan and evangelical character of its editorials, highly commend it to the esteem and patronage of the Church. The reduction of its subscribers affords matter of regret to us all. This reduction has resulted chiefly from the circulation of our own Conference paper. We have, however, been unable to recognize this as an adequate reason for the reduction. We are satisfied that the demands of the Church call for the circulation of just such a paper, in addition to our own, in our midst. We are satisfied, that, to suffer such a paper to die, would be most detrimental to our interests, as a Church. We offer the following resolutions:

1. That we renew our efforts to increase the subscription list of the Southern Christian Advocate within our bounds.

2. That we attend to its pecuniary interests, as heretofore.

Of course, the committee will be expected to refer to the New Orleans Christian Advocate, peculiarly dear to us, both from its connection with our Conference, and the high character of the paper.

Its success has fully equalled the expectations of its friends. The recent reduction in the subscription price—a most masterly stroke of policy—bids fair to give it a circulation almost unparalleled in the history of Southern literary journalism. With the present able editor at its head, we have no hesitation in predicting, that it will continue to occupy its high stand, as a family, religious, and secular paper of the first order.

The committee offer the following resolutions:

That, as the reduction of price requires strenuous effort, in order that advantage may result from it, we pledge ourselves to use our influence to secure THIRTY NEW SUBSCRIBERS EACH, during the ensuing year, and attend faithfully to all its pecuniary interests in our our bounds.

The S. S. Visitor calls for special attention.

We much regret that a paper so important to the Church, and so well conducted, having at its head one of our own body, of whose ability it would be a work of supererogation to speak, should not be able to sustain itself most handsomely. It is mortifying to observe the shameful indifference of many of our ministers and members to this department of religious literature. The best interests of the Church call for more earnest endeavors to sustain it.

The committee offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That in addition to other efforts, we endeavor to secure a copy of the Visitor for each family to which we may have access, in our respective charges.

THOS. H. FOSTER,
J. A. CLEMENT,
J. D. WORRILL.

Report of the Publishing Committee, Alabama Conference.

The Publishing Committee of the N. O. Christian Advocate, report that paper in a sound and thrifty condition, with a subscription list amounting to about 3,500, and increasing at the rate of a hundred or more per month.

After carefully canvassing the subject, and looking at all its bearings, it has been determined to reduce the price from $2 to $1 50 per annum, in advance, invariably. This has already been published to the world, with the reasons for the step. It is believed to be far more important that the paper should be in the hands of the many, than that a small and unimportant dividend should be secured. On the principle, and at the price at which our papers are usually published, they are kept very generally from the hands of those who read them most, and who would be most benefitted by them.

Resolved, That in view of securing a wide circulation, and thereby accomplishing a greater amount of good, this Conference approve of the reduction in the price of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, though we thereby waive the prospect, heretofore existing, of receiving a dividend, until the number of subscribers reach ten thousand.

NO! I NEVER LOCATED.

REV. H. N. MCTYEIRE:

My Dear Brother—Not long since, I read, with great interest, the extracts from his diary, of my old friend, the Rev. Ebenezer Hearn, of the Alabama Conference, as published in your excellent paper. These are things in which I am always interested, and by which I seldom fail to be edified. I love to look over the past, and especially to hear these reports of former times, by those of the pioneers of early Methodism. Such was brother Hearn. I knew him well, and knew, to love him. And now that he is stricken with age, and looks with a degree of gloomy apprehension to the rapidly approaching close of the active labors of an itinerant preacher, I would point him to scenes of toil and success in winning souls for Christ, which, though past forever, can never be blotted out, and in the results of which he may, and ought to glory now, and in the world to come.

It is not good that a minister of Christ, any more than others, should always labor. It is befitting, that he who has stood forth under the burthen and heat of the day, should at last sit him down in the quiet of evening tide, and looking over the occurrences of the past, feel that his work is done, and his weary steps are being called homeward to rest. Rest! Immortal word, and big with eternal meaning to the laborers of Christ. God bless brother Hearn, and let the evening of his valuable life be one of cloudless and calm serenity, and his "sun in smiles decline, and bring a pleasing night."

But, one thing in the narrative of brother H. has awakened in my breast feelings and emotions of no ordinary character, and caused me to recur with deep interest to my own, perhaps singular history. Yes! singular indeed does most of my life seem. From the extreme point of the beginning of my career, to the present, I seem to have been the creature of my necessities, and almost unintentionally led on from step to step, until I find myself a citizen of the "far-off land," and a wanderer over its rugged mountains and beautiful plains. I can scarcely yet realize that I have brought through perils of sea and land, a wife and children, all to suffer and contend with the almost insupportable trials of a missionary life. But so it is. I know not what is next—the past is in review, and how I am thus far is to me full of interest.

But, the fact to which reference was made, is that Brother Hearn incidentally states that he found me in Alabama, a local preacher from Georgia. A local preacher! Never, I said. No! I never located. I was glad in my heart, that it was in my power to correct the innocent mistake. But, that I never located, I owe under God, to my brethren of the Georgia Conference, and here record, to their honor, and my greatest good. I tried to locate, but the Conference held me on. I thank my brethren for securing to me the honor and exquisite pleasure of saying, "I never located."

At the age of nineteen I was admitted on trial as a traveling preacher in the South Carolina Conference, then embracing South and North Carolina, Georgia, and part of Eastern Alabama; and for nine consecutive years continued regularly in the work. About this time my health failed; and having a wife and children, for whom I felt it both a duty and privilege to provide, I determined on a location. Accordingly, I wrote to the Conference, held that winter in Athens, Ga., asking for that relation. To my surprise, when the appointments were published, I found my name on the list of superannuated preachers. This at first was afflictive. I was young, had done but little, and would likely never be worth retaining in the Conference. Upon inquiry into the cause of this unexpected action of the Conference, I learned that Bishop Morris, who presided at that session, and whom I had never seen, suggested, when my case was under consideration, that I was young, and if retained awhile, might return to the work. The thought was taken, and I was not located. Several years elapsed—five or six—when, after buffeting hard with the world, then living in Alabama, my way, was under God, opened up by His people, and I re-entered the ranks of the efficient itinerant ministry, as I then felt, and now firmly believe, never to locate. Whatever may have been my toils and exposure to suffering, either at home, or in this distant missionary field, I have always felt, and do still feel, that I am debtor to the good Bishop, and my brethren of the Georgia Conference, to an amount that I shall never be able to discharge. I am sure, my life has depended on this matter.

The foregoing is given, first, from a sense of obligation to those alluded to, and secondly, in the hope that the example of Conference kindness in my case may become instrumental in saving others, as I have been saved, from an early, and perhaps disastrous location.

THE RIGHT KIND OF A PAPER.—The editors of the Memphis Advocate define their position before their readers and the rest of the world. We like the following notion of a religious family paper. And liking it, have heretofore published just such a paper. To those who have not agreed with us in this matter we commend this paragraph. May it convert them into acquiescing patrons and active agents:

"There are some who desire to see a religious paper wholly devoted to religious essays and intelligence, objecting even to secular advertisements of lawful and necessary business. We do not think that a paper of the kind alluded to could meet the wants of our people, or be so extensively useful, as the kind we now publish. It is our intention hereafter to furnish our readers with summaries of the leading domestic and foreign intelligence of the day. Now, some of our people do not think they can afford to take both a religious and a secular paper: and, if cut off from the secular news of the day in the columns of a religious journal, they will discard it for a secular paper. Besides, there are many persons outside of the Church who will peruse a religious paper for the sake of its secular matter, and have their attention caught by some of its religious articles, and thus are reached, when they would otherwise keep aloof from the influence of the religious press. Matters of general intelligence and business information, which do not conflict with Scripture teaching, we shall therefore give place to in our columns; thereby, we sincerely believe, adding both to their interest and utility.

RESOLUTIONS ON TEMPERANCE BY THE ALABAMA BAPTIST STATE CONVENTION.—The following resolutions were adopted by the Alabama Baptist State Convention, held at Marion on the 6th and 9th ult:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this Convention, the time has arrived when the State of Alabama should no longer make the traffic in ardent or intoxicating liquors as a source of revenue—a traffic which not only brings disgrace and and ruin upon vast numbers of her valuable citizens, but is demoralizing to her population, and threatening to subvert the very foundation of her prosperity.

Resolved, That this Convention hails with much satisfaction the dawn of a bright era in our State, with respect to the monstrous evil, Intemperance, and most heartily concur and sympathize in the contemplated Convention to be held in Selma, on the 24th inst., and that ten delegates be appointed to represent this body in that Convention.

Resolved, That before any person should have the privilege of doling out this liquid poison, intoxicating drink, to any people, the people to whom it is furnished should give, in the most unequivocal manner, an expression of their desire that it should be so retailed, and that to effect this we believe that no intoxicating liquors should be retailed in any county, unless a majority of the qualified votes shall so express their desire; and that in such cases, no one shall retail in any beat, until after he had received a majority of the legal votes in such beat, and then he commissioned by the Governor.

Resolved, That while these are our opinions, they are nevertheless founded upon what we now deem practicable; and that we should greatly rejoice in seeing this terrible scourge, the traffic in, and manufacture of ardent spirits, as a beverage, entirely suppressed.

PLATT STOUT, Rec. Sec'y.

Carlowville, Ala., Nov. 20, 1852.

The real and personal estate in the United States and Territories is returned as of the actual value of $7,133,369,725. We would raise that, to make it correspond with the year 1852, to $10,000,000, and estimate the present actual population at twenty-five millions, giving $400 per head of property to each human being, or $2,000 to each average family of five persons.

We subjoin nearly all the compositions read at the public exhibition:

LIFE'S MOTIVES.

"What shadows we are,
What shadows we pursue."

It is but just and reasonable that man should occasionally withdraw his attention from external things, to the contemplation of self. By so doing he is made familiar with that truly wonderful machine, the human frame; with the reciprocal influence of the soul upon the body, and the body upon the soul, in which there is a wisdom displayed, beyond his comprehension; and in regard to which, the result of his profoundest investigations is but astonishment and admiration.

Although possessing a superior nature, he enters the world in a state of greater feebleness, and is consequently more needy than other animated beings; hence we perceive him more favored, and more cherished by the blessings of Providence. Still many bitter dispensations prove to him that he perishes from earth like a flower which blooms in the morning, but at evening is withered and trodden under foot.

Oh! "What shadows we are
What shadows we pursue."

How many immortal energies have been wasted, how many expectations blasted by Ambition. At first he blinds us, and then compels us to tower by reason of our blindness.

"He comes! Ambition comes; his way prepare,
Let banners wave in air!
And loud voiced trumpets his approach declare
He comes!—for glory has before him raised
Her shield with godlike deeds emblazed."

Yet when the summit of ambition is attained, soon it is that we are plunged in misery's depths. It has been observed that a desire for rank and power, is the mark of a great mind. Why then have so many weak intellects been captivated; while to those possessed of the greatest genius, it has no charms? What better example of this could we adduce than Washington or Cincinnatus, who were greater by far in their retirement than Alexander or Cæsar at the height of their ambition. Truly has it been said, "It requires less magnanimity to win the conquest, than to refuse the spoil."

Like Milton let our ambition be, to leave something to after ages, so worthy, that it shall not willingly be allowed to perish; let us pursue the substance regardless of the shadow.

Comparing talent and real worth with rank, how boldly does the former hold forth its superiority; the one is substance, the other a shadow. Behold that mighty host. They follow the delusive phantom Honor; however changing; her views are contracted, and in the scenes of this transitory life she is not to be relied upon. By every billow she is rocked, and by every breath of wind borne onward to destruction. What more decisive evidence can we wish than Brutus, who in his real worth shipped honor, but when the day of trial arrived, he found her but a shadow.

In succession comes Power, which may be compared to the microscope, as it magnifies everything little that comes within its range. It exalts the unworthy, hence whatever is mean, and proffers support to everything base and vile. He who would employ power for the benefit of another, deserves, but does not covet it; but to him who uses it for his own good, he desires far from deserving it. It is in fact a precarious safety; its pains real, its pleasures imaginary. We have but to refer to the extraordinary career run by Napoleon; as the cloud, agitated by the air, trackless; its only object to ascend; friendship rudder, the whirlwind; a vapor, its impulse; downfall, its destiny.

Next Avarice—that shadow cometh with her host of votaries. Behold in the train that waiter, who lives respected to die rich. Wealth—his god on earth, and the more aged he becomes, the more firmly clinging to its worthless dust. Truly he follows the shadow of shadows.

Genius is not, as some have supposed, a mere shadow, but a living substance. It may exist in a rustic, under a dull atmosphere; and it may exist under every sun and every sky; for the fogs of Iceland have been warmed by poetry, and those of Holland by wit. To the full development, of genius, the light of other minds is requisite. Newton or Shakspeare deprived of kindred minds, and born among savages—savages had died.

"Creative genius! from thy hand
What shapes of order, beauty, rise.
When, waves thy potent, mystic wand,
To people, ocean, earth, and skies."

There is in life one object, which all can pursue, and it obtain. It knows no disappointments, since, he who perseveres makes every contest a victory; it is the pursuit of virtue. "Those that seek her early, will find her;" her reward also is with her, and she will come quickly. The breast of a virtuous man is a little heaven commencing on earth, where the Deity sits enthroned with unrivalled influence; and He who fills the eternal throne, must be on the side of virtue; and what He believes must finally prosper and prevail.

We are so constituted, that the most vicious cannot but pay a secret, though unwilling homage to virtue, and it is from this inward esteem for virtue, which the noblest cherish, and which the basest cannot expel, it follows that virtue is the only bond of union, on which we can thoroughly depend.

Lastly comes that much misrepresented, and absurd phantom, Death! the king of terrors, and the terror of kings. The painter has used his colors, the orator his tropes, to portray death as the grand destroyer. But can he be called a destroyer, who but releases the prisoner? Can he be called the king of terrors, who exchanges that which is temporary, for that which is eternal? Perhaps he summons us too soon from the feast of life; be it so. If the exchange is not for the better, it is not his fault, but our own. Tyrants can sentence their victims to death, but how much more dreadful would be their power could they sentence them to life! How short is the race we run! Almost may we touch the portals which terminate the path of our mortal pilgrimage. Should the holy spirit purify our hearts, and open our ears, we may already perceive the sounds which proceed from the celestial abodes. Let us then attentively listen to the warning voice. "Shadows we are. Shadows we pursue."

"So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, that moves
To the pale realms of shade, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one, who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him and lies down to pleasant dreams."

EMMA B. CLARKE.

BELSHAZZAR'S FEAST.

"'Tis near the noon of a beautiful starlight night" in the proud city of Babylon. Its haughty Monarch is seated at the festal board of his lordly palace, surrounded by all his sycophantic courtiers, who are pouring into his ear that flattery which springs from a base and servile mind. The table groans beneath viands of which the gods would not scorn to partake.

The harpists send forth the most delightful lays from their beautiful instruments.

The wine-cup passes freely round, and all become intoxicated.

The vicious Belshazzar, not content with all this pomp and magnificence, forms the impious design of quaffing wine from the sacred vessels of the holy Temple of Jerusalem. This design is no sooner formed than executed.

"Fill me that massy goblet to the brim.
Now, Abraham! let thy wretched race expect
The fable of their faith to be fulfilled.
Their second temple and their promised King
Now will they see the god they vainly serve
Is impotent to help; for had he power
To hear and grant their prayer, he would prevent
This profanation."

Thus cries Belshazzar and raises the sacred goblet to his lips; when, lo! a mysterious hand appears and writes upon the wall that awful sentence: "Mene, mene tekel upharsin." The wine falls from his trembling hand and he stands gazing upward in speechless horror. No one else seems to strike him: "Bring hither all the wise men of my kingdom," he cries. They come; the sages of Babylon, versed in all the arts and sciences of war, but incompetent to read the writing of God. The King is troubled, but looking up he sees the despised prophet of the Jews, Daniel standing before him. Daniel "severe in youthful sanctity," boldly interprets to him their prophetic import. "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting."

Hush! what voice is that? Is it the rushing of the waters of the Euphrates? Is it the mourning of the wind? Alas! no: it is the trampling of the thousands of the Persian conqueror, who is come to fulfill the dread prophecy of Jehovah. They come nearer, nearer; they enter the palace, and in a moment the wicked Belshazzar lies lifeless at the feet of his mighty conqueror.

New Orleans, Dec. 22, 1852. JULIANA RAYMOND.

THE PUBLIC REFORM;
Or, Anti-License League.

The evil aimed at by this League is wide-spread, exceeding its influence over the world.

It is less than three hundred years since it first became a prevalent opinion in Britain that ardent spirits were useful, and indeed essential to the working man; that he was by them the better enabled to resist the effects of heat, cold, wet or fatigue. And it was not until the time of our Revolution, that such became the opinion in America. Then our government supplied liquor to our army. The necessity imagining that its use would extend no further, and that the soldiers, when liberated from martial service, and permitted to return to their homes, would continue the use of it. But the present condition of the country tells us with sorrowful emphasis, such was not the case.

With them, it was an experiment, originating in benevolence, unchastened by such knowledge as we have of its ruinous consequences.

Had they, as we, seen its effects, how could they then have put it, by legal sanction and high example, into the possession of their countrymen? How could they have thought, as beyond doubt they then did, that it would be safe and innocent—had they witnessed the results of retailing it from every street corner in our cities, and every wayside tavern and cross-road hamlet throughout the country?

They knew not the evils, numerous and malignant, as the plague of Pandora's Box, which were to flow from and were comparatively blameless; but our present knowledge of intoxicating liquors and criminality, for from recent, it is greatly to be feared that innocent blood will be required against them, as well as against the venders and dispensers of this stimulus to every other species of wickedness.

I do not appeal to dealers. Their answers in self-vindication would be numerous. "They had a right to sell liquor. They paid for this right—paid the Government, and it is lawful!!! It is "LAWFUL" employment! Then how sad, and yet how true, this fact is. It is awful!

I dout appeal to any one class for a reformation, but to the whole population of New Orleans, as represented in assemblage.

Seest thou yonder christine man? He labors for the promulgation of Christianity in our city, but he does not belong to the Anti-License League. "They," says he, "will never accomplish anything here; they are too real and the place is too far gone in its devotion to this beverage." Let him stop and consider. They may not be strong. 'tis true; but could he not lend them a helping hand? "The place is too far gone!" Thinks he so? Then far gone for him to labor in the cause of Christ and religion? Remembers he not that the success of the temperance reformation is one of the essential requisites to the progress of Christianity? Would he preach the doctrines of love and gentleness to the madman? Is he not the victim of intemperance even worse than the demoniac? The blind and maniac are blameless, for God deprives them of their reason, but the drunkard deprives himself under the control of his desolater—who knows no mercy and will struggle long. Ay, to the alms-house or to the grave, before he relinquishes his prey.

Is it not, then, the duty of every Christian as a means to an end, to lend his aid to the Anti-License League? And is it not also the imperative duty of all philanthropists, and patriots, and all those who love, and would support our republican institutions, actively to sustain the much needed "public reform?"

I would respectfully ask the audience now assembled, whether New Orleans cannot vote for and adopt the License Law, when so many of her sister cities, and even whole States have so nobly adopted and are living under the "Maine Law?" Are you ready to consent that

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

South shall remain the home of intemperance after it shall have been ignominiously driven from the North?

It seems such cannot be the case; and have not cause to conclude it will not be, when we see weekly, an able temperance paper sent forth among our people and by them, as we hope and believe, both read and sustained?

If the citizens of this city labor heartily and cheerfully in this good work, God will bless their efforts; and many a heartfelt prayer will arise from hearts made happy through their influence, for the continued prosperity of the Southern Organ, and the success and perpetuity of the Anti-Lacrosse League of New Orleans.

ELIZABETH HARRY CORY.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS.

Truly, the time of our earthly pilgrimage is chequered with pleasures and sorrows. To-day we are exalted to the realms of bliss; to-morrow sunk in the depths of despair. Who can look into futurity and tell what the next hour may bring forth? None! All is sealed from our vision by a cloud so dense that the eye cannot pierce into its obscurity, and we are doomed to rest for the present, and gain wisdom by reflection on the past. Though the cup of joy is sometimes tasted by every one, yet some partake of passing pleasures more freely than others; but with all, the pursuits of happiness are varied as the imagination can well conceive. While some are tempted by the gay, fashionable world, with balls and theatres excite in their bosom a thrill of pleasure, others look in the light of home and domestic felicity. Some delight in loneliness, burning the midnight oil to advance a few steps further in the path of knowledge, enhancing as much real happiness when the point for which they have toiled is gained, as others whose only pleasure consists in the gay rounds of dissipation; but to all comforts in the gay rounds of dissipation; but to all comforts in their station in life, shadows will flit across their course of light, and darken for awhile the sunshine of their happiness. Though gay and thoughtless, some thing will occur to prevent the full fruition of their fondest anticipations.

If domestic virtues, parental and filial affection, and the desire of seeing others happy, constitute our chief delight; if, in our home, the abode of peace and security, where all our sweet and fond affections meet, we feel our happiness, and desire nothing more, even then is our bliss sometimes overshadowed by death. We even then feel cold and desolate will the once loved home appear when robbed of one of its cherished inmates.

> "All that's bright must fade.
> The brightest still the fleetest.
> All that's sweet was made,
> But to be lost when sweetest."

If mental application be our only joy, and years are spent in acquiring knowledge, perhaps ingratitude will be even then our reward, and, like Copernicus, death will prove from the dreadful conviction of having labored in vain. The time seem to endure but few of the many cares of life accord, whose lives appear one unvaried scene of pleasure; yet, perhaps, even these could we look into the mysterious depths of their hearts, we would find some secret sorrow, over which they have brooded long in silence, unknown, and thus unfelt by all. Yes, every one has some sorrow which, though unknown to all else, is not deep, for who that truly suffers can bear the prying gaze of the sympathising world? 'Tis true we may willingly confide all our griefs to one loving bosom whose affection we have tried, and on whose faithfulness we can rely, and feel a relief in thus unburdening our hearts. Oh! 'tis sweet to think that all our sorrows can be appreciated by one kind and dearly loved friend, to know that she truly feels our afflictions; half our grief is removed by her pressure, tears turn to smiles, and we are happy when with her, though doomed to misery when she is gone.

But, though all have sorrows, we frequently bring them on ourselves; for how often a harsh word, an unkind look or any other voluntary action of ungentleness, will alienate persons who have truly loved, destroy friendships which years have been spent in cementing, and cost many many useless tears! Still we must acknowledge that our affections are generally sent by Providence, and so veiled the future from us that even when in the midst of delight we may be graciously standing under a lowering cloud ready to burst with sudden violence, and shed its fearful contents upon us, surrounding us with gloom and despair where all had been joy and gladness.

But, veiled as is our existence by light and darkness, it was so ordained by our benificent Creator, and there is no doubt he will, and wisely done; for, were our desires always gratified, and the light of what we now call happiness never overcast, it would cease to be happiness, for the very consciousness of having it under our own control would render it valueless.

We should, then, console ourselves by knowing, when the sunshine of our lives is briefly clouded by an occasional sorrow, that shadows but render succeeding light more brilliant.

MOTHER'S LAST PRAYER.

Again I feel the breath of summer upon my fevered brow, but oh! what changes since last I felt that welcome love! I have seen the loved of earth laid in the cold and narrow grave. I have heard my dying mother utter—God bless my child!"

How can I so calmly repeat that sweet and touching prayer! Because I think I hear her voice continually. It is not to me as it she was dead. I realize it only when I see her smile no more, and feel not the pressure of her hand.

I see the tender mother kiss her darling child. I turn away; there is no mother's kiss for me. I hear the much loved child call on its parent. I sigh: for, I have no mother now. Oh! the thought, the bitter thought! I had a mother once, who loved me, and called me her darling child; she kissed me, and I was happy.

The eye is closed that once beamed with nought but love for me. No longer do I hear the voice whose tones were music to my ear.

A mother's love! How sweet it is! Neither absence nor death can diminish a mother's love. 'Tis true, the love we bear a father may seem stronger; but it lacks not that peculiar depth and tenderness. The recollections of childhood are associated with the sweet tones of our mother's voice. In thought, in love—whatever is second she is first. And can a mother's place be supplied by another? Nay, never. She bears with your follies, loves our errors, as no one else can. She exerts an influence the most powerful with regard to our future destiny. The immortal Luther ascribes the pious bent of his mind to the early education which he received from his mother; perhaps it had not been for her, the mighty Reformation would have never been accomplished.

By severity a mother is obeyed, but by love she is idolized. We love the beautiful, and can anything be considered more beautiful, than when about to depart this world, a mother entirely forgetful of self exclaims—God bless my darling child.

EDUCATION.

What were man but for that greatest, that noblest of blessings which the Almighty in his goodness has given to him—the power to perceive and appreciate his works.

When nature is examined, what beauty is unfolded to the view of one whose mental powers have been enlightened—a beauty never perceived by the ignorant. It is by this inestimable gift that the soul is enabled to raise itself above this temporary home and soar far in yonder heavens—enabled to feel the power of the great, the omnipotent God!

In the splendor of the bright, the glorious sun, the silvery clouds, the pale though lovely star, the soul is enabled to read, to feel, a holy pleasure, which alone results from Education. Not only does it enable us to appreciate the beauties of nature ourselves, but to contribute to the happiness of all within our reach, pleasure in the mind as it does, that delicacy and elevation of feeling, that sympathy for another's woes, which, to the overburthened heart is grateful balm. By it we have that true, the perfect gentleman, it instills into his nature a distaste for anything low or debasing, and his sense of honor is rendered more acute, his respect for mankind in general heightened, lest he act least, his duty to his God more necessary.

Would that mind have ever been developed—would the priceless gems of knowledge which lay in the bosom of the immortal Newton ever been known? Or would Pope (who so well knew how to touch the heart) ever have thought of alluding so beautifully to the "Philosopher of the Sky," in the following words:

> Nature and all her works lay hid in night.
> God said let Newton be—and all was light."

Would Napoleon, Washington, or any of the great men who have figured so conspicuously, would they have ever accomplished such feats as will carry their names down to coming generations, had it not been for the sound principles instilled by a thorough education?

Would the independence of America ever have been thought of if this self-moving power had not taught eye, made them feel themselves men, of God's works the noblest. Would the genius of Byron, of Burns, of Scott, of Moore, ever have been known to mankind? Would the beautiful, the pure, the natural thoughts of our own poets and poetesses ever have been known to the world, or would the world in general be able to appreciate or capable of feeling the high and noble thoughts occasioned by the perusal of such works?

It is education which keeps society together. It is the link which preserves the chain from breaking which binds the subject to his sovereign, the wayward son to his exacting father.

In fact, it preserves the peace, the dignity and the prosperity of the nation. I might say of the world. But need we leave our own State, our own dear home, to learn the taste, or to see the good effects resulting from a general education!

The brier, lidered, as taught us in our Geography, that the son of the poor man may become President of the United States.

The lord, day after day, that thousands of children are seen wending their way to school—the Public School where all are regarded according to their merit.

Is this generosity in the public that will enable Louisiana to stand prominent in the annals of time.

And have not we, who meet once more as school girls, been influenced by it? Have we not a heartfelt thankfulness for the never ceasing kindness, the deep interest now evinced by the honorable gentleman composing the Board of School Directors, and the sisterly affection combined with womanly dignity of our own ever dear and affectionate teachers, whose image in after years, will be the green oasis in life's desert.

E. A. BOWMAN.

VALEDICTORY.

"There are moments in life of most exquisite sadness," yet who would wish them banished? Life is not, it cannot be one continual ray of sunshine. Clouds will come and rest their shadows on its brightness; yet Hope, pointing with rosy finger to the distant future, whispers of joys to come.

Too well we know that life is not one joyous gala day. Youth's gayest visions fade, and sorrow sometimes clothes the brave; still, though this be our lot, there are blooming flowers in the wreath of life that bless with their fragrance and gems in its diadem that gild with their radiance the darkest spot; there are moments when despair is banished, and the heart beats with sunbeam joy.

This is such an hour, and though longed for (how much the student's heart alone can tell) now that it is upon us our lips shrink from uttering the parting word.

To you, kind Superintendent, and you Directors, that word we first address. With hearts swelling with gratitude, we thank you for the great interest you have ever manifested for our welfare; for that true charity which has overlooked our faults, and remembered only our eager endeavors to merit your approbation. The hope of success has sustained us in the midst of difficulties almost insurmountable, when hope had well nigh failed, and as we now bid you adieu, we tender our sincere acknowledgments for the past, and this assertion, that if those who succeed us prove more worthy of your regard, they cannot esteem it higher, nor cherish it with fonder remembrance, than does this class of 1852.

To you, beloved schoolmates, we breathe our last adieu. Memories of bygone days come rushing before us—memories of "joys we've tasted, griefs we've shared." We have passed with you many happy moments that can never be forgotten, and in our sorrows your kind words, soothing sympathy and gentle demeanor, has lightened our toils and gladdened our hearts. But we are now to separate, you to remain yet a while longer, and then follow us who now with heavy hearts pass from your dear society to others and less congenial circles. The privileges and advantages we here enjoy, entail upon us heavy responsibilities from which we cannot shrink. "Look not mournfully into the past—it comes not back again. Wisely improve the present—it is thine. Go forth to meet the shadowy future without fear and with a strong heart."

Let us dream of fame, but not forget that it must be an angel's eye to bear its dazzling light. We would linger longer, ere we pronounce those words which will sever hearts so long united, ere we draw the curtain suspended between the past and future.

Yet, let us together mourn the absence of one who not long since stood among us. She is sleeping now; those late like tombs are hushed—those beaming eyes are closed. Never more will the voice of affection thrill upon her ear, nor those still lips return love's gentle pressure.

> "But God may take what He has given.
> Our loss no mockly bear.
> We would not call thee back from heaven.
> But strive to meet thee there."

Loved classmates, on your behalf have I spoken thus far, and now let us, for the last time, survey with one another our school-girl joys; the long period which we have passed in close companionship adds to our sadness at parting. The circle of friends who now listen to us, the wise and great, the gentle and lovely, feel but a passing interest in these scenes, but with us they will leave an impression which neither coming years, nor future changes, nor severe trials will ever obliterate, but serve only to render more indelible, for the "pen of the spirit, dipped in a lake of fire," inscribes them on each heart. To us this is a glorious hour—our tasks are finished—the goal is won—and we leave the halls of learning, and enter upon other and untried duties.

Often will thought revert to this day and hither will the spirit, when worn and wearied, steal a while away in noiseless visits to these happy scenes, and live them over again."

I may be called upon to suffer the record of the past may be stained with tears wrung from a sorrowing heart, yet will t never exchange these blotted pages for the brightest dreams the future can weave. Were bethe's cup to my lips, I would taste not, for there are "green spots in memory's waste" to which the eye will gladly revert—spots which your love has graced, your friendship adorned, and your affection gladdened. "In sadness they will bring joy, and my prayer shall ever be "Lord! keep my memory green"!

For you, dear Teacher, we have reserved our last, because our saddest parting. We are but few among the many who shall go forth from this hall with the consciousness that from your lips they have gathered wisdom, and have been the grateful recipients of your kindness and sympathy. You will send forth from your care ministers for the bedside of sickness, those who will treasure up the lessons of womanly gentleness which your precepts and example have taught; and now, on the eve of separation, accept our earnest prayers for your well-being, and

> "Whate'er our lot in life be cast, though good or ill befide.
> We'll keep your precepts in our hearts, your pattern for our guide."

And our most fondly cherished recollections shall be other by whom our energies were roused and our efforts stimulated. Let our parting tear blot from your remembrance whatever in our conduct may have embittered the past, or caused your heart a single pang; forgive where the gaiety of youth has led us to disregard your friendly solicitude. The benefits received from you we never can repay; time will pass, the future, now so bright and dazzling, may disappoint us, but in the midst of disappointments we will cherish your kindness, and remain faithful to our remembrances of you. No words of ours can express our grief at parting with you—the saddest look the swelling tear, the silence, more eloquent than words, must say for us, farewell!

Kind friends, dear Schoolmaster, and cherished Teacher, we bid you a loving, long, and last adieu!

EMMA.

HYMENEAL.

MARRIED—By the Rev. W. J. Ferguson, on the 21st of December, 1852, Mr. M. C. CALLIHAN to Miss IRENE A. WALLIS, all of the parish of Terrebonne, La.

OBITUARY.

DIED—On Thursday, the 16th of December, after a short illness, SARAH ELIZABETH DAMERON, the wife of W. H. Dameron, of this city, in the twenty-seventh year of her age. She was a native of Princess Ann county, Va. She professed religion and became a member of the Methodist Church at the age of twelve, since when she continued to be a consistent Christian.

Language is not adequate to express the grace which the Lord, for twelve hours just previous to her death, evidently poured into her heart. She was strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man, according to the riches of his glory. She seemed "filled with the fulness of God," and able to comprehend, with her enlightened understanding, the hope of his calling, and the riches of the glory of the inheritance of the saints in light.

When told that she would probably die, she replied, "It does not alarm me; I am not afraid to die; it excites me, but does not alarm me." She then turned to her husband, "Dear, I am very young to die. I hope I shall die easy. I fear I shall suffer a great deal at the last." Soon she said, "How dark it is getting! This must be death." But directly said, "It is not dark now. All is light. There is not a cloud. I am very happy. Dear, it is very easy to die. I feared I should be called to suffer very much, but I am so free from pain, I am so happy!"

Imagine her on her death-bed, surrounded by her husband, sisters and mother; her face beaming with delight, cheerful and happy, talking in her own sweet way to one and then to another. She left two little boys—babes. "M——," she said, "I give you Bertie; I——, I give you Willie, and ma will take both. M——, ask ma if she doesn't wish me to take a kiss to heaven for pa. Ma, I shall see him; I shall see Robert, and brother Herbert too. Tell A—— (her sister) it is sweet to die. Here, dear, I want you to kiss me. I want you to have the last kiss from my lips."

She had her servants called around her. "Here," she said, "tell me good-by, all of you; I'm going to leave you. You must love my children; take care of them for my sake and my husband's, and love them very much." She spoke to each one about themselves and their children. She then said, "Dear, I want them all to go to my grave. I want them all to ride. How many carriages will it Never mind, don't let any of them walk." Her husband asked her not to trouble her mind about such matters, that he would see to it all as she wished—to talk of heaven. She smilingly replied, "No, dear, I will have all eternity to talk about heaven, to think of its joys and glories; but while I have so short a time to stay with you all I must talk about other things too."

Her power of concentration and her clearness of expression was unusual. She seemed particularly careful to collect her thoughts. "I would not," said she, "speak unmeaningly." When asked what should be said to her little boys from her when they grow up, she replied, "Tell them to be careful of life; to be obedient to their father; and talk to them often about me."

Towards the last she seemed to see both worlds at once; now she lifted her eyes and saw "the spirits of the just made perfect," then she gazed upon the loved faces about her. The glory that she saw was reflected in her countenance; it played there all the time she was dying and even after death its traces could be seen. Several times she exclaimed, "Oh, how bright the room is; it is filled with glory." Moving her hands buoyantly, she said "I am so happy; I feel so light, I am floating on an ocean of paradise." She asked if any one saw objects flitting about the room. "I do," she said, "they are angels. How bright and beautiful! They are female figures, and are dressed so chaste, in white, in the purest white!" At another time, "A rose! yes, a white rose! O, how beautiful; she is like a white rose in beauty and purity—don't you all see!" They answered no. "There," she continued, "surely this is death; is it possible it is so easy to die! O, I am so thankful for this case in my dying moments!" Then speaking to herself, she said, "Is this death? Tell me, my soul, can this be death?"

Shading her eyes with her hand, as if looking out in a brilliant light, "Oh," said she, "I see pa! yes, I see pa! Write to sister Cook," she added. "that I shall see Mr. Cook first." (Mr. George Cook, artist, an eminently pious man, who died here several years since.)

Several times, when she had passed through what threatened to be a last struggle, "Come," she would say, smilingly, "let me bid you all good-by again." Just as if she were about starting away for the summer, and was bidding good-by, first in the house, then at the door, then in the chariot, and at last, still waiving her hand, and smiling.

Her babes were then brought to her. She could not see distinctly, nor speak. But with assistance, she held them at arm's length before her, and would not have them taken away. She gazed on them intently, smile succeeding smile, and then motioned them to be put to her lips for a kiss: which, when given, she looked so happy as none can describe, and those that saw will never forget.

Sister D. was possessed of great kindness, of remarkable purity and humility of character, with a total absence of self. Her gentleness, with a lively sweet manner, scarcely indicated her robust strength of purpose. Being left an orphan, and without brothers or sisters, she resided from an early age, until nineteen, when she was married, with an aunt, a fashionable lady, where she was surrounded by many gay young friends. This lady was a member of another Church, and estimated a "Methodist" at rather a low rate. But no ridicule or influence could induce the niece to disturb the integrity of her religious profession.

For several years past she has been a great sufferer, yet always cheerful. She diffused joy through the house by her death, as before by her life. The fear of death was banished from the room and the hearts of all, by her dying. It may be said, that she died in a rapture, that faith was lost in sight for hours before she left. She triumphed not only for herself, but for all her friends. She presented death to them in a new light, and robbed it of half its terrors. I never remember to have witnessed such delightful cheerfulness under such a loss, as husband, mother and sisters have received from the sight, and now from the precious memory of her departing hours.

> "There is a world above,
> Where parting is unknown:
> A long eternity of love,
> Formed for the good alone.
> And faith beholds the dying here,
> Translated to that glorious sphere." K

DIED—In Carrollton, on October 30th, 1852, after a most painful sickness, ELIZABETH FULTON, the wife of Jesse Fulton, in the fifty-eighth year of her age. She became a member of the Methodist Church and a professor of religion early in life, and has been known as a consistent Christian, both in Georgia and this State, ever since. She expressed in her last illness a firm trust in the gospel. No doubt, after a life of labor and care, she now enjoys the sweet rest of the people of God.

J. C. KEENER.

DIED—In Clark county, Ala., November the 7th, 1852, Mrs. NANCY ANN LANCASTER, wife of Mr. A. Lancaster, and daughter of Milton and Michal Ford. She professed religion in the fall of 1845, and joined the Baptist church in Marengo City, Ala., and continued a consistent member of the same until her death. Her health had been bad for several months, but on Tuesday, the 2d, she was taken quite ill with pneumonia and continued to grow worse, and on Friday evening, the 5th, she prayed earnestly for a manifestation of her acceptance with God. She at length obtained the blessing and continued happy throughout the night and on to her death. On the evening of the 6th a deacon of her church came to see her, and conversed freely with her on the subject of death. She told him that she should soon pass through the valley and shadow of death, and that she feared no evil. She saw her way was clear from earth to heaven. She frequently thanked God for sustaining grace in the hour of death. It was what she had often prayed for. On the night before her death she gave her husband and her children her last charge how to act towards each other, and to meet her in heaven. We have every reason to believe that she is now in the good world.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

CALIFORNIA, OREGON, CHINA, Sandwich Islands, AND AUSTRALIA!

Fifteen Days Later from California—News from Oregon, China and Australia.—The United States mail steamship Falcon, Henry Rodgers, U. S. N., commanding, arrived Tuesday morning, bringing the United States mails, one hundred and fifty passengers, and three hundred thousand dollars on freight and in the hands of passengers. The Falcon sailed on the evening of the 21st, at eight o'clock. On the evening of the 18th, the Uncle Sam went to sea via Kingston. The Georgie sailed on the evening of the 20th, with $2,500,000 on freight, and two hundred and fifty passengers.

On the outward passage, at six o'clock, on the morning of the 11th, passed steamer Pampero, for San Juan. On the 13th, Jacob O. Faber died of consumption. On the 17th, John Anderson, Quartermaster, fell overboard, and was drowned.

Mining Intelligence.—The Cotsevras Chronicle has the following items of news from the mines:

The Rains and the Calaveras Chronicle.—The past week, says the Chronicle, has been dull and stormy there being an almost incessant rain, at times falling in torrents The gulches in this vicinity have been filled with water since last Sunday, and the miners have taken advantage of the desired element by washing the dirt which they had thrown up during the dry weather. In Steep Gulch, a number of miners are busily engaged in washing. The rain has had the effect of driving the miners from the river to their winter diggings, and we here noticed many of our mining friends of last year making busy preparations on their old claims for a rich winter's employment.

New Diggings.—In many places are parties at work prospecting the various diggings, and we often hear of their progress and success. Among these is the discovery made at San Andres, where very rich diggings have been struck close to the town, and at a depth of not more than twenty-five feet. The earth is represented as being very rich, a single handfull producing as much as $22. We hope the information we have received may be correct, as in that case the miners in the vicinity will reap a rich reward.

The River.—Operations in the Mokelumne may now be said to have closed. For some time past it was evident that the rains would so swell the river as to prevent further working in the bed, and accordingly many companies set to work and took up their flumes, for the purpose of preserving the lumber against next year. During the summer several companies have been unable to work their claims for want of proper machinery, but by next year all this will be obviated.

Esmeralda.—The miners here are doing well. On Winnel's Bar, two Germans took out, one day last week, $52 each, from a claim which had already been supposed exhausted. Above this claim Fritts, Dillman & Co., have taken out from $18 to $25 per day with a prospect of continuing to receive an equally rich recompense throughout the balance of their claim, down to Winsel's Bar, which will afford employment for a considerable length of time. There are about three hundred people located here, who are doing well. Messrs. Winsel & Jones have several claims in their employ on Wares, who are making good wages We believe that this point will ultimately prove one of great mining importance, as there are many places that will afford lucrative employment for great numbers.

Fire at Camp Yuma.—A destructive fire had occurred at Camp Yuma, by which $200,000 worth of U. S. stores were consumed

Assassination.—Gen. J. H. Bean, the commander of the militia in the South, was shot, says the Los Angeles Star, on the night of the 12th ult. He died in twenty-four hours afterwards.

The Marysville Herald gives the following thrilling account of the heroic conduct of a lady in that neighborhood:

Defeated Attempt at Roseery.—On Thursday evening, an attempt was made by two or more white men to rob the house of Mr. Wm. P. Calloway, commonly called Sampson's ranch, about a mile and a half from this city. About 8 o'clock a man entered the house, without invitation, no one being in the house at the time but Mrs. Calloway and her young babe. He asked Mrs. C. if her husband or any male person was at home, and, on her replying in the negative, he ordered her to deliver him the money. She said there was none—when he drew a pistol and threatened to shoot her if she did not instantly comply. Mrs. C. laid down her babe, and passed behind the villain as if to obey him. He was sitting on a chair, to which he had helped himself on entering, and a chopping axe was leaning against the counter nearly at his back Before he could suspect her motives or defend himself, she had seized the axe and dealt him a heavy blow with the edge, on the side of the head. She repeated her blows until he fell on the floor, apparently dead. At this moment she perceived another man, also white, looking in at the door. She then seized a double-barreled gun which lay on the counter, and attempted to shoot him; but, in her trepidation, only half-cocked the piece. She then ran to the bay rotun, to look her babe, all the money and a watch, and ran a quarter of a mile to the nearest neighbor's, (Mr. Cameron's,) whom she hurriedly informed of the circumstances. Mr. Cameron, accompanied by three or four men, proceeded immediately, well armed, to the house of Mr Calloway. By the time they arrived, the wounded robber had evidently been carried away. The next morning Mr. Calloway, who did not arrive at his home until Mr. Cameron's party had left it, tracked the blood about two hundred yards, into a thicket, beyond which he lost all trace of it. He then came into town and set the city police to work, who, we trust, will give a good account of the villains. Mrs. Calloway's defence is one of the noblest specimens of female heroism we ever heard of. The rascal has two deep cuts she gave him, on the right side of his head, and the third blow she dealt him was with the poll of the axe, on the crown of the head. If not dead, he will scarcely pay her another visit soon.

Valuable Piece of Ground.—Those persons who feel a solicitude for the future welfare of Sacramento, will be surprised when they hear that the three lots formerly occupied by the Overton Block, 60 feet on J street, by 160 on Third, sold at Sheriff's sale Thursday last, for the sum of $40,000. Read & Co. were the purchasers. This is the highest price ever paid for a similar amount of land in this city. [Sacramento Union.

Fire on Fire!—Narrow Escape—The fine clipper ship Southern Cross, which arrived here on the 30th, from Boston, had a very narrow escape from being totally destroyed by fire. On the 16th of August, in latitude 44 deg. south, longitude 61 deg. 30 min. west, smoke was discovered issuing out of the after hatchway, and a search was immediately instituted for its origin. In about a quarter of an hour the persons below became suffocated, and were driven on deck without making any discovery. Several holes were cut through the deck and water-poured in, without any apparent effect. All communications with below were immediately closed, all parts made air-tight as possible, and the ship hauled in for the land—the wind at the time blowing heavy from the north-west. The decks below became much heated during the night, with the smoke issuing from the seams that were not air-tight. After making land, the Captain concluded to put into Montevideo, it being the nearest port where anglers and other requisite assistance could be procured. The vessel arrived there on the 31st of August, when its appearance had become truly alarming. Engines and plenty of men from the United States frigate Congress were procured, and after seven hours' arduous and unremitting labor, the fire was quenched. In the meantime, a large amount of goods had been thrown overboard. The fire, it appears, originated in the lower hold, near the after-hatch, and burned through the lower deck in several places, but fortunately it did not reach the sides of the vessel. The origin of the fire is still a mystery. The vessel repaired at Montevideo, and sailed on the 18th of September. [Alta California.

Melancholy Casualty.—We are informed by a gentleman of Corte Madera, that a Frenchman who was engaged by Messrs. Kimball, Clarke, and others, in the survey of some red-wood timber on the Bolinas road, was attacked on the night of the 20th inst., and nearly torn in pieces by a grizzly bear, which, with two cubs, entered the camp at midnight. Mr. K., with astonishing coolness and presence of mind, succeeded in killing one of the cubs, whereupon the bear attacked one of the party, Joseph, a Frenchman, and mutilated him in a serious manner. Dr. Baldwin was immediately called, and last accounts were favorable to the recovery of the unfortunate Frenchman. Grizzly bears are said to be very abundant in Marin county, and, at this season of the year, are particularly ferocious and troublesome.—[Ib.

Marysville and Benicia National Railroad.—The company to survey the line of road from Marysville to Benicia are now at the Merchants' Hotel in this city. They are fully prepared to commence the survey, and are only awaiting a favorable change in the weather. The company is organized as follows: Wm. J. Lewis, Chief Engineer; Y. Catherwood, Advising do.; L. B. Healy, of Santa Clara; J. J. Lewis, San Jose; and Fred. Emory, Marysville, Assistant Engineers. In addition to the Engineering Corps, there are five employees. Should the weather prove favorable, it is hpected the survey will be completed in a little over a month. [Marysville Express

A Prediction Verified.—The Alta California publishes a letter from Lieut. M. F. Maury, addressed to the captain of the clipper ship Sovereign of the Seas, before the ship sailed from New York, giving him some sailing directions and telling him that he could make the passage in 108 days. This is the exact time occupied in the passage. The ship crossed the "line" in the Pacific within fourteen hours of the time mentioned by Lieut. Maury.

The Sacramento Fear.—In alluding to the Sacramento fire, the Union says:

The calm which usually succeeds a violent convulsion, whether it be in the material elements or the minds of men, has fallen upon events since the Presidential election and the fire, interrupted only the busy workmen, who went immediately at work to repair the damage. Their unceasing efforts from early morn to declining eve, have not been fruitless. The city is again built up, presenting its former proportions of boundary and number, nearly as many buildings as occupied it previous to the fiery visitation. Trade, nothing diminished, pours its influence through all the usual avenues, and gives promise of a more flourishing condition of things than ever. The rainy season, somewhat delayed in upon us, with its alternations of fair and foul weather. In consequence, great mud has been some the roads, rendering travel difficult, and distressingly tedious the amount of freight to each wagon, which toils with much difficulty through the stiff and deep mud of the country thoroughfares.

Departure of Cossacks.—The clipper ship Eureka, Capt Welch, sailed for Hong Kong, on the 30th ult, with three hundred Chinese passengers. She will touch at the Sandwich Islands, where forty of them will remain. She also carried away the sum of $70,000 in gold dust. This is the largest number of Celestials that have left in one vessel.

Attempted Murder of Chinamen.—A dreadful outrage was committed near Page's Ranch, by a couple of Chinamen. Two Germans, named Adam Baker and —— Gilding, hired a Chinaman to pack their luggage from Stephen's Bar to Campo Seco. The sum stipulated for was four dollars and a half, but the Chinaman offered for another fifty cents to engage another one to help him. They started from the bar at half past seven, the Germans going ahead and the Chinamen lagging behind. About 12 o'clock the Germans having nearly reached Page's Ranch, sat down and awaited the arrival of the Chinese. The latter, on overtaking their employers, stopped up, and one of them inquired the price of a gun belonging to one of the Germans. He offered $2 for it, which the German refused, requiring $3. The Chinaman immediately fired off the gun, disfixed it, and struck the German (Gilding) two blows with it upon the head, at the same time that the Chinaman struck Baker with the bamboo stick [illegible] them in carrying burdens. Gilding had his head cut in, and Baker ran for his life. The Chinaman had used the gun, then pursued Baker, leaving his victim to deal with Gilding. Baker was overtaken some [illegible] yards off, and a desperate struggle ensued between him and the Chinaman. The Chinaman snapped one of Allen's revolvers at him without effect, and for some time they fought hand to hand, without weapons. At length the German got the better of his adversary and struck him over the head with the gun barrel, killing him instantly. He then went into Mr. Page's Ranch and lodged information. Mr. Page, with others, went to the scene of the murder, where they found Gilding nearly dead and perfectly delirious. He since has died without being able to testify. The other Chinaman had, in the meantime, taken from his body the sum of $1000 in gold dust, in two separate bags, (one of $1400 and the other of $200) and escaped. He wears a black woolen hat, and blue dungaree pants, and is a middle aged man Earthquake at Acapulco.—A correspondent of the Panama Star furnishes that journal with the following particulars of a severe earthquake which has occurred at Acapulco.

Acapulco, December 9, 1852.—To the Editor of the Panama Star: The "Cortes" will bring you the news of a severe earthquake in Acapulco. The first occurred at twenty minutes past 10 o'clock, Saturday night, December 4, and the shocks, though less severe than than the first, have been repeated every hour or so since. It came without notice or previous indication, except that about 6 P. M., the mercury suddenly rose to 88, being three degrees warmer than during the day, but even this cannot, perhaps, be attributed to tha earthquake. The ground rolled like the ocean in a swell, and then a trembling motion was felt, lasting thirty seconds About thirty of the best buildings in town have been ruined, some falling completely, while all of any worth have been seriously injured. The loss is at least $200,000. The principal sufferers are Albert Schoiler, of the house of E. Vermond & Co., Juan de Aiqueyeta, the Government house of lien. Moreno, Antonio Heina, Pierre Lafergue, J. Augustin Marin, Manuel Barrera, the church, custom-house, Agnelata and Aguciata Buildings.

All the bottles, glass and crockery ware in the hotels and private houses were thrown from the shelves and tables. Yesterday morning quite a severe shock was felt, throwing down a few wares which had partly fallen at the first shock. The Fulton Hotel fell at the first shock on Saturday, but, by almost a miracle, every one was saved in the town. In fact, I have not heard of a single life being lost, although a few were seriously injured

The whole population naw sleep in the streets, or in the court-yards; and processions, with images of the Virgin and Christ, perambulate the streets with solemn strains of music, singing, and muffled drums, imploring God for mercy.

As I write to-day, (Dec. 9, at noon,) I have constantly to spring from my desk, as shock after shock is repeated, for fear of falling tiles and walls. Writing under such circumstances is rather an uncomfortable business; so, having given you the main facts, I will close.

Truly yours, R.

Later from Oregon

The steamer Columbia arrived at San Francisco on the 31st ult., bringing dates from Oregon to the 13th ult.

The Oregonian gives the following description of a coal bank on "Shookum Chunk," a branch of Chickeices, on Puget's Sound:

The coal bed is situated fifteen miles from Olympia, and the route to it appears quite feasible for a railroad. The coal rests on a strata of indurated sand, and consists—first, of two feet nine inches of very compact coal; second, six inches soft tale; third, twelve inches coal; fourth, four inches very fine sand; fifth, three feet two inches of very fine coal. Above the coal is a strata seam eight feet in thickness, of indurated sand, in which marine shells abound. The dip of the strata is about one foot in four. Mr. P. explored it for more than half a mile, and from the best information he could obtain, it extends several miles on the bank of the creek. The coat appears to be of the kind denominated semi-bituminous.

The Legislature is to convene on the 1st December.

The Oregonian says "It has commenced raining in earnest."

The emigrailon to Puget's Sound is represented as being very large.

The U. S. Senate having laid all the Indian treaties in Oregon upon the table, Mr. Dart, the agent for that State, has been directed by the Department at home to make no more unless absolutely necessary to procure peace with the Indians in the Territory.

The total valuation upon which taxes have been assessed in Washington county, Oregon, is $1,145,877.

Meetings were being held, and energetic measures taken by the citizens of Portland for the relief of immigrants.

Further from China.

An arrival at San Francisco from China brings an account of a full confession made by the rebel leader, Tien-Teh, who was taken prisoner by the Imperial forces in April last. A confession is required before a criminal can be executed in China, and it appears that Tien-Teh, who has been treated in the most rigorous manner, confessed in order to have an end put to his sufferings The confession is of considerable length, and is hardly worth republishing. It is quite evident that Tien Teh was a man of ordinary abilities, and that his execution will not materially affect the prospects of the rebellion.

Late from Australia.

By way of Panama, we have news from Australia to the 16th August—eighteen days later.

Efforts are being made to establish a mint at Sydney, and the project has also been favored by the principal bankers of London. Earl Grey, however, expresses the opinion that a mint would not be desirable, believing it would be more advantageous to export the gold uncoined.

The Sydney Shipping Gazette contains the usual encouraging accounts from the mines. As an example, a fortunate individual is named, who made £400 by six months labor in the diggings.

The Sydney Morning Herald advocates the establishment of a new penal colony at Farguclan Island, in the Southern Indian Ocean. The island is quite extensive, with numerous harbors, having good anahorage, and shelter for ships of any size. The climate is represented suitable for Europeans to labor in, and the island being valuable as presenting indnements for steamers on their voyages to Australia and the British Indian possessions, to stop for supplies of coal, is peculiarly well adapted for a penal settlement. By adopting this recommendation, the convicts can be removed from Van Dieman's Land, and thus all the Austrian settlements would hereafter be relieved from a curse of the most blighting character. It is doubtful, however, whether England will agree to any such change.

At Port Philip, the subject of leases to squatters was attracting much attention, and was likely to be the source of trouble and disaffection.

The Government was preparing to issue licenses, in accordance with the Act of Parliament, permitting squatters to occupy lands. An address to the Lieutenant Governor, praying that the leases might not be issued, was moved in the Legislative Council and rejected, and preliminary meetings were being held to decide upon what course to adopt. This looks as though the are having troubles about the possession of lands in Australia, as well as in California.

Upwards of £700 have been raised in Van Diemen's Land, towards the expense of the pirate expeditions in search of Sir John Franklin, now [illegible] out in England.

Dilis are before the Legislature of [illegible] Diemen's Land, for appointing Municipal Commissioners for Hobart Town and Launceston.

Cattle and sheep were in good demand; a cow and calf of good breed being worth £16; breeding ewes could hardly be purchased at any price.

A railway from Sydney to Melbourne, was talked of—and there were a number of advocates for making the project far more extensive at once—and running the road from Sydney to Melbourne. There is no doubt of the feasibility of constructing this road at a rapid rate; and the advantages to be derived therefrom, are very great.

Sydney has indeed grown to be a city of great commercial importance. We learn from the Shipping Gazette that on the 14th of August last, there were over eighty vessels lying in port, some seventy expected within a few days, thirteen whaleships therefrom, at sea; and there had been twelve arrivals within six days, and a very large number of departures.

Sixteen Days Later from the Sandwich Islands.

By the brig Baltimore the Alta California received files of the Polynesian and Argus to the 24 ult.

We are indebted to Adams & Co. for the use of a valuable file of shipping papers, which they received by the same vessel, and from which we make some extracts.

The news thus received is sixteen days later than that previously published.

There were one hundred and three whalers at Honolulu on the 24. ult.

A joint stock company for the prosecution of agricultural operations on the Islands, was proposed by a large number of the residents, and great efforts were being made to develop the resources of the Islands, and to induce the introduction of capital. The Polynesian, alluding to the subject, says: "Since 1850, the increase of plantations has been about 700 acres, and for 1853 will be 1100 acres more, on private account, but what is this aggregate of 2750 acres, compared to what the Islands might produce?"

The ships Charles and Comoro, from Boston, with cargoes of assorted merchandise, has arrived at Honolulu.

Foreign Residents in Honolulu.—A census of the foreign residents was recently taken by the marshal of the kingdom, included within the following limits: from Kalihi to Waikiki, along the coast, and in the rear as far as the pali. These bounds embrace the city of Honolulu and its suburbs, and give the entire population.

Males over 21 years of age	380
Males under 21	129
Females over 21	144
Females under 21	118
Total	771
Colored population	21
Chinamen in business	57
Coolies, laborers and servants	34
Total	883

It appears by the above that there are twice as many males as females among the foreign population.

The foreign population has diminished within two years by the drain to California and Australian colonies. The native population embraced within the same limits, is estimated at about 8000 souls.

Sugar Plantations.—The following statistics, in regard to the amount of acres cultivated to sugar, we have derived from various sources; those from Kauai we take from a communication in the native newspaper, by H. Armstrong, who has recently visited that island:

Number of Acres.	1852.	1853.
At Lihui	200	350
At Koloa	240	250
At Honuapia, Maui	150	300
At Makawou	325	500
At Hana	45	130
At Waimea, Itawaii	60	70
At Hilo	640	550
Total acres	1650	2750

Taking the average yield at one ton, or 2000 lbs per acre, we have for this year, a crop, 3,300,000 lbs. the crop for 1853, 5,500,000 lbs., at five cents per lb the crop of 1852 will be worth $165,000, and that for 1853, $274,000. [Polynesian.

Isthmus Items.—Maj. Ross, the chief of the gold hunting expedition which left Panama several weeks since, has returned to that city, and gives a very favorable account of the country he has explored. The agricultural resources of some sections are said to be immense.

A correspondence of the Panama Star says that four hundred thousand dollars' worth of property was destroyed by the earthquake at Acapulco.

The Chagres river had overflowed its banks and destroyed a large amount of property.

Senator Pratt, of Maryland, was seriously injured on the 17th inst., while in the United States Senate chamber, a lady's parasol having fallen from the gallery and struck him on the head.

Southern Commercial Convention.

This body assembled at Baltimore, on the 15th instant, and was called to order by T. H. Price, Esq., of Richmond, Va., who moved that John C. Brune, Esq., of Baltimore, take the Chair, and John F. Pickerell, Esq., act as Secretary. The Chairman then introduced Brantz Mayer Esq., to the Convention, who read an able address displaying the many advantages Baltimore possesses, as also the State of Maryland, in accommodating the commerce of the West, the South-west and the South.

On motion of J. H. Plensants, Esq., the following Committee, of one from each State, were appointed to retire and nominate officers for the permanent organization of this Convention:

W. H. Hollman, Massachusetts; T. H. Price, Virginia; Hon. T. L. Clingman North Carolina; Hon. T. S. Orr, South Carolina; Hon. A. A. Stephens, Georgia; Hon Alex. White, Alabama; Hon. J. D. Freeman, Mississippi; Hon. Felix Houston, Louisiana. Upton Dendoff, Ohio; Hon. J. B. Underwood, Kentucky; Hon. F. F. Stanton, Tennessee; Hon. J. L. Robinson, Indiana; P. Hermann, Missouri; Hon. C. T. Cabell, Florida; Hon. V. E. Howard, Texas.

The Committee thereupon retired and reported the following officers:

President—Hon W. C Dawson, of Georgia.

Vice Presidents—H. Apperson, Kentucky; Hon. J. C. Jones, Tennessee; Hon. S. W. Downs, Louisiana; Lewis Webb, Virginia. Hon. Stephen A. Downs, Mississippi; Hon. Jesse D. Bright, Indiana; John C. Brune, Maryland; Lieut. Maury, District Columbia; Hon J. L. Orr, South Carolina; Hon T. L. Clingman, North Carolina; T. M. Taylor, Missouri; Hon H. W Johnson, Arkansas; Hon. T. J. Hooks, Texas; Hon. A. White, Alabama; Hon. E. C. Cabell, Florida; N. C. Deardoff, Ohio.

Secretaries—J. B. Foley, Maryland; J. F Pickrell, Maryland; Hon. B. D. Nabors, Mississippi; C. G. Taylor, Editor of Cotton Plant.

Mr. Dawson, on taking the Chair, was received with applause, and proceeded to address the Convention in favor of Baltimore as the proper place of trade with the West, the South-west, and the South. It was an able review of the subject. He spoke for about twenty minutes, and on conceluding, received enthusiastic applause.

Mr. Freeman, of Mississippi, proposed that a committee of ten be appointed a Committee of Address and Resolutions.

Gov. Brown, of Mississippi, opposed the motion, on the ground that the address was not regularly in the possession of the Convention.

Hons. R. I. Bowie, of Maryland, P. S. Stanton, of Tennessee, and others spoke in favor of the propositlon, and it was finally adopted.

The following is the committee: Messrs. Freeman, of Mississippi; Underwood, of Kentucky; Jones, of Texas; Clingham, of North Carolina; Orr, of South Carolina; Mayo, of Virginia; Taylor, of Texas, U. S. Consul at Amsterdam; Sullivan, of Maryland; Robinson, of Indiana; Moore, of Louisiana; Apperson, of Missouri; Rowle, of Maryland; White, of Alabama.

The committee retired at half-past one o'clock, when, on motion of the Hon. Reverdy Johnson, the Convention took a recess for half an hour.

The Convention again assembled, and continued in session until half-past four. It transacted much important business regarding reciprocal commercial interests South-west and West with Baltimore and Maryland. Resolutions embodying the sense of the meeting were read, and some revisions required were referred to a committee. Resolutions were adopted in favor of Southern trade. The Convention adjourned to meet at Memphis, Tennessee, on the 1st Monday in June next.

A Rich Scene.—The Washington correspondent of the Charleston Evening News, gives the following amusing description of a rich scene in the House of Representatives, a few days since:

During a discussion recently in the House of Representatives on resolutions to refer the various branches of the President's annual message to the appropriate committees, Mr. Giddings took occasion to repeat his stereotyped speech about the wrongs inflicted upon his "colored brethren, and the enormities committed by those whose faces happen to be white. The murder of Mr. Gorsuch by his abolitionists at Christiana, in the State of Pennsylvania, delighted him almost beyond the power of utterance; and he went into hysterics at the mere idea of Fred. Douglas being elected to Congress, and pictured the grand orotorical triumphs which the negro will one day achieve in the Hall of Representatives. Had a gentleman and a sane man addressed such language to the body, it would have been considered insulting; but the speaker was uninterruptedly permitted to discharge himself of a large quantity of his self-generating putrescence.

When he resumed his seat, puffing and blowing like a locomotive from the effects of his extraordinary nervous effort, Mr. Stanly, of North Carolina, arose, and with a serious air, apparently inquired of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means why he had not moved to refer to the proper committee that part of the message which relates to the Lunatic Asylum in his District, an appropriation for which was made during the last session. It was certainly of intrest to Congressmen as well as others.

Mr. Houston, of Alabama, replied that he had thought such a reference unnecessary, as there is already ample provision for lunatics confined in this District or transported to Baltimore.

The House was convulsed with laughter, gentlemen having Giddings in their eye, as that individual put on his coat, buttoned it close, and with hat on head, hurried from the hall. It was a rich scene,

A Thrilling Incident.—The first settler in Maine found, besides its red-faced owners, other and abundant sources af annoyance and danger.

The majestic forests which then waved, where now is heard the hum of business, and where a thousand villages stand, were the homes of innumerable wild and savage animels.

Often at night was the farmer's family aroused from sleep by the noise without, which told that bruin was storming the sheep pen or the pig sty, or was laying violent paws upon some unlucky cell; and often, on a cold winter night, did they roll a larger log against the door, and with beating hearts draw closer around the fire as the dismal howl of the wolf echoed through the woods.

The wolf was the most ferocious, blood-thirsty, but cowardly, of all, rarely attacking man, unless driven by severe hunger, and seeking his victim with the utmost pertinacity. The incident which I am about to relate occurred in the early history of Biddeford.

A man who then lived on the farm now occupied by Mr. H——, was one autumn engaged in felling trees at some distance from his house. His little son, eight years old, was in the habit, while his mother was busy with household cares of running out into the field and woods around the house, and often going where the father was at work. One day, after the frost had robbed the trees of their foliage, the father left his work sooner than usual, and started for home. Just by the edge of the forest he saw a curious pile of leaves. Without stopping to think what had made it he cautiously removed the leaves, when what was his astoulshment to find his own darling boy lying there sound asleep! 'Twas but the work of a moment to take up the little sleeper, put in his place a small log, carefully replaced the leaves, and conceal himself among the nearest bushes, there to watch the result.

After waiting a short time he heard a wolf's distant howl, quickly followed by another and another, till the whole woods seemed alive with the fearful sounds.

The howls came nearer and in a few minutes a large gaunt, savage looking wolf leaped into the opening, closely followed by the whole pack. The leader sprang directly upon the pile of leaves and in an instant scattered them in every direction. Soon as he saw the deception, his look of fierceness and confidence changed to that of the most abject fear. He shrank back, cowered to the ground, and passively awaited his fate; for the rest enraged by the supposed cheat, fell upon him, tore him in pieces and devoured him on the spot.

When they had finished their comrade, they wheeled around, plunged into the forest and disappeared; within five minutes from their first appearance not a wolf was in sight. The excited father pressed his child to his bosom, and thanked the kind Providence which led him there to save his dear boy.

The boy, after playing till he was weary, had lain down and fallen asleep, and in that situation the wolf had found him and covered him with leaves until he could bring his comrades to the feast; but himself furnished the repast. [Biddefort Journal.

The Caloric Engine of Ericsson.—The caloria engine of Ericsson, which has been placed on board the steamer Ericsson, at Williamsburg, N. Y., has created much interest among mechanics, for the attempts made heretofore to propel machinery by heat, instead of steam, have proved utter failures. In 1827 two brothers named Sterling, in Glasgow, invented a hot air engine nearly similar to Ericsson's. This engine communicated motion to a piston by alternately heating a portion of air on one side of the piston, and cooling it on the other by means of air-vessels, one communicating above and below the piston. The difference in the Ericsson engine is, that the heated air is saved, and applied over again, which, it is alleged, will make it more economical. Other inventors have sought to apply hot air as a motive power, but with no better success than the Sterlings. If Ericsson has discovered the means of doing so, he has conferred a benefit upon mankind no less important in its ultimate results than the first successful application steam to machinery.

Alfalfa, the Chief Forage for Animals in Chile.—Among the imports from Chila, a list of which appeared in our yesterday's issue, will be noticed "seeds of the alfalfa." We are not aware to whom they arrived, but we think the attention of agriculturists in this State might be called with advantage to the plant, for whose benefit the importation is probably intended. The alfalfa is a species of lucerne greatly in use as forage for animals in the mining districts of Chile. It is a vigorous grower, requires little labor, and furnishes two crops a year of most nutritious food for stock of all kinds. As is well known, the mining districts of Chile are, for the most part, very sterile, and rain is of seldom occurrence. Natural grasses are, therefore, of scanty growth, and the miners are compelled to rely for their support, for the maintenance of their animals upon the alfalfa estates which lie within the narrow valleys of that mountainous region. The supply would, however, be wholly inadequate, were not the plant so remarkably prolific and possessed of such extraordinary nutritious properties. With the addition of a little barley, it is found to keep mules in the best working condition, and consequently the owner of one of these alfalfa haciendas is able to draw from his estate a much larger revenue than if cultivated in grain. In its green state cattle feed upon it with the utmost avidity, and acquire flesh so fast that it is the practice in Chile to drive herds from the grass pastures of the South, for hundreds of miles, in order to obain the benefit of its use. The land is prepared for the seed of this plant in the same manner as for clover, it being in truth of the same family as the letter. [California paper.

Death of Greenough.—We published, some days since, a confirmation of the report that Horatio Greenough, the sculptor, had become insane. We now learn that he died on Saturday the 18th, of brain fever.

The Boston Bee remarks: "Thus do our great men depart—our Sculptors, our Statesmen, our Painters, our Poets. Thus are gathered to their fathers the pride, beauty and strength of our country and time—Webster, Alston, Calhoun, Clay; and now our grief is again freshly opened by the death of Greenough, the Sculptor of the nineteenth century. Rarely, in any age, has there been such mortality among the luminaries of the world.

"Mr. Greenough's greatest work of genius, and on which he desires his fame to rest, is the statue of Washington, in the Capitol, at Washington City. On this magnificent work he spent his most ardent and studious days, and in some degree paved the way for his present premature and painful death."

Every State in the Union has now sent a block of Stone or marble, for the memory of Washington.

It is estimated that the losses by fire in California, during the last three years, have been $66,000 000

The Buffalo Express relates, that recently a glutton in that city, in the space of forty-five minutes, swallowed 153 clams, 70 oysters, and four glasses of gin.

Uncle Tom's Cabin in England.—An Episcopal clergyman of this diocese, writing from Cambridge, England, on the 31 November, thus speaks of the excitement caused by this work in all circles. We trust that his fellow clergy of home will not fail to read the volume which their reverend brother thus characterizes:

Uncle Tom's Cabin is still selling It is a marvellous book—a revolutionary book. It is really wonderful how it has influenced not only a tender with in our common nature, but also art, in its various departments. Cruikshank is illustrating it now in an admirable manner. The music shops are full of songs and melodies. The great run at the theatres is owing to the representation of Uncle Tom's Cabin. The windows are full of beautiful illustrations of the various scenes in it; and, by the way, the book is full of pictures. Passing through Cheapside the other day, all of a sudden I saw in a window a sable face, with bright eyes, shining teeth, and a most quizzical, comical expression, undersigned in large letters—"Topsy"

All the talk here in circles is about the book. I spent Sunday evening with one of the high men here; all the conversation was about it, and I see in the Daily News of to-day that a penny subscription is being raised to present Mrs. Stowe with a testimonial.

The English, Scotch, Irish and Welch clergymen are weeping over the imaginary pictures, by a diseased mind, of the horrors of American slavery, and groaning in agony for the suffering of the blacks in the Southern States—not one of whom ever felt the pangs of hunger, or the want of a comfortable home and a bed to sleep on—while they sit unmoved amid the wailings of starving thousands of their own race, their own kindred and their own blood. We can tell these English gentlemen and English clergymen, that the American slaves can spare enough from their own store to feed half the poor of London. We glout over the works of Sue and Dickens, sympathize with the poor of other lands, wonder how the princes and nobles can roll in such wealth, and indulge in so much splendor, amid the destitute and starving millions of their own countrymen. We sympathise with the oppressed of Hungary, of France, of Italy and of Cuba, and contribute freely to help Kossuth and Lopez in their mad schemes, because we believe that till they tell us of the sufferings and misery of their countrymen is true. Our Fifth Avenue ladies, good, charitable souls, think there never was before, and never can be again, such an "awful place" as the Old Brewery, and straightway they go to work and reform it. The people of England are now having their turn They have got what may justly be termed the "black fever," and it is raging with greater violence than ever the yellow fever did in Havana or Jamaica. It is well to let it run out.

Mrs. Stowe, besides the ten thousand dollars received in this country for her wild fancy sketch, will, according to accounts, pocket a cool twenty thousand from the contributions of the "starving poor" in England. [Day Book.

New Way of Catching Deer.—A friend has furnished us with the particulars of a rather novel performance in the capture of a deer. As the steamer Reindeer, on which boat our friend came a passenger, was descending the Ohio river, and just before she left the mouth, one of the persons on board discovered a large buck which had leaped in on the western and was attempting to swim to the eastern shore. The steamer ran in between the fleet forest animal and the point of his destination, thus compelling him either to retreat or make up stream and swim ashore in rear of the boat. The latter project was decided upon, but no sooner attempted than defeated, by the steamer backing up and coming again between him and the shore. He then tried to accomplish his undertaking by turning his course down stream, and thus effect a landing before his antagonist could advance, to intercept his passage; but the effort met the same fate as the first. The poor animal made several other attempts to gain his point, trying alternately the chances of passing in the rear or advance of the boat, but as often were his efforts thwarted by the dexterous management of his enemy. Finally his expedition was abandoned, and he commenced a retreat towards the shore from which he had embarked. Some three or four of the hands with a yall were despatched in pursuit of him. The vanquished rover of the wild wood being almost exhausted, from the fatigue occasioned by the contest in which he had just been engaged, was soon overtaken by his pursuers; one of whom seized him by his "dorsal appendage," and clenched the parts immediately thereunto attached, so as to immerse his head beneath the water, and in this position was held until he was drowned. The tall-hold was loudly protested against by the passengers on the boat; many of whom denounced such treatment towards the captured animal as unkind and unfair.

We have heard of many marvelous hunting excursions, some of which might astonish the Nimrod of the olden time; but they all fell into insignificance when compared with the novel and unprecedented feat of chasing down, and actually capturing a deer with a steamboat. [St. Louis paper.

The Webster Annuity.—The New York Journal of Commerce publishes the correspondence between the late Daniel Webster and David Sears, of Boston, on the subject of the annuity presented to Mr. Webster by his Boston friends. This annuity has been the occasion of much remark and of some censure on Mr. Webster during his lifetime, but Mr. W., says the Journal, was too proud a spirit to vindicate himself, and preferred to leave it to posterity to do him justice. This correspondence took place in 1848. Mr. Sears, in his letter, informs Mr. Webster that the sum of $37,000 had been deposited in the Massachusetts Hospital Life Insurance Company, on special contract, and added:

"Your friends, whose names are enclosed, have placed this sum there for your benefit, to constitute a fund, under the superrision of Messrs. William Amory, Ignatius Sergeant, and David Sears, Jr. The income will be subject to your order, semi-annually, and when not called for will be added to the principal, to increase the income appropriated to your use.

"This fund has been created freely and cheerfully by your friends, in evidence of their grateful sense of the valuable services you have rendered to your whole country. They have done it without your knowledge or sanction, and with some reason to imagine that their purpose might not be entirely acceptable to you."

Appended to this letter are the names of about forty of the leading merchants of Boston. Mr. Webster, in reply to the letter of Mr. Sears, after stating that he had been already fully compensated for his public services by the cordial greetings and warm friendship of his political and personal friends, says:

"The contribution which you now make known to me must be placed entirely to the account of the friendship and the generosity of yourself and the other gentlemen. Expressions of thanks, however warm and sincere, would in a case like this, be feeble. I must rest, however, in the persuasion that all who have borne a part in this transaction, will believe that it has deeply and profoundly impressed me with the sentiments and the emotions justly belonging to the occasion."

THE FAREWELL.

[The following ballad has been presented to me and its publication requested. Those who make the request are influenced in their desire to see it print not so much by any judgment upoe its intrinsic poetic merits, as the sweet and sacred frame of soul they have experienced in hearing it sung.]

Farewell, farewell, to all below!
My Saviour calls, and I must go;
I launch my boat upon the sea:
This land is not the land for me.

I found the winding path of sin
A ragged path to travel in;
Beyond the chilly waves I see
The land my Saviour bought for me.

Oh, sinners! why will you not go?
There's room enough for you I know;
Our boat is sound, the passage free,
And there's a better land for thee.

No night is there, but all is day;
There God will wipe all tears away;
There saints immortal I shall see:
Oh, that's the land, the land for me!

Farewell, dear friends, I may not stay:
The home I seek is far away;
Where Christ is not I can not be:
This land is not the land for me.

A pilgrim here on earth I roam,
But seeking for a happier home.
Where palms of victory I shall see;
Oh, that's the land, the land for me!

Praise be to God! our hope's on high,
The angels sing, and so will I;
Where seraphs bow and bend the knee,
Oh, that's the land, the land for me!

That land is on the other shore,
Where angels sing forevermore;
My Christian friends, oh, pray for me.
That I that happy land may see!

THE RELATION OF INTELLIGENCE TO THE PIETY AND EFFICIENCY OF THE CHURCH.

Jesus gave, not to the Twelve alone, as they went forth on their first commission, but to the Church in every age, that expressive warning: "Be ye therefore wise as serpents and harmless as doves." It foretold that, to the perfection of her character and the full success of her mission, the Church would require not only the purity of the one, but the wisdom of the other: that neither piety nor intelligence is separately sufficient, and only when combined in their highest excellence can they equal to the task. By intelligence we mean, not a proficiency in any one branch of science, but that general cultivation of intellect which results in wide knowledge and comprehensive views. We know that "the world by wisdom knew not God;" but it was a world without God, a reason without revelation, a demonstration without anxious spirituality discerned. When God imparts the element required, and the world becomes his Church, her wisdom is not foolishness. Sometimes, indeed, it has seemed as though piety alone was power, and wisdom was utter weakness; but we consider that intellectual excellence is often seen apart from moral sincerity, and piety is never alone, for the common experience of life gives every man a measure of mental training and practical wisdom. There is an analogy in the arrangement of the compound blow-pipe. The pure hydrogen of piety may draw, from an ordinary atmosphere, support for a flame of high intensity; but only when fully penetrated by the oxygen of a sound intelligence is its power perfected and irresistible.

The relation of intelligence to the spirituality of the Church, is a subject entirely distinct from its relation to her efficiency in aggressive movements. It is of itself a question which should not be undetermined in any mind, whether mental culture can affect religious experience, either for good or for evil. A priori, indeed, it would seem strange if, in the crowning work of creation, there was no observance of that law by which the perfection of each part requires the perfection of the whole, and if the cultivation of the mental and of the moral faculties should prove incompatible in the image of Him in whom the same attributes co-exist and co-operate in infinite perfection. If beyond the case we hope for the completeness of wisdom as of love, how natural that, even now, the faculties should strengthen in each other's strength. Every voice of prophecy, and all signs of the times, foretoken that in the millennial age, "knowledge shall be increased," and those favored generations be at once the most spiritual and the most intellectual the world has ever seen. And especially, the well-known quickening of the mental powers attendant on spiritual renovation seems like an electric summons from the awakened soul to the faculties whose activity is essential to its life. Yet against all this presumptive evidence we meet the wide impression that intelligence is either negative, or injurious in its influence on personal piety. This impression may have arisen in part upon the fact that formerly, even more than at present, the costliness of education confined the privileges of mental culture to the very class whose position and wealth involved all the seductions which make it hard to enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. That a larger proportion of the poor of this world than of the affluent have become rich in faith, we all may see; but that this has resulted not from intelligence, but from the position, appears in the more gross and absorbing worldliness of the uncultivated family of wealth, compared with those in which intelligence exerts its converting and moralizing power. In any given rank of society, a larger proportion of the intelligent will be found to have embraced the Gospel than of the uneducated, and their piety will prove, on the average, more uniform. It is this false alliance of wealth with intelligence which has brought upon the latter the suspicion which the Saviour attached to the former alone; yet, in the modified social life of our own country, and in proportion as the ancient folly and expense cease to be exclusive forms into which a life of affluence is compelled to flow, instances of deep piety in connection with wealth, as well as intelligence, are becoming more common.

It is important also to observe that the mass of the Church-membership, being of the poorer classes, have always been prone to judge the wealthy by a false standard. The danger of all outward indulgences is that they foster a pride of possession, and absorb and materialize the soul. Yet, it is difficult to form a general rule of judgment upon others which shall be secure. The toiling poor, in whom a very slight attempt towards the elegancies of life may betray a departure from sober frugality or a false ambition, and whose uncultivated minds feel no congeniality in the refinements which stand out barely as the insignia of wealth and rank, can not appreciate the feelings of those to whom the beauties of art have been as familiar from childhood as the wild-flower to the cottager, and with whom the elegancies of life are the unlabored expression of a natural refinement. The ruder classes deem all an evidence of sin which would betray it in themselves, and equipage, and forms and compliments are but the etiquette of pride. They either bluntly deny the existence of piety in such connection, or receive in confusion the occasional evidences of true spirituality which beam out irresistibly. Moreover, there is another ground of misconstruction in the difference of expression in the two extremes of society. The character of the masses is peculiarly emotional, and the expression strong and rough. The whole influence of culture and of polite life is to bring the sensibilities into check by the intellect, to condense emotion into principle, and either to repress its utterance, or to find in accuracy and copiousness of language a full conveyance for that gush of soul which, in the uncultivated, seeks expression in energy of tone and manner, and illustration. The collected thought, the guarded sentence, the delicate reserve, seem tame and heartless to a Christian struggling with unutterable emotion.

If, then, from precisely this class of society, a Church should take its rise, and if the majority of all evangelical Churches have thus arisen, how natural is it that this individual feeling should have become the collective sentiment of the Church at large, that a false criticism on the manifestations of piety should still seek to bring every thing down to its own standard, and that, even while the Church is becoming a personal refutation of the error, she should still confound form with substance, and wealth with intelligence.

If any argument were to be drawn from the numerical proportion of the Church to the world in the ranks of the learned, we should not fear the comparison. We should observe first, however, that the Church has of necessity withdrawn the largest proportion of her genius and erudition from direct secular learning, into the offices and studies of the ministry, and consequently the comparison must not be made from the list of the laity alone. For centuries, indeed, almost the entire learning of Christendom was concentrated in the regular or the secular clergy, and to them is due our gratitude for its preservation and transmission to modern times. If the force of this fact is to be neutralized by the superstition and formality of the middle ages, we may yet maintain that the Protestant Reformation, as being any thing more than a political and formal revolution, was due to the labors of "doctors incomparable" and innumerable on the Continent and in Britain, while the excuses and perversions which most disgraced it were the result of a fanatical ignorance. What beautiful examples of the power of allied learning and piety are the works of the long line of English bishops and non-conformist divines, the body of whose writings is, it is true, a vast and solid structure of theology, but from fact and illustration, and metaphor and allusion, as from battlement, and pinnacle, and spire of some massive cathedral, is reflected the light of every orb of science in antiquity or in their own times. Yet time would fail us to speak of all the illustrious sons of science who gloried most of all that they might "know Him and the power of His resurrection." He whose transcendent mind laid the deep foundations of international law, was no arrogant defier of the King of kings.* He who was the pioneer of modern mental philosophy,† was also the strong asserter of the reasonableness of Christianity against the oppositions of science, falsely so called. The soul of him who disclosed to all admiring ages the laws which bind all globes and systems,‡ was no wandering orb, reckless of a Sun of righteousness and the gravitation of Holy love. And he whose seraphic muse, seeking inspiration from the Eternal Spirit alone, could soar—stands he not now on high, "*un*blinded by the excess of light?" If, in the rapid progress of physical science and archæology, scholars have questioned the truth of revelation, scholars have not been wanting to defend them. On the broad heavens, and upon tablets buried, strata upon strata, deep in the chambers of the earth, God has graven the history of the past and the destinies of the future. God's hand has traced the sacred record in his own hieroglyphics. The "royal priesthood" alone, with the key of an inspired volume, can lay bare the lines so long concealed, and decipher its annals for the Church; patient, if perchance a broken line or isolated sentence perplex, to wait, and read on until all is clear. The profane interpret and perish! Through every field of science and literature the student may now follow those who are no blind leaders of the blind. Even fiction, abused to mere amusement and sensual excitement, has been made to illustrate and enforce the truth of Him who "spake many things unto them in parables." The secret of the whole is simple. Knowledge is power; and God, who, when but little knowledge, survived the wreck of antiquity, took care to concentrate that little in the hands of his Church, has not now, when the spirit of intellectual inquiry is poured out upon all flesh, left her without a thorough and efficient literature for her defence and ally—a literature which, from its abode upon what has been deemed the cold and barren summit of learning, amid all the mysteries which gather there, threatening lightning and earthquake to human interests, comes down, like Moses, with glory beaming from its countenance, and the law of God graven on its heart.

To the conversion of a soul, we acknowledge with joy how little of mental power or theoretical knowledge is requisite; but that self-surrender and reliance on the atonement will suffice for daily pardon and continuous regeneration. We admit, too, that in some rare instances, an unreasoning devotion, like an instinct, fixes its eye on the main truths of the gospel, and goes rapidly forward, unterrified and unseduced from its path. We refer not to these conditions of justification, nor to these few instances, nor to that divine dispensation, which one must have remarked, giving, in accordance with no law apparent to us, a larger measure of grace, or a more powerful impulse heavenward, to some converts than to others equally justified. But we speak of the process and laws by which the spiritual character is matured in classes, and memberships, and communities. Would it be hazardous to say of a young convert, taken at random, that, with his given amount of piety, his progress will probably be as his views? How easily can we refer to some treasured author, whose calm pages gave definiteness and enlargement to our ideas of the Christian scheme, or to a conversation with a friend who saw the error of our thoughts, and whose quiet reasoning removed it, and a new spiritual life burst in upon us. Who would not judge that, with a given amount of piety, a preachers's power to build up the Church into holiness, would be in proportion to his comprehension of the gospel plan in all its relations, and his discrimination of every shade of duty or of sin which so perplexes? There is a power gained in the closet, and a power communicated to the fellow-worshipper as we wrestle in social prayer; but distinct from this increase of sensibility to heavenly things, is that enlargement of the spiritual horizon which gives more sky to shine in upon the soul. The fact is, that with a Christian of sincere heart, the battle is not so much with sin as with error—not so much with the affections as with the ignorance which clouds the mind. He is perpetually suffering from mistakes and devices of Satan, against which he might have been forewarned. To him, spiritual wisdom is spiritual strength.

> "The prayer of Ajax was for light,
> Through all that long and dangerous fight,
> The darkness of that noonday night.
> He asked but the return of sight,
> To see his foeman's face."

The experience of the individual Christian is like that of the collective Church in the past. He begins by Judaizing or Platonizing. He leans to works without faith, or faith without works. His exclusive thoughts banish from the Trinity the Father, or the Son, or the Holy Ghost, by concentration upon one alone. He becomes a Pelagian in his own strength, or too passive an Augustinian in dependence upon grace. He tends to rationalism, in his views of Scripture ordinances and precepts, or to traditionalism in superstitious reverence for human dictates and forms. The impeded progress, the successive re-actions, the one-sided development, so clearly marked in each stage of advancement by the Church, are re-produced in the individual member. But if the Church has thus marked out the true channel of faith and practice, albeit by continued rebounding from the rocks on either side, is it not for our learning? Our whole system of instruction assumes that these theoretical and practical errors may be avoided, and a Christian press forward in the right way, without bruising himself into it by contact with successive errors. Think of a sincere soul serving God amid the mummeries of Romanism, and imagining the light and power which a few words of exposition would pour in upon it. Think how, even among the evangelical denominations of our own land, you can mark the theory giving a peculiar tone to the equal piety of each section, and in proportion as their views are more or less comprehensive in regard to one class of truths or another, they are successful in gathering in true converts, or building them up into a living faith. Consider how far a few generations, mentally capable of apprehending clear instruction and favored with superior teachers, might prepare the way for that day, when, trained to a clear vision of heavenly truths, and with little in example to mislead, the child in Christ shall die a hundred years old in spiritual life. With such lessons from the past and the present, is it wrong to aver, that while the conditions of justification are simple, and while some anomalies in spiritual growth do occur, yet, as a prevailing rule, the maturity of a Christian Church under a pious ministry will be in proportion to the clear exhibition and comprehension of intellectual views? is it too much to say that we require that breadth and grasp of thought which proceeds only from mental culture!

Moreover, in personal experience every thing depends upon a true conception of our position at the moment of danger, and the prompt recurrence of the corresponding truths. It is easy for a bystander to remember such ideas and repeat such truths as are pertinent; but it is difficult to give caution, or administer rebuke, or bring solace to our selves, just when we need them most. Now the characteristic of the uncultivated is a natural want of this collectedness and self-inspection, and too often the thoughts which should have shielded against temptation come only in time for condemnation. A friend at such an hour is invaluable. But it is peculiarly the privilege of the cultivated mind to counsellor unto itself, to anticipate the shock, to lay hold upon the lever which "backs" the moral machinery of the soul, and stems the too hurried current by an internal force. So do we believe it will appear that, other things being equal, a sound intelligence is not only most capable of receiving comprehensive views, but is more competent to apply them opportunely in the exigencies of life. Lines suggested on hearing of the death of Miss MATTY DUNCAN, daughter of Rev. D. Duncan, of the Alabama Conference.

Why, oh Death! hast thou bereft us?
Why, the lov'd one torn away?
Why, in weeds of sorrow left us,
To distress and grief a prey?
Earth's loveliest treasure thou hast taken,
Forced it from our bleeding hearts:
We now from sleep to grief awaken,

Pierced with sorrow's keenest darts.
Now her brilliant eye is sightless,
Now her voice is heard no more;
Earth has now to us no brightness;
Rest our hopes on Canaan's shore.
Cease, our hearts, cease thus complaining
Know that God's own will is best:
Matty's now in Heaven reigning,
Entered into glorious rest.

Now she lives in endless glory.
Free from sickness, care and pain:
Now she tells the pleasing story,
That to die in Christ is gain.
There we'll meet thee, dearest treasure,
In that land of endless rest;
There we'll range the fields of pleasure,
Through our gracious Saviour blest.

THE DYING CHRISTIAN MAKING HIS WILL.

Mr. Editor: Looking over my portfolio, I find the following article, which I translated some years ago from the "Christian Apologist," a German Methodist paper, published in Cincinnati. If you think it will interest any of your readers, it is at your service:

Henry Muller, Professor of Theology at Rostock, Mecklenburg, who died in 1675, was one of the most eminent champions of evangelical Christianity, of his day. His writings are even to this day read by many of the good Christians of Germany. What were his own prospects for the future, he shows us in the following delightful strain, taken from his "Hours of Repose:

"Set thy house in order, for thou shalt die."

Thank God, I am ready; my Will is made. My Father who art in heaven, and who hast created me, to Thee I bequeath my soul. Thou hast given it unto me; I give it back unto Thee. In thy hands alone it is safe. Nor can I dispose of what is not my own. With my Saviour do I pray: "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." My Brother Jesus, who hast redeemed me, to Thee I bequeath my sins. O, take them upon thee! Thou Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world. Cast them into the depth of thy wounds, that they may be remembered no more against me forever. Holy Spirit, consolation of my heart, who hast so often refreshed me with heavenly food, to Thee I bequeath my last sparks of life. When I can speak no more, be Thou my advocate before God with groanings, which cannot be uttered. When I can hear no longer, speak thou consolation to my heart; whom my eyes fail to see, lighten them with heavenly light. Ye angels, who have borne me on your hands, to you I give my tears, which I daily shed over my sins. Refresh yourselves therewith. I know well that you laugh when I weep, and that there is joy in heaven over one sinner who repenteth. Devil, wilt thou too have something? I will not pass you over. you may have all the good works, which were not done from a good heart; and much good may they do you.

Earth, thou art my mother, and hast been the instrument, in the hand of God, of providing for the wants of my body for many years—to thee do I bequeath that same body. Naked I came from my mother's womb: naked I shall return again. There shall be no pomp at my funeral. Wife, I will choose thee a husband: His name is Judge of Wisdom. If justice is not done thee on earth, remain but faithful to him, and he will do thee right. He will provide for thee in want, protect thee from oppression and comfort thee in distress. He despiseth not the orphan's prayer nor the widow's complaint. Dear children, I choose you a better father than you had in me: even Him who is the only Father of all. He who provideth for the young raven, will not exclude you from His providence. But hearken, my children, unto your father. Love the Lord in truth, and remain faithful unto Him. Fulfil His commandments, that you may fear God at all times, and trust in Him with all your heart—and it will be well with you on earth. You, my friends—to you I leave a gracious God. He is the best of all friends. Do not turn away from Him, and He will not forsake you.

My flock, you shall have my constant remembrance in heaven. Though you may forget me and mine, I shall not forget you. Ye poor—to you I leave a rich God. More I do not possess. But, you will say, where is your gold and silver? Know then, that gold and silver I have not, and it were a shame if I had. What a steward of the Lord lays up, belongs to the poor. I have, however, laid up treasures in heaven, which God will distribute in due time.

This is my last will; and now I am ready to close mine eyes whenever it shall please God to call me home.

Dear reader, would it not be well if we all could leave such a will? But in order to die righteously, one must have lived so. This simple truth is not believed by three-fourths of mankind.

UNPUBLISHED LETTER FROM JOHN RANDOLPH OF ROANOKE.

We have much pleasure in laying before our readers the following letter from the celebrated orator and statesman, John Randolph, of Roanoke. The letter of the Rev. Mr. Tustin explains the circumstances under which Mr. Randolph's letter was written. [Washington Union.

WASHINGTON CITY, Dec. 14, 1852.

To the Editor of the Union:

DEAR SIR: Not satisfied to partake alone of the mingled emotions of pleasure and sadness, which have been awakened in reading the following letter from the brilliant and eccentric orator of Roanoke, I send it to you for publication, that the readers of the Union and the public generally, may share in the sorrowful gratification which I have experienced in its perusal. It proves beyond question, that, whilst from disease and other causes, Mr. Randolph exhibited, on some occasions, an irascible and peevish disposition, his heart was, nevertheless, the depository of some of the finest and noblest feelings of which our fallen nature is capable. I do not accord fully with all the sentiments he has here expressed, but in its general tenor and spirit, the letter has my most hearty approbation. It is a beautiful specimen of fraternal sympathy and affection, expressed in terms of tenderness and propriety which I have never seen excelled. It was written to his half-brother, the Hon. Henry St. George Tucker, on the occasion of the demise of his eldest son, a youth of singular promise, possessing largely the personal and intellectual attractions of his accomplished father. It is proper to remark that the letter was found among the private papers of the distinguished gentleman to whom it was addressed, by his son, John Randolph Tucker, of Virginia. Having been long associated with the family of Judge Tucker in terms of intimate friendship, I have obtained permission from Mr. Beverly Tucker, of this city, to dispose of the communication as my judgment and sense of propriety might dictate. I, therefore, send it to you for publication, and bespeak for it especially the attention of those who, in the days of other years, were associated with its distinguished author in the relations of personal and political friendship.

Very respectfully,
Your friend and ob't serv't,
SEPTIMUS TUSTIN.

THE LETTER.

May He who has the power, and always the will, when earnestly, humbly, and devotedly entreated, support and comfort you, my brother. I shall not point to the treasures that remain to you in your surviving children, and their mother, dearer than all of these put together. No; I have felt too deeply how little power have words that play round the head to reach the heart, when it is sorely wounded. The commonplaces of consolation are at the tongues' ends of all the self-complacent and satisfied, from the pedant priest to the washer-woman. (They who don't feel can talk.) I abjure them all. The father of Lord Russell, when condoled with according to form, by the book, replied: "I would not give my dead son for any other man's living!" May this thought come home to your bosom, too; but not on the same occasion. May the spirit of God, which is not the chimera of heated brains, nor a device of artful men to frighten and cajole the credulous, but is as much an existence that can be felt and understood as the whisperings of your own heart or the love you bore to him that you have lost—may that Spirit, which is the comforter, shed His influence upon your soul, and incline your heart and understanding to the only right way, which is that of life eternal! Did you ever read Bishop Butler's Analogy! If not, I will send it to you. Have you read THE BOOK? What I say upon this subject, I not only believe, but I know to be true—that the Bible, studied with an humble and contrite heart, never yet failed to do its work, even with those who, from idiosyncracy or disordered minds, have conceived that they were cut off from its promises of a life to come.

"Ask, and ye shall receive; seek and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." This was my only support and stay during years of misery and darkness; and just as I had almost begun to despair, after more than ten years of penitence and prayer, it pleased God to enable me to see the truth, to which, until then, my eyes had been sealed. To this vouchsafement I have made the most ungrateful returns. But I would not give up my slender portion of the price paid for our redemption—yes, brother, our redemption—the ransom of sinners—of all who do not hug their chains and refuse to come out from the house of bondage—I say that I would not exchange my little portion in the Son of David, for the power and glory of the Parthian or Roman empires, as described by Milton in the temptation of our Lord and Saviour—not for all with which the enemy tempted the Saviour of man.

This is the secret of the change of my spirits, which all who know me must have observed within a few years past. After years spent in humble and contrite entreaty that the tremendous sacrifice on Mount Calvary might not have been made in vain for me, the chiefest of sinners, it pleased God to speak his peace into my heart—that peace of God which passeth all understanding to them that know it not, and even to them that do. And although I have now, as then, to reproach myself with time misspent and faculties misemployed; although my condition has, on more than one occasion, resembled that of him who, having one evil spirit cast out, was taken possession of by seven other spirits more wicked than the first, and the first also; yet I trust that they, too, by the power and mercy of God, may be, if they are not, vanquished.

But where am I running to! On this subject, more hereafter. Meanwhile, assure yourself of what is of small value compared with that of those who are a piece of yourself—of the unchanged regard and sympathy of your mother's son. Ah! my God! I remember to have seen her die, to have followed her to the grave, to have wondered that the sun continued to rise and set, and the order of Nature to go on. Ignorant of true religion, but not yet an atheist, I remember with horror my impious expostulations with God upon this bereavement—"but not yet an atheist." The existence of atheism has been denied; but I was an honest one. Hume began and Hobbes finished me. I read Spinoza and all the tribe. Surely I fell by an ignoble hand. And the very man (——) who gave me Hume's "Essay upon Human Nature" to read, administered "Beattie upon Truth" as the antidote—Venice treacle against arsenic and the essential oil of bitter almonds—a bread and milk poultice for the bite of the cobra capello.

Had I remained a successful political leader, I might never have been a Christian. But it pleased God that my pride should be mortified; that by death and desertion I should lose my friends; that, except in the veins of a maniac, and he, too, possessed "of a child by a deaf and dumb spirit," there should not run one drop of my father's blood in any living creature besides myself. The death of Tudor finished my humiliation. I had tried all things but the refuge to Christ, and to that, with parental stripes, was I driven. Oft did I cry out with the father of that wretched boy, "Lord! I believe—help thou my unbelief;" and the gracious mercy of our Lord to this wavering faith, staggering under the force of the hard heart of unbelief, I humbly hoped would, in his good time, be extended to me also.—St. Mark, vii. 17-23.

Throw Revelation aside, and I can drive any man by irresistible induction to atheism. John Marshall could not resist me. When I say any man, I mean a man capable of logical and consequential reasoning. Deism is the refuge of those who startle at atheism, and can't believe Revelation; and my ——, (may God have forgiven us both,) and myself used, with Diderot & Co., to laugh at the deistical bigots who must have milk, not being able to digest meat. All theism is derived from Revelation—the laws confessedly. Our own is from the same source—so is the false revelation of Muhomet; and I can't much blame the Turks for considering the Franks and Greeks to be idolaters. Every other idea of one God that floats in the world is derived from the tradition of the sons of Noah handed down to their posterity.

But enough—and more than enough—I can scarcely guide my pen. I will, however, add that no luke-warm seeker ever became a real Christian; for, "from the days of John the Baptist until now, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force"—a text which I read five hundred times before I had the slightest conception of its true application.

HOLY LIFE.—The beauty of a holy life constitutes the most eloquent and effective persuasive to religion which one human being can address to another. We have many ways of doing good to our fellow creatures; but none so efficacious as leading a virtuous, upright and well-ordered life. There is an energy of moral suasion in a good man's life, passing the highest efforts of the orator's genius. The seen but silent beauty of holiness speaks more eloquently of God and duty than the tongues of men and angels. Let parents remember this. The best inheritance a parent can bequeath to a child is a virtuous example, a legacy of hallowed remembrances and associations. The beauty of holiness beaming through the life of a loved relative or friend is more effectual to strengthen such as do stand in virtue's ways, and raise up those that are bowed down, than precept, command, entreaty or warning. Christianity itself, I believe, owes by far the greater part of its moral power, not to the precepts or parables of Christ, but to his own character. The beauty of that holiness which is enshrined in the four brief biographies of the Man of Nazereth has done more, and will do more to regenerate the world and bring it to an everlasting righteousness, than all other agencies put together. It has done more to spread his religion in the world than all that has ever been preached or written on the evidences of Christianity. [Dr. Chalmers.

THOUGHTS OF HEAVEN.—If Heaven doth not enter into us by way of holiness, we shall never enter into Heaven by way of happiness. If you would lay up a treasure of glory in Heaven, lay up a treasure of grace in your hearts. If your souls are rich in grace, they will be rich in glory. The more you do for God in this world, the more God will do for you in the world to come. As Heaven is kept for the saints of Christ, so they are kept for Heaven by the Spirit. In Heaven all God's servants will be abundantly satisfied with His dealings and dispensations with them; and see how all conduced, like so many winds, to bring them to their haven; and how even the roughest blasts helped to bring them homeward. How can we expect to live with God in Heaven, if we love not to live with him on earth? If thou lovest to worship God here below, God will take thee up to worship him above. Thou shalt change thy place, but not thy employment. Heaven is a day without a cloud to darken it. We would be seated in the heavenly Canaan, but are loth to be scratched with the briars and thorns of the wilderness. In Heaven there is the presence of all good and the absence of all evil. Grace and glory differ but as the bud and blossom. What is grace but glory begun? What is glory but grace perfected? We may hope for a place in Heaven. If there will be any grief in Heaven, sure it will be for this, that we have done no more for God on earth. [Mason.

MAMMON.

MR. EDITOR: I have been so much interested in the perusal of a prize essay upon the subject of "Mammon," by the Rev. John Harris, that I have thought I would recommend it through your paper to the patrons thereof.

Those who have not done so, will, doubtless, from its perusal feel amply compensated. Indeed, the subject matter treated of has so important a connection with Religion, that all persons desirous of knowing their Christian duty, growing out of the proper use of property and money, should, by all means, avail themselves of a perusal of a copy. It is a small book, costing only fifty cents; and of

I should be pleased to see our Book Agent take this, or some similar work, in hand, and let it go to all the country. Our preachers might to bring the subject more frequently before their congregations in their sermons, and our editors in their newspapers. I do not this curiously, but because I believe we need, as an age of Christian people, "line upon line, and precept upon precept," upon this subject. There is a growing tendency to extravagance, needless self-indulgence and luxury, which is to be deprecated by Christians and exceedingly detrimental to Religion.

I am aware that this is an unpopular subject, but that is not the question. What does the Bible say of the subject? Whether we advert to the losses and sufferings of Lot, the stoning of Achan, the leprosy of Gehazi, or the fate of Judas, the secret of their punishment is explained, when the Almighty declares: "For the iniquity of his covetousness was I wroth, and smote him." Indeed, the magnitude of ingratitude and sin, growing out of the improper use and appropriation of the things of this life, which God has been pleased to entrust to us as his stewards, is alarming, when we come to view it through out its bearings, as brought to view by the author referred to.

You have doubtless read the work mentioned. I incline, however, to the opinion that, should you review it, we should be very certain to have some practical and able editorials to appear upon the subject in your valuable paper.

PAIGE WILLIAMS.

Mobile, December 27, 1852.

THE GREAT NATIONAL SOLVENT AND ASSIMILATOR.—We need the Bible in this country for a specific purpose. There may be wheels within wheels, but there can not be nations within nations. We can not have a France and a Germany, and an Italy and an Ireland, in these United States. And yet, if the tide of emigration to this country continues to flow in upon us, how long will it be before we have French, German, Italian and Irish nations among us? How shall we denationalize them, and assimilate them together in sentiment, in taste, and in life? What agency can effect this most essential but difficult result? Can education do it? Can patriotism do it? Can our political institutions do it? No, verily. These agencies have no such potency. Yet we do not despair. There is a Divine solvent that can so dissolve them, that, like kindred drops, they will "mingle into one." That power is the Holy Bible. If we can bring all these hearts and minds under the transforming power of Divine Truth, we shall inspire them with a common sentiment, a common sympathy, and a common life. Then they will think, and speak, and live alike; then will they constitute a brotherhood, a Christian fraternity, united by ties as tender and indissoluble as the cementing love of Christ can make them; then shall our country be safe, then shall our liberty, our virtue, and our religion be preserved and perpetuated. [Bishop Janes.

HOSPITALITY.—Emerson, under cover of his affectations of style, says many good things. Here is one of them: "I pray you, oh excellent wife, number not your yourself and run to get a rich dinner for this man or woman who has alighted at our gates; nor a bed-chamber made at too great a cost; these things, if they are curious in them, they can get for a few shillings in any village; but rather let the stranger see, if he will, in your looks, accent, and behavior, your heart, and earnestness, your thought and will, which he can not buy at any price in any city, and which he may well travel twenty miles, and dine sparely, and sleep hardly, to behold. Let not the emphasis of hospitality lie in bed and board; but let truth, and love, and honor, and courtesy, flow in all thy deeds."

THE ROCKS OF CALVARY.—In Fleming's Christology it is stated, that an unbeliever visiting the sacred places of Palestine, was shown the clefts of Mount Calvary. Examining them narrowly and critically, he turned in amazement to his fellow-travelers and said, "I have long been a student of nature, and I am sure the clefts and rents in this rock were never done by nature, or any ordinary earthquake; for, by such a concussion, the rock must have split according to the veins, and where it was weakest in the adhesion of parts. For this," he said, "I have observed to have been done in other rocks when separated or broken after an earthquake, and reason tells me it must always be so. But it is quite otherwise here; for the rocks are split athwart and across the veins in a most strange and preternatural manner; and therefore," he said, "I thank God that I came hither to see the standing monument of the miraculous power, by which God gives evidence to this day of the divinity of Christ."

"Be slow to speak, but swift to hear" is good advice, and from the highest authority. "A fool uttereth all his mind," say Solomon. But if some persons know a circumstance that will bear against the reputation of the house of another, like a boy with a [illegible] in his pocket, it burns so that they can not rest till they have got rid of it to [illegible] person.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, January 8.

CONFERENCE CORRESPONDENCE.

BATON ROUGE, Jan. 6, 1853.

The Louisiana Annual Conference met, in its seventh session, on yesterday. The Conference were nearly all present. Bishop Andrews, who arrived the night before, opened the session with the usual services. This Conference will soon despatch its business, for it is small.

We were pleased to greet the two transfers that have come to our aid and help in evangelizing this portion of the Valley of the Mississippi. Rev. Mr. Ivey is a young man from the Louisville Conference. Though young, he has already seen pretty good service. His looks speak well for him and also his works. He has just come on from Jackson, Miss., where a revival has been in progress since the sitting of the Mississippi Conference, and some fifty or sixty souls have professed religion, and nearly the same number joined the church. Rev. Mr. Finn, from the Arkansas Conference, is his place promptly, and comes highly recommended.

But, as an offset to these gains, we lose our excellent Bro. Thweatt, who goes into the South-western Bible Agency. The Bible Society has chosen its agent well. A good cause ought to have a good advocate. Bro. Thweatt is not lost to the Church, though he be to the Conference. Nay, not altogether lost to the Conference, for he will pass among us often, stirring up our minds to remember Bible duties.

With regret be it said that we have few, very few admissions on trial, into itinerancy; not more than two or three—if that many! Where is the wrong? Is it that the people of God restrain prayer, and therefore the Lord of the harvest does not send forth more laborers. Bishop Andrews made forcible and solemn remarks on this subject and we hope, with preachers and people, there will be amendment and consequently an increase here.

None of the preachers have died during the year, and so far I hear of but one location. They are reporting the year's work now. In many portion of the field it has been a year of prosperity. H. N. M.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE LIFE, CHARACTER, AND ACTS OF JOHN THE BAPTIST, and the Relation of his Ministry to the Christian Dispensation. By Rev. W. A. Duncan, M. A., Professor of Greek and Latin Literature in Louisiana University. New York, Cornish, Lambert & Co.—1853.

This title and description of a book will strike every student of the New Testament, and he will say "It is just the thing I want" Whether all his wants will be met in perusing the clearly printed pages of the neat and well executed 12mo, pp. 261, will depend much upon the nature of them; but, he can not fail to be interested and instructed by it. It is the first book, devoted exclusively to the treatment of the life and ministry of John the Baptist, which has ever appeared in the English language. The treatise of Von Rhoden (Johannes der Teufer) is the basis of it. Prof. Duncan has translated and presented the whole of that highly commended treatise in the present volume. To this has been added much additional matter, original and carefully elaborated from various sources.

Prof. Duncan is a Baptist and a scholar. His sect interferes as little with his argument as any one could ask—perhaps not at all. He fills up many a hiatus in the Gospel history of John, and with much ingenuity and fairness of inference bridges over difficulties of time and place; thus connecting the slight and scattered hints of the Evangelists, and making out a biography of the Preacher in the Wilderness, much more complete and satisfactory than those who have not read this book might suppose possible.

The book fills its own place in English religious literature; a place heretofore unfilled. This fact considered, together with the literary merit of the work, its thorough criticism and research, and the excellent Christian spirit of its discussion, we are not surprised at the the very extensive sale it has already met with.

We present to the reader some of the leading topic discussed: Condition of the Jewish people at the time of John's birth; Prophecies concerning him; His development and preparation for his ministry; His ministry before Christ's public appearance; After; Relation of the Baptism of John to that of Christ's disciples and to Christian Baptism; John's imprisonment: His doubts in prison; His death; Importance of this man for the development of the kingdom of God.

The book can be had of H. D. McGinnis, or any of the city bookstores.

STRICTURES ON DR. HOWELL'S "EVILS OF INFANT BAPTISM." By T. O. Summers, D. D.—1853.

Dr. Early has issued this appendix to Dr. Summers' book on Baptism, in a separate form. Dr. Howell's "Evils" have gained considerable currency by the several editions of that work, set forth by the Baptist Publication Society, and we are glad to find our own Book Agent wide awake and after them with a—not sharp stick—but a complete knock-down argument.

THE CHRISTIAN'S CLOSET COMPANION, or Sacred Meditations for Every Day in the Year. By Rev. J. Pugh.—1852. Louisville, Ky.; 12mo., pp. 326.

The publication supposes that Christians will obey the Divine injustion—"Enter into thy closet." It is composed of judicious selections from many of the wisest and holiest men that have ever blest the Church, and may well be styled GATHERED TREASURES for all who desire to be rich in faith and heirs of the Kingdom of God.

THE MISCELLANY AND REVIEW.—We owe an apology to Dr. Ebbert, editor, for having delayed a very favorable announcement of this new Monthly. The first number of fifty-six pages, dating January 1853, is well got up. We place it on our exchange list with pleasure. It is published at Memphis, Tenn., and St. Louis, Mo., simultaneously. Price, two dollars.

SOUTHERN METHODIST PULPIT.—The last number of the fifth volume—and last of the Pulpit! We write it with a pang. Prof. Deems makes a capital valedictory. It has made him and itself many friends, and exposed an editorial talent that the Church will not suffer to be idle long. The present number contains three sermons—the first by Dr. Mitchell, of Alabama; the second by Rev. J. Hinton, of Georgia; and the third by Rev. O. Fisher, of Texas. Having just received the Pulpit, we have not enjoyed the pleasure of reading them.

To those subscribers who are in advance, the editor sends the following notice:

"A number of our friends have paid in advance for the next volume, and some beyond. We have kept a strict account of these payments, and as soon as the mailing of the present number shall have been finished, they shall hear from us. They need not trouble themselves to write. We shall be punctiliously exact in these cases, as we have learned from our editorial experience to have profound reverence for the man who has the virtue of punctuality in regard to his periodicals, that virtue being much more scarce than common honesty."

METHODIST QUARTERLY REVIEW.—An excellent likeness of the late Bishop Hedding greets one upon openiug the January number, 1853. The first article is a biographical sketch of him by Dr. Clark, of Cincinnati. The editor's notices are, as usual, of great value and interest.

CORRECTION.—In printing, on last Saturday, the presence of several visiting ministers in the city, a comma fell in the wrong place. A comma is a small matter, but in this case it sent Drs. Parsons and Stevenson to California along with Rev. Mr. Bristow. We hope their friends in the old States, and especially their families, will not be alarmed on reading that hastily penned news item, lest they should see their faces no more. The last named left this port on Thursday evening on the steamer Pampero, by the way of Nicaragua, and is now sure enough en route for California. The other two preached most ably on last Sabbath to large congregations in the Methodist churches of this city, and are now in attendance at the Louisiana Conference.

Having made amends to the two Rev. Doctors for transferring them without their consent to a distant portion of the work, we now make the same to Rev. Mr. Bristow. He says we styled him "Mister" only, when in fact he was a Doctor before either of the other two. We stand corrected.

ZEAL.

I penned and printed a few thoughts on zeal some two or three issues ago. In that article I confined myself mainly to a brief notice of the perversions and abuses of zeal. Let us now consider its more useful and commendable aspects. Zeal in religion holds the same relation that the heart does in the animal economy. No matter how perfect the organization in all other respects, without a living, beating heart, there is, there can be no life, no motion. Or, to change the figure slightly, it is the main-spring of the moral man; without the main-spring it is in vain that the watch is made of virgin gold and set with diamonds, it keeps no time, and is of no practical value. So, religiously, no matter how sound our theology, how correct our thinking, without the motive, propelling power of zeal, there can be no activity, no usefulness.

But, zeal implies more than a mere heat and partisan feeling in favor of any principle or enterprize; but a deep and abiding conviction of right and duty, that will bear us up, and urge us forward under the most discouraging circumstances. It is not, as some imagine, an explosive, eruptive principls that exhausts itself in a few fiery impulses, and then subsides, ceases to be active. Far from it; but rather like the sun pouring forth age after age a flood of life and genial life-giving warmth. As a river fed by a multitude of unfailing springs, through weary leagues and meandering ways, steadily rolls its waters to the far off ocean. So the zeal of principle, of conviction of duty, steadily urges us on to the consummation of our holy purpose.

Zeal is taught us in Holy writ: "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do with all thy might;" "Give diligence to make your calling and election sure;" "And let us run with with patience the race set before us;" "Earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints." But zeal is not only thus positively enjoined upon us by these and similar texts; but the want of zeal is most severely condemned: "Wo to them that are at ease in Zion." By a remarkably expressive figure God declares his utter detestation, loathing, and disgust for those who are devoid of zeal: "So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth."

But imperatively necessary as zeal is to living, active Christianity; positively as it is commanded, and severely as its non-existence and exercise is condemned; a want of steady, uniform zeal that is "not weary in well-doing," is one of greatest faults of professed Christians.

Many seem to have little or no zeal that results from principle and solemn conviction of duty, but are only zealous under extraordinary impulses. A great revival will make them sing, and pray, and talk, and work for God. A flaming missionary speech will warm their hearts and relax their purses. But, without these stirring appliances, you had as well expect flowers on an iceberg as works of faith and labors of love from them. In the great system of spiritual warfare in which the Church is marching to the conquest of the world, this impulsive class may be regarded rather as volunteers, who in the spirit of adventure have enlisted for a season, than regulars who have enlisted for the war, and who will only cease to be soldiers when they cease to live. The Church much needs that oneness, that singleness of purpose, which led the great Apostle to say: "This one thing I do, I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, my Lord;" and the ministry much needs that Heavenly unction which led him to say: "Neither count I my life dear unto myself." And, "Wo is me if I preach not the Gospel."

The want of this Apostolic sort of zeal much retards the triumph of the Gospel—the conquest of the world. And yet, if the coldest Christian who may read this brief article, the one who prays the fewest times, who reads least of God's word, and thinks most seldom of Heaven in a whole month, will call up the past; he will remember he was once zealous for God; he searched the Scriptures, and daily called on God in prayer; he was glad when it was said, let us go up to the house of the Lord, and said: "I am a companion of all them that fear thee." Ye did run well who did hinder!

How solemn, how urgent, how glorious are the considerations which should prompt us to zeal. For us angels have oft come flying from above; for us the sun stood still; for us the Son of God has come down and bled. A crown immortal, a house eternal in the Heavens, all conspire as with the breath of God to kindle our zeal to a glowing flame. The moral and immortal wants of perishing millions in every zone that belts the globe, and every green isle that dots the deep demands of us the most fervent zeal.

In literature, in commerce, and in every department of human effort, this is an age of searching inquiry and stirring activity. The Valley of Dry Bones is all in motion, and instinct with life, and the waters of all the world are stirred. Shall we, shall any of us, like Jonah, be asleep, while every man is crying unto God? No; let every soldier of the Cross awake and, like the bands of Israel, gird on our swords and cry as we rush to the glorious strife: "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon!" And we shall surely realize that the Lord is in our midst, and that His glory brings up the rear. J. B. WALKER.

To the Members of the Clinton Circuit, Mississippt Conference.

MY BELOVED BRETHREN: There was always something most painful in taking my leave of brethren with whom I had labored, and to whom I had held the pastoral relation. Those feelings are doubly afflictive on taking my leave of you. Since 1826 I have been in the ministry. Most of that time have I sustained the pastoral relation, and been engaged in the active duties of the ministry. I very much regret that there ever was a parenthesis. Many and sore have been the trials consequent upon dissolving such relations; but this is, in several respects, the severest trial that I have been called to endure in all the history of my ministry.

When I entered upon the duties of pastor among you in 1849, in more respects than one it was an experiment; and therefore the engagement was undertaken with misgiving as to the result. I, however, entered the field of duty and labored with a firm reliance on God, and have—with the exception of 1850—been your pastor ever since. My work and labor with you is now finished; and the appointment of the Conference removes me from a people with whom I would willingly have labored the remainder of my life, and with whom I would be buried.

Rest assured, my beloved brethren, that however time may do its effacing work, your kindness, your forbearance, your tender brotherly love, will never be erased, or their greenness fade from my memory. Let my lot or circumstances be in the future what they may, until my right hand forgets its cunning, my heart knows no impulse of friendship, retains no sense of gratitude, can I cease to gratefully remember, cease to love, cease to pray for my dear, dear brethren on Clinton Circuit.

In taking my leave of you, I wish to invest the parting circumstances with considerations that will glorify God, and be of spiritual advantage to us.

TO THE OFFICIAL BRETHREN, I wish to say, in all sincerity, that I feel in taking my leave of you, that I am parting with my brothers in Christ, with fellow-laborers and fellow-soldiers in the struggle for the triumph of the cross. Shoulder to shoulder we have stood, and through the fearful struggle we have been as the heart of one man—and in the strength of Jesus we have conquered. Let me remind you, dear brethren, that the victory is not complete. "There remains much land to possess." I trust in God that you will view all the ground with the eye of a conquerer, and acquit yourselves like valiant men! Let God's name resolve on great things. Give no peace to the enemy. You will have one to lead you every way worthy of your confidence, your love, and your heartiest co-operation. Then study and do your duty. Strive for the fullest possession of all the land; nor think your work done while there remains a single post to be taken. May God keep you good and true men—men who will study and practice all the duties of a Christian—of a Methodist!

TO THE MEMBERSHIP, I would give as my last admonition, BE METHODIST. Yes, in all respects, great and small, be Methodist! It is no longer an unsolved problem—"What is the best manifestation of Christianity?" Nothing has blessed the world since the Apostolic age, so much, and so permanently, as our beloved Methodism. No system of doctrine or usage has so unfettered mind, so liberalized the heart and feelings, so told upon the destiny of the Church and the world, no "spread Scriptural holiness over" and through the world, as our Scriptural, Heaven-favored Methodism. Its praise is on earth and in Heaven. Millions sing the praise of the Highest on their journey to their home in the glory land. Millions more now strike their harps on the coast of the blessed and saved, that such a system of doctrine and usages were ever developed, as is the ever-working, all-enduring system that Dr. Chalmers called "Christianity in earnest." Then, my brethren, study that noble, soul-saving system. Be familiar with all its parts—understand it. Then you will love and admire it.

Many will say to you, Lo! here is Christ in the succession. Others will say, Lo! there is Christ in our immmersion. Doubtless many will try to seduce you from the simplicity of the gospel by mere external ceremony, and seek to make merchandise of you, by the same reasonings, and for the same motives, that the Jews sought to disturb the peace and spirituality of the Gentile church, in the Apostolic age. When you are thus assailed, proselyter to go with you to a spiritual class-meeting; or that he spend a season with you in solemn closet devotions; or go into a real close work of heart examination—and let the questions bring out all his heart feels; and mark it—he will never try you a second time. Ten chances to one, if under such propositions, he does not be as was the man at the marriage without a wedding garment—speechless. Never have I known a proselyter in my life, who delighted in any element of pure Christianity. To get numbers, by drawing away unstable souls, and "creeping into houses, and leading captive silly women, seems to be their special work. Contrary to St. Paul's avowed habit, proselyters delight "to enter into the labors of other men," and to draw away the weak, and beguile unstable souls after them. Let me beg you to look upon all such "as the enemies to the cross of Christ." Such seek not the peace but the disturbance of Zion. They encompass much to make all proselyte; but alas! such proselytes never after show the fruits of moral improvement—too often they present a sad commentary on our Saviour's words, Matt. 23:15, Beware of, and count him as an enemy, who would seek to draw you away by seducing words, from the simplicity of the Gospel.

TO THE JUNIOR MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH, those who are "babes in Christ," I would admonish you as a father. "If I am not an apostle to others, doubtless I am unto you; for as a seal of mine apostleship, are ye in the Lord." For you I have a regard as no other man on earth can have. You are bound up in my heart with the tenderest associations! God of all grace bless you! Let me beg you by the mercies of the Lord Jesus, that you glory in nothing save the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. Let me beg you to make the Bible your chief book. Read every day—study it! Study it as the chart of life. You never can be a strong Christian, with a superficial knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. Never forget that "faith cometh by hearing," rather knowing "the word of God." That we must know truth to believe it. Then read, study, understand the Bible, and you will be "strong in faith giving glory to God.

Study and familiarize yourself with the doctrine and usages of the Church of your choice. Study and practice her usages. Let your mark of knowledge and Christian experience be high, and by grace struggle up to it. You will always find that in all these matters, "as your faith is so it will be done unto thee."

Finally, brethren, let me beg you to co-operate with the dear brother who succeeds me in the pastoral relation. I have known him from his childhood. Most cordially do I commend him to your confidence, your affection and your prayers. He will fully supply my lack of service. I doubt not that he will ever be with you "in the fullness of the gospel of grace. Sustain him. Be punctual in all things: to your class and prayer meetings—to every means of grace. In all things "be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord," and you will assuredly realize that "your labor shall not be in vain in the Lord." O. L. NASH.

[From a speech before the N. Y. Bible Society.]

THE BIBLE THE DREAD OF POPERY.

Rev. Dr. Murray, of Elizabethtown, holding up the Bible, said: This is a wonderful book—the Book—the book of all books. When God first revealed himself to man, he was, in all respects, what God would have him to be. But after he sinned the knowledge of God gradually fell out of his mind, and he relapsed into idolatry. And when God revealed himself again, and his will was written upon pachment, after a while the parchment was lost, and the people turned again to idols. So, when God revealed himself in the Gospel, while that impuse continued, which accompanied the giving of the Word, mankind received it, and were converted, civilized and elevated by it. But gradually they declined, the Bible was lost sight of, concealed only in in the cellar of the monk; mankind fell back for ages to a state of barbarism and idolatry. But, after a while, the Bible was found in the cellar of the monk, and again it went forth to accomplish its work in reforming, civilizing and elevating mankind. It broke the darkness of centuries, and to that Book we are indebted for all the civilization and elevation we enjoy.

He believed the Pope of Rome would rather have a hundred guns of France turnd against the Vatican than to have a hundred Bibles sent to Rome. There was nothing so much hated in some quarters as the Bible. It was so in some parts of Ireland. When he was there recently he was told that the daughters of the sheriff of the county where he was visiting persuaded their futher to build a school-house inside the garden walls, and the young ladies went out and gathered in the children and taught them. The priests came round and found here and there a tract, and inquired "What does this mean?" They were told that the children got them at the sheriff's. The priest said, "I'll see to that;" and he went to the school-house, with whip in hand, and whipped the boys and girls all out of school!

On another occasion he preached to a great company of barefooted men and women, who had come many miles in the rain, all Roman Catholics. He saw a woman standing at a distance harefooted, and a lady told him that she had sent her son to school, and while attending he was taken sick. The priest came and persuaded her that the lady who taught the school had bewitched him, and offered to exorcise the witch if she would promise not to send him any more, which she did. The priest saw that the boy's disease was at the turning point. He got well, and the people believed that the priest had cast out the witch.

These are the men that come over here to Christianize and civilize us! Are they not a noble set of fellows?

He was in Naples last year. He got a servant whose name was John, who appeared to be an honest man; and after two or three days, he told John he wanted a Bible. "Well," said he, "I think you will not find it." They went to every store in the city and inquired for the Bible, and could find none. He asked the man why it was so? "Oh," said he, "de priests tink if we have de Bible, we all become Protestants." That is it; the Bible strikes at the very root of Popery, and they are afraid of it. The speaker went on to show in an amusing manner, how the Bible would undermine and overturn the leading doctrines of the church of Rome. It was easy to see why the priests oppose it. It destroys their trade. There is a warfare against the Bible. There is not a nobler man in Europe than Lord Shaftesbury. That man has gone down from his high position and collected the chimney sweeps of London into schools. That man, in his place as chairman of the Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society, declared his conviction that there was a league among all the Papal Governments of Europe, to banish all copies of the Bible from their dominions.

We might be sure, the speaker said, that, wherever we find men unwilling to have the Bible circulated without note or comment, there is something wrong in their tenets.

He heard Dr. Duff say, that for three hundred years there had not been a Bible among the Portuguese Catholics or their converts in India. Francis Xavier was the ennouized Romish Apostle to India. While landing, he says that he lost his cross in the water, and that a crab caught it in his mouth and brought it on shore and laid it down before him! A distinguished native chief had become disgusted with idolatrous fables, and requested the people of all religions to bring him their sacred books. Xavier thought it would not do to put the plain New Testament into the hands of an untaught savage. So he made up a New Testament of his own and presented it to him as the Christian Scriptures! The man, after reading it, returned it, saying: "this is no better religion than our own. Like our own sacred books, it is but a collection of fables."

The Bible is the only remedy for Pagan superstition. He had seen in Rome crowds of people upon the top of each other, striving to get up to a picture of the Virgin, to kiss her toe; and the priests were looking on. If there was a system of idolatry to be found in the world, it was in Romanism. He made the declaration with solemnity, and he believed it. The only remedy was the Bible.

He would say again, that the Bible was the only thing that could give liberty to the people. When the explosion took place in Europe, in 1848, the feeling among us was, that there was to be a jubilee of liberty in Europe. And how long did it continue? And why was it so short-lived? They had no religion—no Bible. They brought on anarchy instead of liberty, and they were frightened and sought protection of their old oppressors. But, when we attempted our liberty, we had the Bible for a foundation—Bible principles for liberty to stand upon. If the Bible is taken away from our children, the sun of liberty will set, and its light will go out in darkness.

Now the world is coming to us. Let us be thankful that God has kept them back till we are strong enough to meet them. The moment they touch our shores they breathe the air of freedom. We need not fear. Here is the Mississippi, the Potomac, the Susquehanna, and the St. Lawrence, all great rivers, rolling their waters in different directions into the Atlantic. Do they change the character of its salt waters? No; it takes them all, and assimilates them and makes them its own.

We have here a great mill. The upper stone is the Bible, and the nether, the common school. Let them come. We will take them into the mill, and they will come out Protestants and Americans.

LA GRANGE COLLEGE.

MR. EDITOR: I regret that necessity seems to be laid upon somebody to animadvert upon a portion of the "Report of the Committee on Education," as published in your paper of the 18th of December. In that report, I find to my astonishment, the following sentences, viz:

"No one among us can undervalue La Grange College and its claims, yet none can deny the unfortunateness of its location for us. It is needless longer for us to disguise the fact that natural obstacles separate us from it. These, combined with other circumstances, have made it impossible to concentrate the attention of our people on this institution, notwithstanding its able faculties, the munificent liberality of our preachers, and their tireless exertions in its behalf."

Now, if I am not vastly mistaken, I moved to strike out from the report this very paragraph, pending its passage before the Conference, and it was stricken out.

Am I right or wrong? If right, how comes it to be published? If wrong, all I have to say is, it ought to have been. It is in the recollection of all present on the occasion, that the report was horribly mutilated and disfigured before its adoption by the Conference, and that a member of the Committee opposed the striking out, on the ground that the report only set forth the facts. To which I replied, why not submit all the facts; for instance, the fact that the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, now building, would touch the Tennessee river some thirty miles below the College; that the Charleston and Memphis road, now building, would pass in four miles of the College; and that the Selma and Tennessee road would terminate on the same river some sixty miles above. Those were facts, of which the Committee might have availed themselves, "not in disparagement of our adopted child," but greatly to its advantage. But waiving all this for the present, is it not apparent to every casual reader that our worthy brethren of the Committee were dazzled with some magnificent scheme of College-building in South Alabama. If so, permit me to say to them, and all concerned, that in many things each one of them may be more learned and far seeing than myself, but in the matter of school and college enterprise, I claim to know more than all of them put together; and consequently, I will now write the cost and history of the new College:

Item 1. The ruin and abandonment of La Grange, which has cost the Church, first and last, one hundred thousand dollars! besides the labors, anxieties, fears, prayers and speeches of its friends, for a quarter of a century!

Item 2. A great loss of public confidence: for who is to assure our friends that our sons may not become as thoroughly convinced of "the unfortunateness of the location" and the "natural obstacles" in the way of the new College, as some of us seem to be about the old one?

Item 3. A bonus of one hundred thousand dollars with which to commence the new adventure; and then its location must be some where, and that some where will not please every body. If we place it east, it will be judged altogether inconvenient to many in the west, and they will choose to send to the University, or any where else, rather than to the new College; and if in the west, many in the east will send to Georgia, as they do now; and the new enterprise will not meet expectation, so in twenty-five years it may be found out that the whole affair was unfortunate "for us."

My dear brethren, let us stick to our old friends, or, as the Committee have it, the children of our adoption, and not be in haste to bring in new foundlings, if the old ones are to starve thereby. An old war horse, a or Methodist itinerant, may, by dint of hard labor and age, become useless; but not so a College. Its very age makes it venerable and valuable. If it needs recuperation, let us give it, for, after all, it will likely do as well, and cost less than a new one.

La Grange is the oldest Methodist College in the United States. It never was more prosperous and useful than now, and if by a little patience, labor and money, we can make it all we could desire, why dream of another adventure? While, then, we cherish this, which, by the laws of primogeniture, has the first and largest claim, let us not forget Centenary, Oak Bowery and Macon Institute. If others press for a place under the shadow of the fostering care of the Conference, let it always be understood that it must not be at the serious detriment of these older members of the family.

For the Committee—W. H. Milburn, C. C. Gillespie, C. S. Hart, W. J. Powers and L. O. Capers—I have nothing apart from sincere respect and warm brotherly regard; but I think they are mistaken in this matter; they may think so of me. I have no fears about the old College, if its pledged friends are faithful; but if the time coms in my duy to get up a new one, I shall be on hand with "guvel" and "square" to do my part.

Yours truly, F. G. FERGUSON.

Sumnierfield, Dec. 22, 1852.

P. S.—Let it be distinctly understood, if more has been published in this report than ought to have been, the Committee is not to be blamed for that; and what I have written was with the design to stay an injury which the College may sustain by its publication.

ADA BYRON (LADY LOVELACE.)

Ada Byron never looked consciously into the face of her father. Whatever wholesome and ennobling joys his wayward "nature" might have found in watching the growth of his young daughter's mind, it was not reserved for the poet ever to know. How far the voice of the illustrious father did blend with the future visions of the orphan girl; how far the echoes of his harp and of his heart did "reach into her heart;" how far the token and the tone from her father's mould had part in her after-musings, the world, perhaps, has no right to inquire. Still, many will find it pleasant to learn that, by her own desire, the remains of Ada Byron were to be laid yesterday where they will mingle with her "father's mould," in Hucknall Church.

At her father's death, Ada was little more than eight years old. She had small resemblance to her father. No one, we are told, would have recognized the Byron features, the finely-chiselled chin or the expressive lips or eyes of the poet, in the daughter. Yet, at times, the Byron blood was visible in her look; and those who saw her in 1835 on her marriage with Lord Lovelace (then Lord King) fancied they saw more traces of the poet's countenance in the bride than they remembered there at any other time. But dissimilarity of look was not the only dissimilarity between Byron and his daughter. Lady Lovelace cared little about poetry. Like her father's Donna Inez, in "Don Juan,"

"Her favorite science was the mathematical."

Mr. Babbage is said to have conducted her studies at one time, and Lady Lovelace is known to have translated from Italian into English a very elaborate defence of the once celebrated Calculating Machine of her mathematical friend.

It is impossible to contemplate the early death of Byron's only child without reflecting sadly on the fates of other families of our greatest poets. Shakspeare and Milton each died without a son, but both left daughters, and both names are now extinct. Shakspeare's was soon so. Addison had an only child, a daughter, a girl of some five or six years at her father's death. She died unmarried, at the age of eighty or more. Furqulhar left two girls dependent on the friendship of his friend Wilks, the actor, who stood nobly by them while he lived. They had a small pension from the Government; and having long out-lived their father, and seen his reputation unalterably established, both died unmarried. The son and daughter of Coleridge both died childless. The two sons of Sir Walter Scott died without children, one of two daughters died unmarried, and the Scotts of Abbotsford and Waverly are now represented by the children of a daughter. How little could Scott foresee the sudden failure of male issue! The poet of the "Faerie Queene" lost a child, when very young, by fire, when the rebels burned his house in Ireland. Some of the poets had sons, and no daughters. Thus we read of Chaucer's son, of Drydon's sons, of the sons of Burns, of Allan Ramsay's sons, of Dr. Young's son, of Campbell's son, of Moore's son, and of Shelley's son. Ben Jonson survived all his children. Some, and those among the greatest, died unmarried: Butler, Cowley, Congreve, Otway, Prior, Pope, Gay, Thomson, Cowper, Akenside, Shenstone, Collins, Gray, Goldsmith. Mr. Rogers still lives, single. Some were unfortunate in their sons in a sadder way than death could make them.

Lady Lovelace has left three children, two sons and a daughter. Her mother is still alive, to see, perhaps with a softened spirit the shade of her father beside the early grave of his only child. Ada's looks in her late years—years of suffering, borne with gentle and womanly fortitude—have been happily caught by Mr. Henry Phillips, whose father's pencil has preserved to us the best likeness of Ada's father. LATEST NEWS FROM CALIFORNIA, OREGON, CHINA AND Sandwich Islands.

TWO WEEKS LATE FROM CALIFORNIA, IN ADVANCE OF THE MAIL LINE.

The steamship Daniel Webster, Captain Grafton, arrived here last night from San Juan, which place she left on the 31st ult. She brings dates from San Francisco to the 16th ult. The steamer Northern Light was to sail from San Juan for New York on the 1st inst. with two hundred passengers. The brig Eolian was the only sailing vessel in port at San Juan when the Webster left.

On the third and 4th instants, the Webster experienced a severe norther, which detained her arrival about twenty hours. While coming up the river, being about thirty miles from the Pass, the foot valve gave way, rendering the ship helpless. She was towed up to the city by the tow-boat Anglo-Norman.

We make up the following summary of news from the San Francisco Times and Transcript, of the 15th ult.:

By the messenger of Adams & Co.'s Express, who arrived first at our office with papers from the interior last evening, we learn that Shasta city has been destroyed by fire! This news reached Sacramento yesterday in such a form as to be generally credited, although our informant did not obtain the particulars. The mail and express agent for Shasta has been drowned, and the mail bags lie entirely under water, and the river still rising rapidly.

We give this intelligence as it is received; it comes through a source entitled to credit, although from the want of particulars, we are in hopes the report on account of the fire at Shasta will turn out to be exaggeration. We can scarcely believe an entire town could be destroyed by fire during this stormy weather.

The river, at Sacramento, yesterday, according to the Journal, was slightly receding. The waters had reached a point beyond which they seldom go at this season of the year. Probably the river will rise but little till the melting of the snow on the mountains, in February or March.

A high wind prevailed at Sacramento on Thursday, which drove the falling rain through the air in a manner to give every thing a most cheerless aspect.

The principal thoroughfares of Sacramento are in a wretched condition. Teams become stalled in the mud at frequent intervals, while pedestrians are compelled to wade wherever they go. Business in all its branches is generally dull, and improvements stationary. By a statement in the Journal, however, it appears that since the late fire, sixty-three brick buildings, and 276 buildings of other materials, have been erected: in all, seven hundred and sixty-one.

Later from China.

The bark Caprice arrived at San Francisco on the 14th bringing the Hong Kong Register of the 6th of October.

Coolie emigration is taking place to a considerable extent from Amoy.

Speaking of the negligence of the administration with regard to the Japan Expedition, the Register says: "Since we last wrote on the subject there has not arrived a single additional ship to the American Squadron; and from what we can learn, it seems a matter of doubt whether or not any more will arrive. When information is to be got from Japan by means of this expedition (alluding to an English Society which has advertised for essays for the purpose of obtaining information on Japan that is likely to result from the expedition—the time for sending in such essays having been extended to March 1, 1853) the information, says the Register, is to be got from Japan by means of this expedition is not very apparent, but even if the expedition were to start at the present moment the information would hardly be in time for the 1st of March. Under these circumstances we would strongly recommend the spirited advertiser to take all the essays he can get up to the above day, without the information on Japan, and make the most of them. But should he persist we would recommend him to postpone the date of sending it until the Greek, instead of the March Kalends, which, as far as we can see, seems to be the date on which the American expedition is to come off.

A body on which an inquest had lately been held, prohibited the extraordinary phenomenon of floating immediately after death.

The H. & C. S. P. Co's steamer Hoog Kong gallantly captured a pirate, which was endeavoring to take a passage boat, and would have done so but for the opportune arrival of the steamer. This piratical vessel had committed many depredations on the coast.

The Charlotte, a teak built ship of 820 tons, from Madras, loaded with 4200 bales of cotton, had been swept by the current on to Pratas Shoal, in the China sea, and wrecked. Her cargo was saved.

Seu has been ordered, with his seals, as Commissioner to Hoonan, to take direction of the military affairs of the province. And one Ye, formerly Governor-general of Kwong Se, has taken Sue's place.

One Kung-seih in charge of the Imperial Tombs has been handed over to the Board of punishment, in consequence of a fire having broken out and destroyed some property, carpets, etc., in his Majesty's mansions near the Tombs.

Several subscriptions have been made towards carrying out the objects of the Highland Emigration Society. In Hong Kong $1088 were raised; at Canton $180; at Amoy $468. In all $7366. A considerable sum is expected from Shanghae.

Later from Orsgon.

The steamship Columbia arrived at San Francisco on the 14th ult., bringing dates to the 4th. The Transcript has the following:

On the upward trip the Columbia touched at Port Orford, and brought from thence to this port the crew of the lost transport bark Anita, which vessel went on shore at that place on the 20th October, and was totally lost.

The brig Maria from this port, bound to Shoal Water Bay, went ashore above Cape Disappointment, on the 24th ult., and was entirely lost with all on board, with the exception of two men, who had arrived at Astoria previous to the Columbia's leaving.

The schooner Williamtic, before reported ashore in Gray's Harbor, has gone to pieces.

We gather the following summary of news from the papers before us:

The Statesman says lumber is worth, at Oregon city, twenty dollars per thousand feet at the mills. Flour commands fifteen dollars per hundred pounds, and sales brisk. A considerable quantity has been bought since the arrival of the last steamer, for the California market. Wheat sells for four and five dollars per bushel, and is scarce.

The last Oregonian, after announcing the Atlantic States, by over land, in San Francisco, sixteen days before it started for the Territory.

HIGH WATER.—The rains for eight or ten days previous to the 8th ult., were uncommonly severe, and the water in the Willamette was unusually high for that season of the year.

General Gaines appointed the 9th of December to be observed as a day of thanksgiving and prayer.

A new steamer is soon to be put on the river between Portland and Astoria. The steamer Multnomah has resumed her trips between Portland and Oregon City, since the late rains.

The Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Oregon will commence its annual session at Salem, (the present seat of government) December 15.

The Times says the People of Portland have had and are now having (December 4) many experiments in the "rapping" line; and there are some professed believers. They have a very convenient way of avoiding tests, for if wrong, they attribute it to "evil spirits." We hope the good people will not run so far off the track that they cannot return again.

The flags upon the liberty poles, shipping, etc., were displayed at half-mast, and thirty-one minute guns were fired in Portland on the receipt of the news of the death of Mr. Webster.

Later from the Sandwich Islands.

The brig Zoe, fifteen days from the Sandwich Islands, brought dates to the 21st of November.

THANKSGIVING.—Thursday, the 18th of November, was observed as a day of Thanksgiving throughout the Sandwich Islands.

In the two places of worship in the English language, appropriate discourses were delivered, and the Polynesians regrets that more who understand that language, did not attend those services.

The brig Wallace, Capt. Crowell, returned to Honolulu on the 17th November, from San Francisco, having been absent but 14 days.

We hear by this arrival of several disasters. The ship Branda, of Newliedford, was lost in the Arctic ocean, in the gale of Sept. 23. Her cargo consisted of 1200 bbls. polar oil, none of which was saved. The officers and crew were all saved by the ship Adelaide, which vessel has arrived at the port of Honolulu. The ships Tuscany and Adelaide were both saved in the same gale, only by the most untiring efforts of the officers and crew; and the former vessel, in fact, was some time in the midst of the breakers, on a rocky lee shore. The ship Illbrania, Sol. Coffin, Jr., in lat. 42 N., long 170, came in contact, during the night, with the Gen. Pike, and swept away all her boats and davits, and also lost her jib-boom, flying jib-boom, and sprung the bowsprit, besides receiving further damages. The Gen. Pike arrived at Honolulu on the 20th November, in a very crippled condition, without any lower spirit, and having lost her boats and boat gear, and sprung her foremast in the collision with the Illbrania. The ship Hesperine, which had arrived at Honolulu, Tegarden, master, experienced a severe gale in N. lat 45, E. long 177, during which a sea swept the deck, carrying off every thing, including mizen-mast, bulwarks, boats, davits and drowned six men, including second officer and one boat-steerer. The George Washington, Captain Gibbs, in the gale of September 23, in the Arctic ocean, lost 100 bbls. oil with boats and larboard anchor, and sprung her rudder.

THEOLOGY OF THE MORMONS.—The Mormons believe in the authenticity of the Old Testament, and in the divine character, mission and revelation of Jesus Christ. But they further believe that similar revelations of the Divine will were made to Joseph Smith, and are now being made as circumstances require, to Brigham Young and the other patriarchs of the church. The Mormons believe in polygamy. The one creates and proves the necessity of the other. According to the original ideas of their theology they are themselves all gods and the progenitors of gods, varying in power, intelligence and dignity, who have peopled and are assuming a human form. One of their great duties in this, their humiliated character, is to propagate their species and people, if not only this, but also worlds numberless and unrevealed, with their descendants—gods like themselves. Hence the great necessity of wives for the reception of the system of, the plurality of wives for the more speedy accomplishment of this, the great object of their being. After death they will ascend to heaven, resume their original godship, and there live in a state of perpetual bestial enjoyment, surrounded by their numerous wives and property. In their belief there is no such place as a separate distinct hell. Hell consists simply in the deprivation of those who are unworthy, from the joys and pleasures of heaven.

Obituary.

The Rev. JOHN H. HINES was born Aug. 6, 1798, in Albemarle county, Virginia. In 1820 or '21 he became the subject of converting grace, and joined the M. E. Church. Some time after he was appointed class leader, in which office he served, the Church several years. In the year 1833, in Yallabusha county, Miss., he received from Rev. B. Week preacher in charge of that circuit, license to exhort, and in the year 1843, at the Conference in Woodville, Mississippi, was elected and ordained deacon. He continued to serve the Church as a local deacon, with the gifts and genius that God gave him, until Oct. 23, 1852, when, at Emmerville, La., he left the church militant and and the world in full and glowing hope of an immediate entrance into the church triumphant. He died of palsy. He died fearlessly, calmly and peacefully. He suffered much, but bore it with Christian patience. During his illness he had the songs: "Oh, sing me of Heaven," and the "Bower of Prayer," sung for him, and seemed full of the joys and consolations of religion. He called his youngest son to his bedside and exhorted him with a father's loving words to seek and obtain religion, and meet him in Heaven. He left behind him an aged widow and three sons, and many relatives and friends to mourn our loss. "We sorrow not as those who have no hope," but rejoice in the hope that when a few years more we shall rejoin him, "where friends shall meet again who have loved." "Let me die the death of the righteous and let my last end be like his." W. B. H.

DIED—In Shreveport, La., on the 17th of October, 1852, JAMES K. BAYLISS, in the 40th year of his age.

The deceased was a native of Virginia, but resided some time in North Alabama, where he married Miss Frances Bayliss. Thence he removed to Caddo parish, where he resided at the time of his death. Mr. Bayliss was one of our very best merchants. His manner of doing business was so agreeable that he endeared himself to every one who had transactions with him, and he was universally esteemed an honest man. He was a religious man. He was a Methodist. His piety was unostentatious, but it was sincere. He sold goods with the fear of God before his eyes, and kept his books with the view of a final settlement at the great day of accounts. He lived right, and he died happy. For some time before his death he suffered a good deal of pain, but every interval of ease was spent in exhorting his irreligious acquaintances to seek Heaven. He kissed his children one by one and bade them good-bye, and, turning to his wife, said: "Frances, you will do all that you can; you have been too good to me: but Oh! Frances, raise our children to be religious!" Thy way, Oh! God, is in the mighty deep; the good, the virtuous and the useful are taken away from us, and the profligate, the vicious, the worthless and the wretched are left. C. G. YONGE.

Greenwood, La.

DIED—December 23, at the residence of her mother, in Plaquemines, La., Mrs. JOSEPHINE, wife of Sylvester McCluin.

She was born in Plaquemines, July 11, 1836, was married the 20th of last May, and joined the Church August 1. But she was permitted to enjoy the pleasures and happiness promised by these two eventful steps only for a short time. Soon death put a period to the fitful dream of life, blighting all the fond hopes of her youth and the bright anticipations of her friends.

How sad and affecting the thought, that she, who seven months ago stood before the altar of God, and with blushing checks and sparkling eyes, which spoke of life and love, and hope, took upon her the vows of holy wedlock, to-day lay before me, before the same altar, clothed in the apparel of the youthful bride, but cold in death! I endeavored to enforce the truth that "all flesh is as grass," also, how little may we calculate on earthly joys! And if ever there is a period in life when one can say and feel most sensibly that "all is vanity," it is when the consolation of his bosom is torn from him by death. The only solace in such a case is the assurance of a happy re-union in immortal bliss. Our deceased sister gave us an assurance that she was going to glory, whither may her disconsolate companion and weeping friends follow her. A. E. GOODWYN.

DIED—In Jackson, Clarke county, Ala., November 4, 1852, Mr. BANNARA CHAPMAN.

In 1825, under the ministerial labors of Rev. E. Hearn, now of the Alabama Conference, she was awakened, converted, and joined the M. E. Church, since which time she has been a consistent Christian. Serious, but not sad, always cheerful and dignified, neither levity nor austerity was seen about her. Having taken Christ for her portion, she sought and found in the service of her Master the peace and comfort which a ruin ed guilty world could not supply. In her kindly intercourse, she was cordial, and always found pleasure in making others happy. In the closing scene, she expressed confidence in the Redeemer, and seemed only to regret leaving her kind husband and two children, together with a large circle of friends and relations. Thus lived, and passed away, one of the sweet spirits of the world. As a wife, a mistress, or kind neighbor, she had but few equals. She will long live in the memory of her family and friends; and no doubt but many of the preachers of the Alabama Conference, when they see this, will recollect the kind hospitalities they have received from her and.

SUNDAY SCHOOL VISITOR.—As there was so much delay in the renewal of subscriptions, so much trouble and confusion in consequence, and so great dissatisfaction given by striking off the names of those not punctual in renewing their orders, we have determined to send the Visitor for 1853 to all schools, or clubs, that take it, hoping that none of them will return the packages, unless they find it impossible to pay for them.

As the publication of the Visitor entails a loss on the Book Concern, which is struggling for an existence, we hope our friends will not increase the burden by withholding their payments—our terms require them to be in advance. Send us the cash, or at least a responsible name. By prepaying the postage it is reduced one-half. The Visitor is chargeable with three cents a year in the State where published, and six cents a year in every part of the Union. Be sure to prepay at the postoffice where the paper is received.

General Intelligence.

We regret to learn that our Governor elect, Col. Hébert, is so seriously ill as to render the possibility of his surviving a serious question of interest and concern.

LARGE EXPORTS OF COTTON.—Our table of receipts and exports in the commercial review of this morning shows the exports yesterday to have reached the large amount of 28,505 bales, the largest quantity ever cleared from this port in one day. The exports of the entire week embrace 71,195 bales, reducing the stock, notwithstanding receipts of 42,365 bales, to the extent of 29,000 bales. The amount remaining on hand, and on shipboard not cleared, last evening, was 209,759 bales, against 126,849 at the same date last year. The total exports since September 1 are 616,841 bales, against last year, for the same period, 456,569 bales.

LARGE BUSINESS IN FLOUR.—A reference to our commercial columns will show that a very large business was done in our Flour market. The excitement was produced in a great measure by a report of an advance in New York of $1@$1 50 ₱ bbl. Under the influence of the active demand in this market, prices went up some 25@25c. ₱ bbl. and closed with firmness at the advance.

POINTCHARTRAIN RAILROAD.—The following gentlemen are the Directors for this road for the ensuing year:

Messrs. J. Egerton, V. Allain, L. DeSaulles, G. Milteuberger, J. W. Carroll, M. Heine and W. Hogart.

Mr. Egerton was unanimously elected President of the Board of Directors.

The road is doing an excellent business, as is shown by the monthly statement for December, 1852, and December, 1851, which exhibits an increase of receipts in the former over the latter of 102 per cent.

REAL ESTATE IN AND NEAR NEW YORK.—Dr. Brandreth, who recently purchased the property on Broadway, between Lispenard and Canal streets, N. Y., with fronts on all three of the streets, for $120,000, has been offered $160,000 for his bargain. The old Masonic Hall property, Broadway and Pearl Street, now pays a rental of six per cent. on $100,000. The owners have just been offered six per cent. on a valuation of $150,000, from the expiration of the present lease, two years hence.

A correspondent of the Tribune notes the fact that $1,000 per acre has been paid for unimproved property on Staten Island, and in the neighborhood of Newark, and $300 to $400 in Westchester county, and on Long Island, above Williamsburg. Seventy acres on Staten Island, a full mile from the water, and which the small farmer, who owned and lived on it, valued at $15,000 or $20,000 a few years ago, has been sold to a company of German speculators for $70,000, and contracts have already been made by the purchasers to erect two hundred houses for gardners and other villagers.

TERMINUS ON RAILROADS.—We see, by a letter from Geo. Stark, superintendant of the Hudson River Railroad, addressed to the N. Y. Courier and Enquirer, that hereafter torpedoes are to be placed on the track whenever drawbridges are hoisted in thick weather. Mr. Stark says:

"The explosion caused by running over one of these is loud enough to be heard throughout the entire train, communicating the alarm with absolute certainty to all on board. I have this day directed that no drawbridge on this road shall hereafter be opened, either by day or by night, without torpedoes being first placed upon the rails, five hundred yards distant on each side, in addition to the usual signals."

A new reaping machine has just been invented by a citizen of Brooklyn, N. Y., which can be worked by one horse, and it is said will cut twenty-five acres of grain in a day. Four scythes, with three cradle frames, are fastened to the rim of a drum, or cylinder, having a vertical or rotary motion. The drum for a medium size machine is to be six feet in diameter. The scythes are so arranged that every revolution of the cylinder, simultaneously with the stroke, cuts and lodges the grain in a standing gavil inside the cylinder or drum, whence those who hold the machine can conveniently bend and dispose of the bundles of grain. This mode of gathering the grain wholly dispenses with raking. The grain is cut by the same kind of a stroke as is made with a hand sickle. It is in fact the old mode of hand-cradling, worked by machinery and w'' power.

AN IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.—A scientific correspondent of the New York Courier has made an important discovery in voltaic electricity, which may be practically applied to the cure of weak nerves. It is this: If a cylindrical piece of zinc be placed near the top of a broom-handle, and one of copper, about fifteen inches below, connection being made between the two by means of a wire, a person taking hold of the top-piece with the right hand, while the left is placed on the copper or lower piece, forms a voltaic circle which becomes powerful the more the broom is used. The hair is must be without gloves so that the metals are in contact, and windows at the room should be open when the broom is used, so as to admit the air freely. The discovery is invaluable to females in a weak state for want of active life, and for males it can be applied to axe-handles.

LETTER FROM RIO JANEIRO.—By the arrival of the Sophia Walker, Capt. Wisnell, at New York, we are in receipt of Rio dates to the 14th November. The news is without importance. The organization of the steamship company to connect Rio directly with Lisbon, was the leading topic of interest. The charter and basis of organization appear in the Jornal and Correo, and offer the most promising indications of success. A contract had also been completed by Government, with Jose Rodrighes Ferreira, for the construction of steam vessels connecting Rio with Santa Catharina and Caravillas, touching at the several coast ports. The steamer Marajoz, for the navigation of the Amazon, was launched early in November. The Imperial Government is certainly waking up to the importance of a steam mercantile navy.

STEAMBOATS STARGED.—The Mobile Advertiser of Tuesday, says: The fine new steamer Mary Bess, Captain J. J. Montgomery, when just above Pickensville, on the 30th ult., struck a stump and sunk almost immediately, in twelve to fourteen feet water. She had on board at the time 1060 bales of cotton, of which about six hundred were saved without material injury. After the first shock she swung round, from which fact it is feared her bottom will prove to be so badly injured as to render her a total wreck; her cabin may, however, it is thought, be saved. The Mary Bess was quite new, and was jointly owned by her captain, clerk and barkeeper. It is understood she was insured to about two thirds of her value.

Congressional.

WASHINGTON, December 29.

SENATE.—The Chair laid before the Senate a report from the Interior Department, concerning the Mexican Boundary Commission.

Mr. Davis reported a joint resolution, extending the time in which masters of vessels are required to provide their steamers, according to the requirements of the act known as the "Steamboat Bill," passed at the last session; and the same was considered and passed.

Mr. Hamlin reported a bill granting a new register to the ship Penobscot in the name of "Leon;" and the same was considered and passed.

The joint resolution from the House, providing for the employment of two clerks and one messenger in the office of the Superintendent of Public Printing, was taken up, Mr. Francis H. Hay, the delegate from Massachusetts in place of the late Mr. Rantoul, was then sworn in.

Mr. Stanly, of North Carolina, submitted a resolution to the effect that the reporters of the House should be instructed not to report, in the Daily Globe, speeches not delivered in the House, when publishing its proceedings; and called attention to a speech published in the Globe of yesterday, attacking the administration, professing to have been delivered by Mr. Smart, of Maine, but which was not delivered, and consequently no reply could be made.

Mr. Smart stated in reply that not having an opportunity of delivering the remarks alluded to, he therefore gave notice of his intending to publish them; and went on to charge the Government with neglecting the interests of its constituents, in a case where a high handed outrage had been committed by the Spanish authorities of Havana, in the seizure of vessels belonging to citizens of the State of Maine and the imprisonment and condemnation of the captains and crews.

The case as stated, he said, was briefly this—two vessels cleared for New Orleans in May, 1850, for Chagres, and were seized on their way by two Spanish vessels of war, the crews being put in irons, afterwards taken to Cuba, tried and condemned, and subsequently sent to Spain; although it had been declared by General Taylor that no offence had been committed, the parties having been arrested beyond the Spanish jurisdiction, and consequently not amenable to Spanish law. He contended that the vessels should have been recaptured, and had he the power, would authorize reprisals unless satisfaction were given.

Mr. Stanley replied in support of the resolution, reviewed the speech of the gentleman from Maine, and defended the course of the administration in conducting the foreign affairs of the country. He hoped the resolution would be adopted, and that the reporters would, in future, be restricted to the publication of speeches actually made; and that party speeches should no longer, in this manner, find their way before the public, thus affording no opportunity for explanation or defence.

Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, spoke in relation to the impracticability of restricting the reporters in the way proposed.

Mr. Eyeman, of Mississippi, submitted an amendment, restricting debate to matters legitimately under discussion, which at present is enjoined by the rules, but from which it has become the practice to depart, as exemplified in the political speeches of last session, and the offensive allusions of Mr. Giddings.

After some further discussion as to the rules, the resolution was adopted, with a proviso that nothing therein should be construed to prevent a member from correcting and revising his speech—a motion to lay the resolution on the table having previously failed; yeas 44, nays 12.

The resolution of Mr. Harris, of Tennessee, relative to receiving reports of committees, upon which no quorum could be found to vote yesterday and Monday, again came up in the regular course of business.

A motion was made to lay the resolution on the table; and tellers having been appointed, there was only 65 voting in the affirmative, and 80 in the negative—no quorum.

The House then adjourned.

WASHINGTON, December 30.

SENATE.—The Chair laid before the Senate an Invitation from the Executive Committee of the Jackson Equestrian Statue Company, to be present at the inauguration of that statute on the 8th of January next. Also, a report from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating a statement of the steps taken with regard to the selection of a Site for the Lunatic Asylum of the District.

Mr. Cass' resolution calling for information respecting the establishment of a new colony in Central America by Great Britain, was taken up and passed.

Mr. Davis submitted a resolution, which was adopted, calling for a statement of the amount of Hospital Money derived by the United States from the tax of twenty cents a month on seamen's wages, and he presented petitions praying the repeal of that tax.

A bill for the relief of C. S. Matthews, Charles Wood and James Hall, of New York, was debated and then postponed.

House bill making further appropriations for the construction of roads in Minnesota, and the bill allowing exchanges of School lands in Oregon, were considered and passed.

An adjournment till Monday was ordered.

On motion of Mr. Pratt, the bill compensating the heirs of Dr. William Somerville, of Talbot county, Md., for property destroyed by the British in 1814 was taken up and passed.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, offered a resolution calling for the report of the Board of Officers appointed to examine the Blue Lick Springs—adopted.

Two other private bills were considered and passed.

After a short Executive session, the Senate adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE.—The Speaker stated that there were only ninety-seven members present, who did not constitute a quorum.

A call of the House was then moved, upon which the yeas and nays were taken; which was rejected—yeas 79, nays 55.

Hon. Edward P. Little, a delegate from Massachusetts, presented his credentials and was sworn in, having been elected to fill the vacancy which was caused by the death of Mr. Fowler.

The motion for a call of the House was then withdrawn, there being a quorum present, and the journals of yesterday were then read.

Mr. Seymour, of New York, moved that the rules be suspended, in order to take up a resolution just sent down from the Senate, relative to the Steamboat Law, which goes into operation in some parts of the country on the first of January next, to meet a deficiency that has arisen from inability in some cases to procure the necessary machinery, and the engineers having been unable to provide the required tests; which was objected to.

It was then resolved that when the House adjourns, it stands adjourned to meet on Monday next.

The resolution introduced by Mr. Harris, of Tennessee, on Monday, to authorize the receiving reports of committees, upon which there should be no debate, was again taken up; and the yeas and nays were ordered upon a motion to lay the resolution upon the table; which was negatived—yeas 67, nays 72.

The yeas and nays were then taken upon the passage of the resolution, which was negatived—yeas 67, nays 72.

Mr. Doty, of Wisconsin, moved to suspend the rules to enable him to introduce a resolution for an inquiry into the banking system of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Ficklin said he was prepared to report a bill on the subject, and the suspension of the rules being objected to, the subject was dropped.

The House then adjourned till Monday next.

Homestead Exemption.

The following extracts exhibit the various qualifications of the Homestead Exemption Bills now in the several States named:

MAINE.—A lot of land, a dwelling house, and out buildings thereon, or so much thereof as shall not exceed $5,000 in value.

VERMONT.—The homestead of every householder, or head of a family, to the value of $500 and the yearly products thereof.

MASSACHUSETTS.—The lot and buildings thereon occupied as a residence to the value of $5,000.

NEW YORK.—The lot and buildings thereon occupied as a residence to the value of $5,000.

Maryland.—All real estate acquired by marriage during the life of a wife, from execution for debt of husband.

ILLINOIS.—Twenty acres of land, including dwelling and improvements, not to exceed $200—and the additional amount of five acres for each child under fifteen years of age.

FLORIDA.—Forty acres of land, when not in any town or city, and provided such does not exceed in value $400.

ALABAMA.—Forty acres of land to every farmer; and to every householder, residing in a town or city, a house and lot not to exceed $3,000.

TEXAS.—Two hundred acres of land, when not in town lots, not to exceed $2000 in value.

OHIO.—Every family a homestead not to exceed $500 in value.

MICHIGAN.—Forty acres, with dwelling-house and appurtenances, when not in town or city. If in town or city, a lot or dwelling house not to exceed in value $1500.

ILLINOIS.—Lot of ground and buildings occupied as a residence, not exceeding in value $1000.

IOWA.—Forty acres of land, not in town or city, or a town or city lot not exceeding in amount one-fourth of an acre.

CALIFORNIA.—The homestead, consisting of a quantity of land, together with the dwelling-house thereon and its appurtenances, and not exceeding in value the sum of $500.

NEW JERSEY.—A homestead to each head of a family being the family residence, to the value of $500; not to be assets in the hands of an administrator, but to remain for the benefit of the widow and until the maturity of the minor child.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—A homestead of fifty acres of land, including the dwelling-house and appurtenances, not to exceed $500 in value, and to extend to any property situated within the limits of any city or town corporate.

THE FIRE IN BATON ROUGE.—The Baton Rouge Comet gives the following particulars of the fire which occurred in that city on the morning of Tuesday last:

About three o'clock this morning a fire broke out in a building on Levee street, belonging to Mr. H. Real—quickly spread to the frame bake-shop of M. Lafon and the New Orleans coffee-house, and in less than twenty minutes some thirty buildings were in flames. The brick fire-proof warehouse of S. M. Hart & Co., on the south, prevented the flames from extending in that direction, but the wind, which blew in eddies, took the flames up Laurel street to the residence of our venerable fellow-citizen Mr. John F. Michel; here, for a few moments, it threatened the destruction of the whole city. The brick building on the corner of Lafayette and Laurel streets, occupied by Mr. G. Picard, was on fire several times, and made a very narrow escape, as did also the store of C. A. Bon; had either of these buildings caught, nothing could have saved the town from ruins. It was only now that the engine could be made available. The amount of loss cannot be less than $50,000.

BE CAREFUL WITH GAS LIGHTS.—The New York Commercial, in alluding to the explosion of gas in the house of Alderman Clayton, says:

"This disaster reminds us of an escape from such an explosion at the house of a practically scientific gentleman in Eighth street. A female relative from the country was on a visit, and was about to accompany the family to a concert, but was prevented by slight indisposition or fatigue, and preferred to retire early. It was briefly suggested to her to be careful to put out the gas in her dormitory. When the family returned home they readily perceived that the gas was escaping somewhere, and the gentleman took the precaution to proceed up stairs without a light. On approaching the room of his visitor, it became plain that it was heavily charged with gas, and one of the female members of the family having been called up, the door was opened, the windows immediately drawn down, and the gas turned off. The lady was all but insensible when discovered, but rallied on the application of restoratives. On enquiry it was ascertained from her that before lying down she had carefully blown out the gas light. It was fortunate for all parties that the gentleman's familiarity with practical science had rendered him habitually cautious."

STEAMBOAT CUT THROUGH BY ICE.—The steamboat America was cut through by ice near Hyde Park, New York, on the 23d ult., and sunk immediately, her passengers being saved with difficulty. She had a heavy freight including hay, several thousand sides of leather, eight hundred and thirty head of cattle. The sheep and [illegible] drowned. The boat has since been raised

Four Days Later from Europe—Arrival of the Pacific—Cotton Improved—Breadstuffs Declined—Interesting General News.

NEW YORK, Saturday, Jan 1, 1853

The Collins steamer Pacific arrived at her wharf today at 12 o'clock, after a passage of 17 days from Liverpool, during which she encountered a series of terrific gales. She brings Liverpool dates to the 15th December, four days later than the accounts brought by the Canada. The following is a summary of her news.

Liverpool Markets.

LIVERPOOL, Dec. 15

The demand for cotton has been rather moderate since the departure of the Canada, on the 11th inst., and the sales of the three business days have not exceeded 15,000 bales. Of these, only three thousand bales were taken on Saturday, but the demand improved on Monday, on which day the Asia arrived with accounts from the United States to the 1st inst. The sales of the day were 6000 bales. On Tuesday there was little change, the sales embracing 6000 bales at firm prices. The sales for speculation during the three days have been 3500 bales.

Brown, Shipley & Co. quote the market steadier, with an advance for middling of 1-8d. ₱ lb., other qualities remaining without change in prices. The quotations at the close are as follows: Fair Orleans, 6¼; Fair Mobile and Uplands, 5¼, and Middling 5¾d. [The quotations by the Canada as stated by our correspondent, were: for Fair Orleans, 6¼; Middling Orleans, 5 7-16; Fair Mobile and Uplands, 6¾, and Middling Uplands 5 5-16d. ₱ lb. Eds.]

The market for breadstuffs has been depressed since the departure of the Canada, the demand for speculation having subsided on Saturday. Flour has declined one shilling per barrell during the three days, and wheat 2d. per 70 lbs., though the markets closed last evening with more firmness. Corn has sold, to arrive, at 34@35s. per quarter. [The quotations for flour by the Canada were: Western Canal 29s. 3d., and Ohio 29s. 6d. For corn, 34s 6d. per quarter for Mixed, and 36s. for White. Eds.]

Pork and beef are scarce, and in request. Bacon has been hevy, and Irish descriptions have declined 1@2s. per cwt.

Business in the Manchester markets is better.

British Ministry.

The opposition to the Ministry is gaining strength in the British Parliament, and a severe contest is anticipated. The debate upon the Budget has been postponed until the evening of Thursday, the 16th.

France—Louis Napoleon's Civil List.

France is quiet. The Civil List of Louis Napoleon is fixed at 25,000,000 francs. The political accounts from Europe generally are peaceful and satisfactory.

Franklin and Asia.

NEW YORK, Sunday Evening, 8 o. m. Jan. 2.

The Havre steamer Franklin arrived here this morning, from Southampton, via Halifax.

There are no tidings of the Asia up to this hour.

Arrival of the Glasgow—A Little Later from Liverpool—Cotton Firm.

NEW YORK, January 3.

The New York and Glasgow steam packet Glasgow has arrived here from Glasgow, bringing telegraphic advices from Liverpool up to the evening of Wednesday, the 15th of December—some hours later than the accounts brought by the Pacific.

The sales of cotton on Wednesday are stated at 4,000 bales, of which 1,500 were taken on speculation. The market closed with firm prices.

Overland Mails—Fire in Canton.

The Glasgow brings information that the overland mail from India had arrived at London, with accounts of a destructive fire in Canton on the 27th of October. Property of the value of 150,000 pounds was destroyed, consisting mostly of silk goods.

Congressional—Cuban Relations.

WASHINGTON, January 3.

In the Senate to-day, Mr. Mason's resolution was passed calling upon the President of the United States for information relative to the proposition made by France and England touching the Island of Cuba.

Mr. Cass presented a petition from members of the Baptist Church, praying that measures may be taken to secure religious liberty to American citizens in Europe.

Three Days Later from Europe—Arrival of the Asia—Cotton Steady—Resignation of the British Ministry.

NEW YORK, January 5.

The Cunard steamer Asia has arrived here, bringing dates from Liverpool to the 18th December, three days later than the accounts brought by the Pacific.

The Asia was delayed by having broken a shaft, and put into Halifax, short of fuel, on Saturday. She left Halifax Sunday, and arrived here at 10 o'clock this morning. The following is a summary of her news:

Liverpool Markets.

LIVERPOOL, December 18.

There has been a better demand for Cotton since the departure of the Canada on the 11th inst., and the sales of the week embrace 37,000 bales, of which 8000 have been taken for speculation and 1300 for export. Prices have been firmer during the week with a small advance for most descriptions, and the quotations closed last evening as follows: Fair Orleans 6¼d., Middling Orleans 5 9-16d. Fair Uplands 5¾@5¾d., and Middling Uplands 5 1-16d. ₱ lb—the market closing quietly.

The Grain markets are healthy and breadstuffs have recovered the decline noticed early in the week. Denuiston & Co. report the market as closing firmly at last Friday's prices. Provisions have been in good request during the week; except Bacon, in which nothing has been done. Beef is steady at previous rates. Pork scarce and in demand at an advance. Lard has advanced 6s. to 12s. per cwt.

Defeat of the Ministry—Resignation of Lord Derby.

On Thursday night the Ministry were defeated in Parliament, on the Household Income Tax, by a majority of 19 votes. Lord Derby proceeded to lay his resignation before the Queen. The new Ministry will probably be formed by the Marquis of Lansdown as Premier, with Lord Aberdeen at the head of Foreign Affairs, and Lord John Russell as leader in the House. Gladstone will probably be Chancellor of the Exchequer.

France—Algiers—The Pope.

Napoleon Bonaparte, son of the ex-King of Westphalia, has been appointed to the Government of Algeria.

It is stated positively that the Pope will visit Paris to crown Louis Napoleon.

Further by the Asia. Spain—Revolution Expected.

Affairs in Madrid grow worse. New troubles have arisen, and the country is on the verge of a revolution.

Austria.

An outrage has been committed in Vienna, on the correspondent of the London Chronicle, and the matter has been laid before the English Government.

Arrival of the Washington.

BOSTON, Monday, January 3, 10 P. M.

The New York and Bremen steamer Washington put into this port to-day, with the loss of her topsail yards and short of coal. She has suffered under a series of terrific storms during her passage. Nothing is heard of the Asia up to this hour—ten at night.

Resignation of Mr. King.

WASHINGTON, January 3.

Vice President King has resigned his seat in the Senate, the resignation to take effect immediately. Gov. Collier will appoint Benjamin F. Fitzpatrick as Senator from Alabama in Mr. King's place.

Ericsson Steamer.

NEW YORK, January 4.

The trial trip of the Ericsson caloric ship came off today in this harbor. She passed down the East river and bay at the rate of twelve miles per hour, the wind and tide being in her favor.

Shipwreck of the Amulet.

BOSTON, January 4.

The ship Swan has arrived here from New Orleans. Her officers report having picked up the captain and three mates of the ship Amulet, which sprang a leak and immediately sunk, on the 20th December, carrying down fifteen persons. The survivors took a boat, and passed thirty-six hours in great distress. The Amulet was bound from Cette for Boston, with a cargo of 900 tons salt, which was insured.

Congressional Proceedings.

WASHINGTON, January 4.

In the Senate to-day, Mr. Underwood called for the report of the Commissioners appointed to survey, and procure plans for, a canal around the Falls of Ohio, and his motion was adopted.

Mr. Cass presented a resolution declaring against the establishment of any colony on the American Continent by foreign powers, and while disclaiming, on the part of the United States, any designs against the Island of Cuba, we will regard any attempt, by other powers, to obtain Cuba, by treaty or otherwise, as an unfriendly act, to be resisted by the United States. The resolutions were ordered to be printed.

The bill passed granting pensions to the widows of Revolutionary soldiers.

The President submitted the correspondence on affairs in Central America and respecting British movements in that country.

Congressional Proceedings.

WASHINGTON, January 5.

In the Senate, to-day, a message was received from the President, in answer to Mr. Mason's resolutions, relative to the tripartite treaty with regard to Cuba. It was ordered to be printed.

The bill extending the time for the steamboat law to go into operation, was amended, by fixing the extension of time at ninety days, in which form it passed.

Mr. Gwin [illegible], called up the resolution of last session, for relief of Railroads, by extending the time to receive railroad iron free of duty for four years. The motion to reconsider the vote, laying the resolution on the table passed by 24 yeas against 23 nays.

Accident to Gen. Pierce—Death of his Son.

BOSTON, Thursday, January 6

The train of cars on the Boston and Maine railroad was to-day thrown off the track near Andover, and several persons were injured, some fatally. Among the passengers were Gen. Franklin Pierce, his lady and a son aged ten years. The latter was instantly killed, and Mrs. Pierce was severely but not fatally injured. The General escaped with only slight injury to his person.

Congressional Proceedings.

WASHINGTON, January 6.

In the Senate to-day Mr. Cass and others explained that they would never have voted in favor of the Clayton and Bulwer Treaty respecting Central America, if they had known the construction that would be placed upon the provision excluding England from Central America. Clayton was severely denounced for his conduct in making this treaty. The correspondence relative to the Tripartite Treaty was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Steamboat Explosion.

LOUISVILLE, January 7.

The steamboat John Simonds, while rounding out from Portland landing to-day, collapsed a flue, scalding more than twenty persons and killing twelve.

Later Accounts.

LOUISVILLE, January 7.

The John Simonds collapsed the flues of four boilers, blowing out the after heads of the boilers. It is said now that no one was scalded. Six firemen are missing. The boat was towed to New Albany by the steamer Falcon.

A NEW ROAD TO CALIFORNIA.—The steamship Albatross Captain McNeil, is to leave New York on the 8th inst., for Vera Cruz direct. She intends to take freight, passengers and letters for California, to be sent forward by a special agent, via Acapulco.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES.—Norton's Literary Register informs us that the largest library in the United States is that of Harvard University, numbering in all about 92,000 volumes. Next to it ranks the Philadelphia Library, founded by Benjamin Franklin, and numbering 60,000 volumes.

LIBERTY COIN.—A few days since a gold eagle was taken at the post-office, Hartford, Conn., which was discovered to be deficient in weight. It had gone through the sweating process, and had lost fifty-six cents of its value. Coin treated in this way generally shows the mark of the wires on which it has rested during the operation, and by these it may be detected.

A HEALTHY TOWN.—In the town of Middlebury, Conn., with a population of seven hundred and sixty, not a single death had occurred for the last seven months. The records of mortality for a number of years prove it to be one of the healthiest localities in the Union. In 1845, there were but two deaths; in 1849, there were but six deaths, all of adults, whose average age was seventy-nine years.

SUPPOSED LOSS OF THE BARK HOLLANDER.—The bark Amanda, just arrived at Boston from Palermo, passed, on the 24th November, in latitude 41 05, longitude 25 10, portions of the wreck of a large vessel, comprising spars, timbers, planks, part of the bel ween decks, and bulwarks painted white. One portion of the bulwark had the word "Hollander" in large gilt letters upon it. The bark Hollander, Captain Barstow, sailed from Boston about the 8th of October, for the East Indies, and it is feared that she may be the vessel lost.

IMPORTANCE OF DATES.—The importance of being careful in regard to dates, is illustrated by the fact that no election for Congressmen was held at Bolton, (Mass.) on account, as the Clinton Courant says, of an informality in the warrant, in which the meeting was called for the "second Monday in December next," while the instrument itself was dated in December, thus making the election illegal until December, 1853.

NIAGARA FALLS AND LAKE ERIE.—Professor Silliman, the eminent geologist, discredits the opinion advanced by some, that the gradual wearing away of the rocks of Niagara Falls, may possibly result in draining Lake Erie. In a recent letter, he remarked:

"They will not halt at their present station, but retreat slowly and surely about two miles farther, where they will stop again for an unknown period, and probably forever, since at this place the hard limestone will form both base and top of the falls, and thus stop the rapid destruction of the rock. Some have thought that they would finally reach Lake Erie and that then the lake would be completely drained. Such an event is impossible. At the point already mentioned, the torrent will gradually wear away the surface of the limestone, forming a rapid, and henceforth, Niagara will be one of the lost wonders of the world."

SHIP BUILDING IN NEW YORK.—Mr. Jacob A. Westervelt & Sons have now on the stocks, in course of construction, at their yard, foot of Seventh street, East River, a steamship named the Jamestown. This vessel is being built for the New York and Virginia Steamship Company, to run in connection with the Roanoke, and will be fitted up for the conveyance of passengers and freight. She is 240 feet on deck, 38 feet beam, 16 feet hold and about 1300 tons burden. Two engines are now being built at the Morgan Iron Works. The cylinders are to be 40 inch, with 10 feet strike. The Jamestown will be ready for sea early in the Spring, and is to be commanded by Capt. Parrish, of the Roanoke.

At the same yard is a vessel nearly completed named the Resolute, which is being built for Mr. Miller, of London. This vessel is 150 feet on deck, 32 feet beam, 20½ feet deep, and registers about 900 tons. She is to be launched on the 5th or 6th of January. After the first trip (which will be to China), she will be placed on the line between London and Australia. The Resolute is the first American-built vessel ever constructed to sail under English colors. She will be commanded by Captain Perry formerly commander of the steamship Franklin.

Messrs. Westervelt & Sons commenced laying the keel last week of a new packet ship for Messrs. Spofford & Tileston, of this city, which, when finished, is to be placed in the New York and Liverpool line. This packet ship, it is said, will be the largest running from this port. Her dimensions are as follows: 206 feet length of deck, 42 feet beam, and 20 feet deep. She will be ready to launch the last of next May, and is to be commanded by Capt. Truman, late commander of the clipper ship Golden Gate.

OYSTERSHOUSES IN WINTER.—Very few persons appear to know the value of the sponge in a greenhouse—I mean for the purpose of washing the leaves of all those plants whose leaves are broad enough to admit of it. I took the hint some five years ago from a neighbor, the most successful plant-grower I have ever had the good fortune to know. His plants were always so especially fresh and healthy that I was for a long time puzzled to understand the secret; and he always declared he had no secret. But early one morning I caught him with a pail of clear water, slightly warm, by his side, sponging the leaves of all his choice plants. I said to myself, "I have it." I did more; I went home and practiced it. My plants soon showed, by their aspect, that I was not wrong in believing it to be the real secret of my neighbor's success. [Horticulturist.

VERY DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—About eleven o'clock on Sunday morning, the 26th ult., the Louisville paper mill was discovered to be on fire in the rag-room. The fire spread with extraordinary rapidity, and, though the firemen were promptly on the spot, in less than two hours nearly all the buildings were in ashes. A small portion of the main building, in which was the most valuable machinery, and the engine-house, were saved. The machinery saved is, however, considerably damaged. The mill was owned by Mr. Isaac Cromlie. He estimates his loss at $38,000, upon which he had an insurance of $

A VISION OF YOUTH.... By J. G. Miles.

An old man sat by his cottage door
In the light of the setting sun.
When the reapers homeward bent their way,
Their harvest labor done.
The last light gleamed on the distant hills,
And the valley was in shade—
To a paleness, cradle calm.

Upon the cot, on the soft green sward,
Three grand-children played—
Fair rosy boys, and their sister fair.
A bright-eyed little maid.
The urchins played with their sunny curls
As they laughed, and sported there,
And the old man smiled as his glad sight caught
The gleam of their golden hair.

He sighed, for he thought of the halcyon days
Of his own happy childhood then,
And his pulses bounded, and he felt the fire
Of youth, in his heart again.
The cot of his father rose once more
To bless his wavering sight,
And the view lit up in his failing eye
The long-departed light.

He roamed once more n'er the wood-crowned hills,
And the flowery vales among—
He joined his mates in the village green—
He laughed, and shouted, and sung.
He stood once more in the old hearthstone,
Beside the blazing fire,
And a mother's form above him clung,
And beside him was his sire.

His brothers and sisters stood around—
He heard the loved ones speak,
But his mother's joy was too big for words—
Her tears fell on his cheek!

"He went to-day, dear mother, I pray,"
With choking voice he cried;
"For never again shall my form be missed
From the group at the old fireside."

He strayed with Mary at eventide,
Along the flowery brink
Of a sparkling brook whose limpid wave
The water-lilies drink.
The maid was kind, and the lover asked
No other boon beside
But to clasp her fondly to his heart,
His own affectionate bride!

In youth the Future's a fairy land—
Old age looks on the Past,
But their waking dreams are alike in this,
They are all too bright to last!
With a bounding step, and a ringing laugh,
Few witnessed his path pass;
And the vision fled, as the sunlight fades
When the skies are overcast!

The vision fled, the sun was set,
And the moon was bright above,
But the old man rose with a thankful heart,
For he had something yet to love!

LORE CARLISLE, Ohio.

Great Flood in the Ohio and Tributaries.

IMMENSE DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY

An unprecedented and rapid rise has taken place in the Ohio and its tributaries, and an immense amount of property has been destroyed at different points from Pittsburgh down.

The Louisville Courier of the 20th ult. says:

A vast amount of damage has been done in all directions. The Steam-r Dike, from New Orleans, discharged its load of sugar on the upper wharf last Monday night, but before daylight the river had risen to the sugar and before it could be removed it was greatly damaged. The cargo of the R. M. Patton, consisting of cotton and peanuts, was with the greatest difficulty saved from floating off. The crew of the Eclipse was kept at work all night in rolling her freight back from the encroaching waters.

A coal boat belonging to Eli Leisure, with 12 000 bushels of coal, was sunk in the bend at Jeffersonville, and another boat was torn from its moorings and swept down the falls.

Laborers were greatly in demand yesterday and last night, and fifty cents per hour was freely paid by the steamboat and merchants who had goods contiguous to the river.

The same paper, of the 20th, has the following:

The river continues to rise at a fearful rate, with every appearance of a flood equal to the disastrous overflow of 1847. During the twenty-four hours ending with last evening at five o'clock, the river had risen five feet seven inches in front of the city, and all the houses along the bank of the wharf were submerged, and the river extending a considerable distance the way up the cross streets. From daylight yesterday morning up to four o'clock in the afternoon, the river was rising at the rate of two inches per hour, and from four to eight o'clock it was rising at the rate of one and a half inches per hour.

Last evening the water was in on the first floors of the offices of Wolf Bro., and J. H. Shroeder, on opposite sides of Wall street, and the second floors of many of the houses on Water street were inundated. The entertainment of hundreds of poor families who resided along the river is very great. From the upper wharf, all the way along the creek, and the saw-mills, the whole country is submerged, without a vestige of dry ground to be seen in any direction. Some six or eight acres of lumber are in great danger of being swept off by the flood.

The planing-mill, Flouring-mills, and the Louisiana Hanging manufactory, are inundated, and operations of course suspended. In the lower part of the city, the engine, including the Boiler-makers and Smithers, are all overflowed, and much of their material under water.

The steamers Howard, ship-builders, at Jeffersonville, have just about completed a fine steamer, which was swept off by the flood.

The upper part of all overflowed, and Portland possesses but one spot of dry land, all else, as far as the eye can reach, is a desert waste of waters, all the houses along the shore having the river flowing over their first floors.

At New Albany the park houses are endangered by the bank water, and the hogs on the hooks, and the pork in the cellars, had to be removed. Two of the snag boats on the shore are entirely under water. Capt. I. C. Revell, and the contractors are using every exertion to prevent loss, and have chained the boats down.

The water rises almost as fast as our merchants can remove their goods from their warehouses. C. Duffield & Co., had a force of 90 men at an expense of twenty-five dollars per hour employed twenty-three hours in removing goods from their wholesale warehouse on the river. They removed 40,000 barrels and sustained no loss. At the Farmers' Exchange warehouse 800 hogsheads of sugar, and 1000 barrels of molasses have been stored, by persons who were threatened by the water.

We learn by our telegraphic despatches from Madison last night, that at 9 o'clock, that the river had risen to within eight feet of the flood of 1847, and was then rising at the rate of one and a half inches per hour. The river has risen to within eight feet of the high water mark of 1847, and if the despatch from Madison is correct, the present flood will equal that.

We learn that the pork house of Jarvis & Co., at the upper part of Jeffersonville is likely to be damaged by the back water from Silver creek.

At Madison was quantities of pork have accumulated which are likely to be lost by the flood. Four good steamers were purchased here yesterday to be towed to Louisville by the Jas. Jackson, for the purpose of saving the pork.

We learn from Capt. Bunce, of the Clipper, that immense loss will be sustained below this by the overflow. The corn-cribs are generally kept on the banks of the river and there they were nearly all full. A good deal of the corn was rotted. It will be nearly all lost.

The river has risen sufficiently high to make a passage back at Jeffersonville. It crosses the plank road at Prentice's mill.

THE WHARF.—We consider this a very appropriate time to call the attention of the city fathers to the wharf. If the wharf was a place as a steamboat landing, we should like to see it here. It will be remembered that the wharf suggested in his inaugural the purchase of the property on Water street, between Sixth and Eighth, for a wharf. The matter has not been mentioned since. There is no public landing for steamboats now at all. Some have called Fourth-and, and there their wants are lying upon the ground.

The Cincinnati Atlas of the 20th says: At 7 o'clock last evening, the passenger train of the L. M. Railway left the depot, Mr. Clement, the Superintendent, however, informed the passengers that the probability was, from the rain of yesterday and the snow he had received of the train in the Miami, that the tract at Fresport would be overflowed, and possibly the train could not get through. A few, assured of their haste, but the greater portion of the passengers went on with the train as far as they could go, to learn by telegraph that the down train could not get through to-day, and is by this time in the city. We understand that the Columbus train went safely up.

We visited down this morning, to see how the rise affected our ship-building neighbors. The town of Pendleton, above the upper railway depot, below Columbus, is pretty well submerged. The town of Brooklyn, in Kentucky, is also flooded. The water running through some of the streets. Large rafts of lumber and saw logs above Fulton have come down and have washed away. We learn that Temple had a raft worth $1000, and a raft of Ashcraft's. A raft of plank, worth $1000, was well nigh carried off.

There are now on the stocks, steamboats at the following yards; Tweat Temple's, two at Litherbury's, one at Smith's, one low pressure steamer Jacob Strader, at Johnson's.

The water is now around a portion of each of these, and every effort being made for their safety.

At seven o'clock this morning, one of the sections of the old dry dock, an unimportant part, floated off and went down the river; my question it to show that the popular impression that the Cincinnati dry docks had been swept away is unfounded. They are safely secured.

Most of the manufactories and mills in the bottoms and near the river have been compelled to suspend operations. All the houses on the Levee, from Ludlow to Broadway, and from Main to Western streets, are submerged.

The Times of the 20th adds:

Much valuable lumber has floated away from the yards about Fulton, and if the rise continues, of which there is every evidence, the loss will be inconceivable. At eight o'clock this morning the water had reached the south entrance of the corner of Butler and Front and Pike and Franklin, and was then rising at the rate of two inches per hour. It is up to the cap of the Deer creek bridge, and one foot more will bring it over the top. The scene at the levee is surprising but gratifying. The boats are lying two and three deep, and the prospects for loading and unloading decidedly slow.

The Wheeling river has been higher than it was ever known, to be before. The town of Harrison was submerged, and the canal damaged more than by any previous flood. Several mill dams along the river were carried away and a vast amount of property destroyed.

MR. WEBSTER AND FARMER.—Some years since Mr. Webster stopped at farm Marshfield on a trouting expedition to Scituate, a neighboring town on Cape Cod. On approaching a fine stream, he alighted from his wagon, and just then he met the owner of the farm whose stream he was fishing. "Good morning," says Webster; "fine day, I think." "Good morning," says the farmer, "some one up here, but I don't know what they do get." "Oh, yes," says Webster, "I have got in." says Webster, "and see what success I have had." Webster emptied the basket of the trout he had caught, and the old farmer followed him. Soon Webster was approached. "You have some beg on your farm," says the farmer, "that ain't the worst of it." "Some old further along, Webster says. "You seem to have plenty of mosquitoes here." "Yes," he replied. "Don't like the creek of it." Webster still kept throwing his line into the deep pools, and then said "You have plenty of bites here." "Yes," says the farmer, "and that ain't the worst of it." Mr. Webster, getting somewhat discouraged, in a hot August day, bitten by mosquitoes, scratched by briars, and not raising a single fish dropped his rod, and said "he did'nt believe there was any trout there." "And that ain't the worst of it," says the farmer. "Well," says Webster, "I would like to know what the worst of it is!" "There never was any here!" says the farmer. Mr. Webster enjoyed the joke, and often told it amongst friends. (New York Times.

WASHINGTON, December 27

SENATE.—The Chair laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, with a statement of the unexpected balances of appropriations for the Department.

Also, a communication from the Interior Department with an account of Navy Pension Fund.

On motion of Mr. Weller, the Select Committee on the charges against Mr. Bartlett, the Mexican Boundary Commissioner, were authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. Case submitted a resolution directing an inquiry into the expediency of granting land in Michigan and Wisconsin, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in those States. Adopted.

The Senate took up the bill for the relief of Brown, Russell & Co., and after debate it was passed.

Mr. Owen introduced a joint resolution, directing that the census of California, taken by the State authorities, be printed with the returns of the United States census, and after a long debate it was passed.

A bill for the relief of Thomas H Parsons, who, in 1806, on the coast of Louisiana, was injured in a successful endeavor to save the lives of seven American seamen, among whom was the present Commodore Jones, was taken up and passed.

A motion to adjourn till Thursday was rejected.

The private calendar was taken up, and on a motion to postpone the first bill on it, no quorum voted.

And after a variety of motions, on which no quorum voted, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—A resolution was introduced by Mr. Francis H. Smith, Clerk of the Judiciary Committee, during an investigation of charges against J. C. Watson, District Judge of the District of Texas; which was adopted—yeas 110, nays 24.

On motion of Mr. Stanton, of Ohio, a resolution was adopted, calling for information from the President, relative to claims that have been paid or are still pending, made by Custom-house officers, under a new construction of the law.

Mr. Meacham, of Vermont, moved that 100 000 copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Census, be printed for the use of members, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. Stephens, of Ga., moved that the joint resolutions of the Senate for conferring the brevet rank of Lieutenant General upon Major General Scott be taken up, upon which a call of the House was ordered.

There being only 147 members present, Mr. Stanley of N. Carolina suggested that the member from Georgia should not press the motion in so thin a House.

Mr. Stephens declined acceding, as he thought, whether the House were full or not, members would arrive at a correct conclusion.

The yeas and nays were then taken as to suspending the rules, which was negatived—yeas 74, nays 70—there not being a vote of two-thirds.

A motion having been made to reconsider the vote against the resolution to authorize the superintendent of public printing to employ two clerks and a messenger.

Mr. Johnson, of Arkansas, spoke in favor of the motion, and reexplained at length the duties to be performed by the Superintendent, which he said it is impossible for that officer to perform without the proposed assistance.

Mr. Houston, of Ala., moved an amendment, that the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House each discharge a clerk, whose duties would be superseded if the resolution prevailed, which was negatived.

The previous question having been ordered, the yeas and nays were taken upon the passage of the resolution, which was agreed to—yeas 95, nays 42

Considerable time was spent with reference to a resolution authorizing the receiving of reports of committees, against which there should be no objection, provided that no bill be put upon its passage without the unanimous consent of the House; but there being no quorum voting on the passage of the resolution, the House adjourned at half past two o'clock.

WASHINGTON, December 28.

SENATE.—After petitions, Mr. Dodge, of Iowa, introduced a bill for the relief of the workingmen on the wings of the Capitol.

Mr. Case submitted the following resolution, which was laid over:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, as far as may be compatible with the public interest, any information in the Department of State respecting the establishment of a new British colony in Central America, together with the copy of a proclamation, if received at the said Department, issued by the British authorities at the Ballac, July 17, 1852, announcing that "her most gracious Majesty, our Queen, has been pleased to constitute and make the Islands of Roatan, Bonacco, Utilla, Barbarat, Helena and Morat, to be a colony, to be known and designated as the colony of the Bay of Islands," and signed

By command of Her Majesty's Superintendent,
AUGUSTUS FRED. GORE, Col. Secretary.

And also what measures, if any, have been taken by the Executive to prevent the violation of that article of the treaty of Washington of July 4, 1850, between the United States and Great Britain, which provides that neither party shall "occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or hold dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America."

A bill was taken up granting a pension to Avery Downer, and, after debate, it was passed.

Two or three other private bills were considered and passed, the votes on which had to be repeatedly taken owing to the want of a quorum—the highest number in attendance during the day being thirty-six.

After a short executive session, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE.—On motion the roll was called, when it appeared that there were 147 members present.

After some time had been spent with reference to a motion to withdraw a claim for losses by fire in New York from the Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of referring it to the Committee on Commerce, which was laid on the table, the resolution as to receiving the reports of committees came up, which was pending yesterday when the House adjourned.

Mr McMullen, of Virginia, moved to lay the resolution on the table; and tellers having been appointed, 97 voted in the affirmative, and 48 in the negative—no quorum.

A motion was then made to adjourn; and the yeas and nays having been taken, it was negatived—yeas 10, nays 110.

Tellers were again appointed, but again there was no quorum voting.

Mr. Richardson, of Illinois, moved that the House adjourn; but the yeas and nays having been called, he withdrew the motion.

The yeas and nays being demanded, the Speaker decided that they could not be called when there was no quorum present, except on a motion which involved the transaction of business.

This decision having been appealed against, and a motion being made to lay the appeal on the table,

Mr. Florence, of Pa., moved that the House adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays were taken, and it was carried—yeas 72, nays 66. The House therefore adjourned at a quarter before 2 o'clock.

MORE OF THE ARRESTS AT CINCINNATI.—The Cincinnati Gazette has some further particulars of the arrest of three or four merchants of that city, growing out of the burning of the steamer Martha Washington. After stating that the parties are in confinement at Columbus, awaiting an examination, the Gazette says:

The developments of this strange affair show that some time in the month of December of last year, certain parties bought the steamer Martha Washington, of James McGregor of this city. J. N. Cummings became captain, J. G. Nicholson clerk, and W. H. Holland, mate. The boat was loaded by different parties of this city, and left our wharf in January, and on the 14th of that month, in the neighborhood of Island No. 65, on the Mississippi river, the boat was burned—boat and cargo a total loss.

The charge against the parties arrested is, that they, by collusion with the officers of the boat, with fraudulent bills of lading, and false oaths thereto, obtained insurance in the following offices, when in reality there were few or no goods shipped.

James Chandler had secured $1900 insurance on pistols in the "National" of this city, when the supposition is that none were shipped. The office refused to pay—Chandler sued.

Capt. Cummings secured $4500 insurance on the freight list of the boat in the Fireman's and Mechanics' of Madison. W. B. Cassilly, agent in this city, promptly paid it.

Lyman Cole secured $8000 insurance in the Fireman's Insurance Company of this city, on boots, shoes, and Kossuth hats, said also to have been shipped. This sum was paid by Joseph Lawrence, Esq., before he died.

G. P. Stevens insured $3369 on an invoice of boots and shoes, bought of Lyman Cole, in the Protection Agency of this city. He also insured in the Etna Agency $4874 on goods purported to have been bought of John Edwards. Lyman Cole insured $5500 on boots and shoes in the Cincinnati Agency of the Detroit Insurance Company. Cole sued the company, and this had had a long examination in the Courts of Detroit.

Capt. Cummings effected an insurance through an innocent person, of $4500, in A. S. Chew's, agency of the Phœnix, of St. Louis; also a large amount in the Charleston Company, which is insane.

The Union Mutual, of New York, had $16.000—$4800 on 1500 dozen sheep skins, and $200 on 20,000 white sole leather, said to have been shipped.

Charles Lane & Co., of Boston, innocent parties, advanced Kissane $4800 on the 9th of January, on a policy in the Equitable Insurance Company, of Boston, of $5934, on 300 packages, said to have been shipped on the Martha Washington.

James Lee, of Boston, innocent party, is insured to protect drafts for $5900, on 167 barrels of pork, said to be shipped by Cole, and 83 barrels of pork and 100 tierces of lard, by Kissane.

Adam Chapin effected, as the boat passed Louisville, insurance with the Louisville agency of the Madison Insurance Company for $4200, on 200 cases of boots and shoes said to have been shipped by said Chapin in Cincinnati. This claim was sued for by Kissane.

A thousand rumors are current in reference to every point of this case. The draryman who hauled the goods has acknowledged the perjury. The Mr. Cheney makes his revelations. Mr. Filley, porter of the Chapin, is reported to have been opposed to the scheme, and, to avoid the threats of parties to leave the city, to have secreted himself in Illinois to escape violence; that, on his dying bed, on the 24th of last October, he charged these parties with the conspiracy.

There were other insurances besides those noted, swelling the pretended amount of shipment to an aggregate beyond the reasonableness of ordinary shipments.

IMPERTINENT DECISION.—A Philadelphia dispatch of the 27th ult. says: The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania this morning rendered its decision in the case of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company vs. the Canal Commissioners.

The decision is elaborate, and fully recognizes the right of the canal commissioners, acting for the canal company, to lease the carrying of passengers over the State road. It further denies the right of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to attach cars designed for the accommodation and travel of passengers. The decision, in all respects, fully sustains the claims of the canal commissioners. This case has been pending a considerable time, and the result looked for with much interest.

CLOSE OF NAVIGATION.—The North river steamboats have nearly all been laid up for the winter, and it is stated that there are no boats running above Kingston, N. Y., in consequence of the river having frozen over and the ice being too strong for the boats to make any progress.

JAPAN.—It is estimated by an article in BeBow's Review that the trade of Japan with this country, if she opens her ports, will be worth more than $200 000 000 annually. This is more than the entire value of the annual exports of the United States to Great Britain. The population is put at 50,000,000. The empire consists of three thousand eight hundred and fifty islands lying off the coast of China, having an area of about equal to that of Germany, including Prussia and Austria, or about six times that of the State of New York.

Affairs on the Rio Grande.

The American Flag, (published at Brownsville,) of the 20th ult. has the following:

The last few days have been replete with interest to the citizens of our neighbors, Los Indianos Mexicanos, under the old flag, at least, published an extra, in which he announces as particularly gratifying, that Col. Cruz had driven Carvajal's forces to this side of the river. We have reliable information to the contrary. The facts is, that the prospects of Carvajal are at this moment more promising than they ever were. Instead of a repulse, the whole movement was a ruse de guerre, by which the troops have been, by Trevino, withdrawn from Camargo, in order to admit Carvajal, with the main force, into the latter place. Trevino, it is said, did retire from the town of Reynosa, on the approach of Col Cruz, to a small place called Jocalitos, where he was reinforced by a company under Capt. Villareal, and with this united force they hold the force of Col Cruz in check. We have been furnished with the exact pronunciamento, of the people of Reynosa, and will furnish it to our readers as soon as it can be put in type.

In regard to affairs at Victoria, the Bandera is again in error. We are credibly informed that they are far from being settled—insomuch that we learn expresses have arrived at Matamoras, stating that a severe battle had been fought, terminating on the 3rd inst. in which the revolutionists had been entirely victorious, routing the regular forces with great slaughter, besides capturing all their munitions of war. It is further stated that with the cannon taken in this battle, the insurgents contemplate an immediate march upon Matamoras.

This news is reported to us as having been received by express to-day. We shall soon learn the particulars more in detail.

WEBSTER AND THE HIGHWAYMAN.—A correspondent of the Detroit Free Press gives the following correction of an anecdote about Mr. Webster when riding at night between Washington and Baltimore:

"The anecdote is entirely incorrect, and as it appears to reflect on the courage of Mr. Webster, it is but fair that his memory should have the benefit of the true facts. The following you may depend on as the true version. I have heard it more than once from an intimate friend and great admirer of Mr. Webster, and who was in Congress with him.

"Mr. Webster was one of the passengers in a stage coach, which broke down between Baltimore and Washington. The passengers went to the nearest tavern and there found that there was no other vehicle to be procured for some hours. This was at night, and Mr. Webster being very anxious to proceed on his journey, applied to the landlord for some conveyance; his answer was that he had none, but that a person was about to proceed towards Washington in a gig, and might be induced to give him a seat; but, said the landlord, drawing Mr. Webster aside, 'you may not like your companion, he is the notorious M——, the murderer.' 'Never mind,' said Mr. Webster, 'so will not hurt me.' 'I ask him if he will take me.' M—— was a man who had been tried for a most atrocious and savage murder, and who, although he had been acquitted, was believed by all to be guilty, and went by the name of M——, the murderer. The owner of the gig consented to take Mr. Webster with him, and they started, chatting on various subjects, until suddenly, at a very lonely part of the road, his companion turned abruptly towards Mr. Webster, and said: 'Do you know whom you are riding with?' Without a moment's hesitation, Mr. Webster answered, 'Yes—with M——, the murderer;' and, in his turn, asked: 'And do you know with whom you are riding?' M——, at once answered: 'Yes—with Daniel Webster;' and I believe, too, the only man in the United States who would dare say to me what you have just said." The boldness of the answer sailed the savage spirit of M——, and he often afterwards related the anecdote.

THE FRESHETS AND RAILROAD ACCIDENTS.—We have already mentioned the occurrence of an accident on the railroad near Madison, Indiana. We have some additional particulars from the Louisville Journal and the account of another fatal accident:

The freight train leaving Indianapolis, on the 24th, for Madison, in crossing a bridge seven miles out, got a part of the way across when the bridge gave way, engulphing the locomotive, tender, and six of the ten cars of barrel pork, flour, and wheat, with three men on the train, in the boisterous waters beneath. The engineer and firemen were drowned; their bodies were obtained. The superintendent of the carpenter shop at Indianapolis was lost. Three bridges on this road were destroyed—the bridge where this accident occurred, Doyou bridge, and the one over Hawe creek. Unparalled destruction of corn in all the river bottoms has occurred.

We hear of a similar accident to a freight train going out on the 24th from Indianapolis towards Lafayette, the whole train running into Sand creek, after the bridge had been washed away, and all on board, five in number, drowned.

MARINE DISASTERS AND LOSS OF LIFE AND PROPERTY ON THE LAKES IN 1852.—The Buffalo papers publish a statement of Marine disasters during the past year, together with the loss of life and property caused by them.

The loss of property is large, being $992 659, which is $50,000 greater than any previous year. The loss of life is also large. The Express puts it at 200, which is probably considerably under the actual number. Many persons, who were competent to judge, put the number lost on the Atlantic as high as 300. Of 229 disasters during the year, seven occurred in the month of April, nineteen in May, twenty-four in June, fifteen in July, eighteen in August, twenty-one in September, twenty-seven in October, eighteen in November, (fifty-five in one gale on the 11th and 12th,) and fifteen in December. Six steamers, seven propellers, and thirty-five sail vessels, have gone out of existence entirely.

RECOGNITION BY FOREIGN POWERS OF THE EMPIRE OF FRANCE.—A Paris letter, of the 9th ult., to the NewYork Commercial Advertiser says:

The Envoy of the King of the Two Sicilies was the first to present his credentials to the Emperor. This he did two days before the proclamation, and before he could have applied for them to his sovereign and received a reply. These credentials were forwarded to him in blank six weeks ago, with directions to fill them up and present them whenever the occasion should require it. Lord Cowley, the British Embassador, followed in two days, and M. Firmin Rogier, the Belgian Envoy, the next morning. As I mentioned in my last, none of the representatives of foreign powers have seen or spoken to the Emperor without the renewal of their credentials. A heavy fall took place at the Bourse, day before yesterday, upon a rumor that Austria, Prussia and Russia would not acknowledge the Emperor, or rather his title of Napoleon III.

The Charge d'Affaires of Switzerland has presented his new credentials to the Minister of Foreign Affairs. He will not be presented to the Emperor, of course, in his capacity as charge. The credentials of the Spanish Minister, of the Dutch Envoy, and of the Minister Plenipotentiary of Sardinia, are on their way.

VERY PRETTY.—There are friends for the old maid—the universal aunt! Children love her, and kittens come and lie in the fire-shrine at her feet, and purr. There are pleasant homes where her presence is welcome, and by and by, some poor soul whom she has comforted will put a flower on her grave. But for the old bachelor—heavan help him, for man cares not for him.

THE TELEGRAPHIC FIRE ALARM IN BOSTON.—The Fire Alarm Telegraph of Boston has, since the commencement of cold weather in that city, begun to play some queer pranks, as we understand that in consequence of electricity in the atmosphere, or something else, it has undertaken to manage its own matters, and sound alarms upon its own account. From this source several false alarms have been given. The matter is under consideration, and all that can be done to keep lightning from playing mischief and creating false alarms will be done.

These facts fully demonstrate the superiority of the system of which Mr. T. S. Titcomb, of this city, is the inventor, and which has for some time past been under the consideration of Mr. J. O. Nixon and the other members of the Fire Committee in the Board of Assistant Aldermen. The principle of Mr. Titcomb's invention is the reverse of the Boston system, and as when not in operation the circuit is always open, the electricity in the atmosphere has no effect upon it whatever. We have, from examination, and from witnessing experiments of the most satisfactory character, become very much interested in this invention, and we feel assured that its adoption will prove a great benefit to the city.

FLORIDA GULF AND ATLANTIC RAILROAD.—The Floridian and Journal, of the 25th ult., says that the bill to charter the Central, Atlantic and Gulf Railroad, (from the St. Mary's or St. John's, on the Atlantic, to Pensacola Bay, on the Gulf,) has passed the House, and is now awaiting the action of the Senate of the Legislature now in session in Florida.

It provides (says the Floridian) for a subscription on the part of the State, of two-thirds of the amount of the internal improvement fund, when one hundred miles of the road shall have been completed. The money so subscribed to be expended in the continuation of the road. It is thought the bill will pass the Senate and become a law. But one vote was cast against it on its passage in the House. An important amendment, offered by Mr. Speaker Allison, tended largely to secure this extraordinary unanimity in that body.

IMPORTANT VERDICT IN AN ADVERTISING CASE.—The proprietor of the New York Courier and Enquirer has recovered a verdict of $300 in the Supreme Court of that State, against Henry J. Ibbotson, for advertising. It appears the advertisement, not being marked for any particular number of insertions, was permitted to remain in the paper 150 days, at $2 a day. The defence set up was chiefly that Mr. Ibbotson's orders in respect to the advertisement were not carried out. However, he took the Courier and Enquirer daily, and, as was presumed by the court, saw the advertisement in question, and should have notified the editor to alter or discontinue it. The court ruled that he should have given this notice, and not have expected to enjoy the benefit of the advertisement without paying for it.

A yellow fever panic broke out at Southampton, England, on the arrival there, on the 9th inst., of the West India mail steamer Medway. It having been ascertained that there had been five deaths from that disease on board during the passage from St. Thomas. The total number of cases on board had been seventeen. The Medway was at quarantine at last accounts.

Reports were rife that the fever had broken out in town, but the newspapers discredit them. The British West India steamer La Plata had also had fever on board. A good deal of excitement prevailed at Southampton in consequence of this unpleasant visitation.

THE PARDONING POWER.—The Governor of South Carolina has published a notice stating that he has made it an absolute rule that, hereafter, all petitions for the pardon of a criminal, must be accompanied by the report of the Judge who tried the case.

A RAG SELL.—Among the signs of "civilization" among our red brethren, the Minnesota Democrat says that in a council the other day with Gov. Ramsey, one of the Winnebago chiefs complained that the Chippewa Indians stole seventeen horses from his people some time ago, and what was worse, killed the horses, dried the meat and sold it to them for jerked elk!

Later from Texas

By the arrival, yesterday, of the steamship Mexico Cape Place, we have received Galveston papers to the 20th ult.

The Brazos and Trinity rivers are reported to be very low, and it was reported that several boats were aground.

The U. S. transport steamer Fashion landed eighty dragoon horses at Indianola, on the 19th ult. They were purchased in this city.

The San Antonio Ledger says that last year a therman farmer, in the vicinity of New Braunfels, cleared, from one acre, $500 worth of cigars. A merchant of Bremen, Germany, has pronounced the tobacco of Western Texas second to none but the Cuban for fumigating purposes, and adds his willingness and desire to secure the investment of $100 000 in the product. Several planters on the Medina will apply themselves to its cultivation the coming season.

The Odd Fellows and Masons have completed fine new Halls at Indianola.

The Houston Telegraph says that the engineer engaged in surveying the Houston and Austin Railroad, has completed his estimate for the grading of the first section of the road from that city to the Cypress, and he finds that the average cost of the earthwork will not exceed $800 a mile. The banks of the Cypress are found to be eighty feet above the surface at Houston. The distance is twenty-three miles, consequently the grade will not exceed four feet to the mile.

The San Antonio Western Texan has received later news from Eagle Pass. It says:

By a letter from Eagle Pass, received by a gentleman in this city, we learn that a short time since a party of Mexicans run off a lot of horses belonging on the other side of the Rio Grande. Ed. Stevens getting wind of the fact, went with a party of his friends and captured the horses. He then sent word to the Mexican commander that if he would send him his pistol and other articles taken from him at the time of his arrest, and $50, the horses would be delivered up. It is hardly necessary to say that the requisition was speedily complied with.

Judge Billings Doyle died at Liberty, Liberty county, on the 10th ult. Judge Gayle emigrated from Mobile to Texas in 1841, and was at the time of his death Acting Chief Justice of Liberty county.

One hundred and twenty German emigrants recently arrived at Indianola, and one hundred and twenty-five at Matagorda Bay. They are all direct from Bremen.

A Mexican tells the San Antonio Ledger, that Santa Anna is now in the city of Mexico, and that much ado is made over him. The Ledger does not vouch for the truth of the story, but is inclined to give some credence to it.

STEAMBOAT EXPLOSION—Loss of Life.—The steam packet A. Fuselier, Captain A. D. Denslow, which left New Orleans on Sunday, the 2d instant, bound for Attakapas, burst her boilers on Monday morning last, at 5 o'clock, when off Ship Island, killing outright Mr. Joseph Soler, first mate; J. McCullough, the second engineer, and five of the hands.

The clerk of the steamship Texas has furnished us with the following particulars:

Captain Benslow is badly wounded, having received a compound fracture in the left thigh, his shoulder dislocated, and otherwise injured.

The forword part and upper works of the steamer are a complete wreck.

At 2 e. m the steamship Texas, Capt. Jas. Lawless, on her way from Galveston to this port, discovering the critical condition of the Fuselier, immediately went to her assistance, and succeeded in taking off and bringing to this city all on board, with the exception of three who remained with the wreck.

J. R. Hawley, first clerk, Mr. Adams, second mate, and five hands, had gone ashore for assistance, previous to the arrival of the Texas at the scene of the disaster, and had not returned when she left.

The following is a list of those brought to New Orleans by the Texas:

Captain A. D. Denslow, badly injured; Thos. Lyon, first engineer, slightly injured; Luke Benslow, carpenter, slightly injured; Joseph Silver, watchman, badly scalded; William Turner, third engineer, badly scalded; one fireman, one deck hand, badly scalded and burnt; Mr. Pierre Labarre, passenger, not injured; Mr. Sam'l Megnen, second clerk, slightly injured.

The deck hand mentioned in this last died after arriving in the city.

ACRES OF PORK.—A correspondent of the Louisville Courier says that in East Louisville the five extensive pork houses have five or six acres of barreled pork, piled up three tiers high, in open lots. There are not less than six acres, which would make eighteen acres of barrels, if laid side by side, exclusive of land in barrels, and pork bulked down in the five pork houses, sheds, &c. Besides the above slaughtered hogs, there are five or six acres of live hogs in pens.

Dr. Kane has addressed a note to a Baltimore paper, correcting a statement made by many of the public presses, that he had been appointed a Lieutenant in the Navy, and, as such, would command the "Advance" in the new expedition to the Arctic or Polar seas, in search of Sir John Franklin. Dr. Kane has not received or solicited the commission stated, although the Government has conferred upon him the direction or command of the vessel named; part of the crew of which he will lead in a land exploration when the expedition shall have reached the point at which the ice becomes a barrier to the prosecution of the enterprise by sea. MR. WEBSTER AND THE FRYEBURG ACADEMY.—A proposal has been made to enlarge this time-honored institution, at Fryeburg, Me., by an addition, to be called the "Webster School," and to erect an edifice bearing this name, with an endowment sufficient to make it a teacher's or a scientific and agricultural institute. This is the academy at which Mr. Webster taught school, from January, 1802, until August of the same year, at the rate of $350 per annum. On leaving it the trustees voted him a present of $5, as an acknowledgment of their sense of his services as a teacher.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.—The Washington correspondent of the Charleston Evening News says: "The Washington Monument is now at about a fourth of its contemplated height. There is not that general response from the people which was anticipated, and the work, as a consequence, does not progress with the facility desired. After all, Congress will, by and by, be appealed to for an appropriation to complete the Monument."

TELEGRAPHIC EXPEDITION TO AUSTRALIA.—Among those who intend to leave this country for Australia, in a few days, is Mr. Samuel W. McGowan, late chief operator in the Morse-Buffalo Telegraph Line. He goes to the new El Dorado of the Pacific to introduce the magnetic telegraph in that distant region. It is the intention to build a line from Sydney to Melbourne, and afterwards to Adelaide, which will take the wires around the northern coast of that golden island, a distance of about one thousand miles.

The California trade of Boston, for the prosesent year, is over one hundred ships sent to San Francisco. Most of the ships have been new and magnificent clippers of great toonage, and the finest specimens of naval architecture in the world. Seventeen ships are now up for San Francisco. The vessels from Boston are mostly freighted, and very few are loading on the owners' account. Their cargoes consist of an infinite variety of articles—provisions, lumber, clothing, domestic manufactures of all kinds, and foreign goods.

AMERICAN STUDENTS IN A GERMAN UNIVERSITY.—A letter from a gentleman now studying in Gottingen, says that there are at present twelve Americans pursuing their studies at the "University of Gottlegen," eight of whom are engaged in chamistry. "One-third of the students in the Laboratory," he writes, "are Americans, and they are the most prouising of the lot. All who are here this winter are hard workers."

AN EXTRAORDINARY LAMP.—Among the list of late English patents, is one taken out by Mr. E. Whele, for a candle lamp of very novel character. The lamp has a dial or clock face, and as the candle burns, the hands mark the hours and minutes correctly, and a hammer strikes the time. As a chamber-light for a sick room, it marks the time, and can be set to strike at any given periods, when the patient requires attention.

FROM JAMAICA.—Dates from Kingston, Jamaica, to the 22d ult. have been received in NewYork by the steamer Uncle Sam. The British war steamer Dauntless had arrived at Carlisle Bay, from Port Royal, with 33 cases of yellow fever. Thirteen deaths had taken place on board, and thirteen on shore, among whom were nine officers. The fever had also broken out at St. Lucia, in the garrison. At St. Pierre, Martinique, the French dramatic company which had recently arrived lost sixteen of their number by the fever.

KINGSTON MARKETS—December 21.—Flour is quiet; holders of Philadelphia and Baltimore brands are firm at 32s. 6d @33s.; Baltimore cornmeal at 10s.; mess pork 102s.; beef was very difficult of sale; the supply was large and best brands sold at 40@50s. per half barrel; nothing done in bread; cornmeal was declining under the large supply.

ONE MONTH LATER FROM SANTA FE.—The St. Louis Republican of the 28th ult. contains a telegraphic dispatch from Independence, dated the 27th ult., which says: The Santa Fe mail, as heretofore, reached us in good time, on Thursday last. The news brought by it is unimportant. Business still dull. The spring trade may, however, open up more briskly.

Aubrey had started with his train to California, and five thousand sheep.

News from El Paso and the South is no later than you have received.

The Salt Lake mail for November has been much delayed, doubtless by snow, although some reports have reached us about the loss of the man in charge. We place little reliance in such reports, and hope they may prove untrue.

Our citizens have received intelligence of the transfer of lands to the Southwest route, and the loan of the State credit to the Pacific. It is not exactly in accordance with our anticipations, but satisfactory enough, and hope the directory may see their way clear to an immediate location.

VERITABLE PHENOMENA.—The Jardin des Plantes, Paris, lays present the object of great attraction in a very remarkable phenomenon of vegetation in the conservatory. On the 14th of October, a bamboo put forth a stem, which has already reached the enormous height of nineteen feet, having grown seven or eight inches each day during a month. What is also equally admired, by the numerous visitors who frequent the garden, is a superb carica-papaya, laden with fruit, of which some has arrived at maturity; and a plumeria, covered with blossoms, which will flower toward the end of winter.

PARIS CONCERTS.—The Marshal of Louisville has published a notice that he will prosecute any person giving a prize concert, as they are contrary to law.

DEATH OF THE OLD YEAR.

BY FRANK GRAHAM.

Upon his couch of state the Old Year lies,
A stricken conqueror never more to rise;
The purple of the melancholy past
Is flowing round him while he ebbeth fast:
Beside him rest his sceptre and his crown—
Oh royalty the Old Year goeth down.

All calm we stand beside his dying bed,
No tears—no tears above his death we shed;
Beneath his iron footstep he hath crushed
The living ranks that to his rescue rushed;
And like a tyrant he hath trodden down
The noblest vassals of his regal crown.

His burried march hath rendered sere and bare
The lives that once like magic gardens were—
Like flowers that fall the hoary frost before,
The hopes and dreams he touched return no more:
His step hath been upon our bleeding hearts,
We should be false to weep as he departs.

Fold back the heavy curtain from the pane—
The mild-eight moon looks brightly down again.
But ere her splendors light another sky
The Old Year in his solemn grave will lie—
The Old Year, pause! that mighty name hath power
To strike us pale in life's most brilliant hour.

The pulses of his heart are almost past—
The cold sepulchral-stone will seal him fast,
Yet in the soul's best chamber darkly lies,
The portrait of the year with haunting eyes:
The monarchs of the earth lose power with breath,
But Time, old Time is strong long after death

There lieth gloom upon his stormy brow,
Through coming years to make our spirits bow:
And strength within those stern and solemn eyes—
The strength to waken slumbering agonies;
Upon his image he hath wreaked a spell—
A spell of memory dark as hope's farewell.

The stars roll on; their cold eyes never weep,
For though the year lies wrapt in his last sleep—
The royal year that from the spirit land,
Came down to wear the purple of command;
All crowned with mirth he came—with song and wine—
His reign on all hath marked a weary sign.

The heavens are still, as by death's cloudy shore
The angels stood to bear the Old Year o'er;
But earth rings loud and clear her joyous shout—
The reign of the Old Year is almost out;
Another of the princely years of time
Will don the mantle stained with grief and crime.

The sun may now a brighter promise wear—
Be still, oh earth! the Old Year was as fair;
The angels stand to guard us from his frown—
They cannot take away his kingly crown;
Why then mourn our grinding cares to see;
They speak—"redemption's in eternity."

ON THE RELATION OF INTELLIGENCE TO THE PIETY AND EFFICIENCY OF THE CHURCH.

[Concluded.]

II. The relation of intelligence to the efficiency of the Church in her co-operation with the world.

The papal dogma that the Church is supreme over all temporal States and legislation, however false and rejected, in reference to any organic Church, is both true and admitted of the spiritual body of Christ. The form has fallen off, but the principle survives in new and recognized authority. Secular councils appeal to the conscience of the Church with a care and deference never yielded to Rome, and it is nothing that the appeal is often unwilling or hypocritical. The leaven is penetrating the institutions and sentiments of the world, preparatory to that last process of spiritual chemistry in which the whole is to be leavened. Every recognition of a true principle in legislation, and every real amelioration in social life, is removing obstacles from the path of the gospel. There is evidently a certain mould of life and sentiment, which the spiritual activity of a renewed world would create, and into which it would grow up and develop, as the tree within its bark. If a false form is applied from without, like an iron bark, it will feel the compression, and yield an imperfect and unsymmetrical development. But in proportion as this outward form is perfect, corresponding to the natural form, or yielding to the swelling growth, will the advance be natural and easy. Just in proportion as the political and social organization of the world, and practical views and moral sentiments take the same form which they would have if religion was the sole power moulding thought and action, or in proportion as they yield unresistingly to her plastic power, she will find a rapid and beautiful expansion. No man can have a perfect Christian character, not only while he neglects known duty, but so long as false education, or confused ideas, permit the presence of spiritual or temporal evil, without his consciousness of its incongruity, his expression of his sensibility, or his energetic action. The Church will never have a perfect character so long as hereditary wrongs against God and man, traditional errors in morals and sentiments, bonumb her sensibilities, or form a check to her speaking out and acting out the fulness of the gospel. How gradually have the true principles of civil liberty and the evil of slavery, the spirit of the temperance cause, and of all social ameliorations, been eliminated in the notion and reception of the Church and the State! How much more healthy do we deem the spiritual tone of the American Church, that the corrupting and repressing influences of other national laws and habits are removed! Those who control the legislation and social reforms of this day should let the moral result, as well as the moral principle, of legislation, be not only an unconscious attainment, but the far-seen and calculated issue of prayerful wisdom. Yet what a wide range of information, what power and habit of comprehensive thought, is thus made requisite. Surely the Church needs the wisdom of the serpent.

Inspired by the example of the Church in the person of some of her noblest sons and daughters, irreligious men are devoting themselves with enthusiasm to the work of moral and social reform. But the awakened spirit, confining itself to mere temporal amelioration, shows rather an aversion to be identified with the Church, either in principles or enterprise. It may be philanthropy, but it will not be godliness. It goes forth through the Church as through the world, like an iconoclast of old, and is not over-anxious if it break an arch in smiting an idol. The Church may meet it either by blank denunciations, or, by showing a more excellent way, may retard the too-hurried movement by simple inertia, as a mere "brake" upon the car of progress; or she may lay down a new track, which leads more securely to the goal. The world is listening, though the Church be deaf and dumb. There is no form of infidelity so seductive as this philanthropic materialism. Its benefits are tangible and inspiring to men who have no conception of a spiritual need, and there is a grandeur in its comprehensive plans and perfect promises which fills the soul with chivalrous enthusiasm. Forgetful that the whole lifetime of Jesus was a preparation for the promise of the Father, and a parable of spiritual things, it exults in entire assimilation to him who made the dumb to speak and the lame to walk, and healed all of whatsoever plagues they had. Even if the Church were uninvaded, yet she must lose her controlling influence, and amid such masses of practical scepticism lie like a sunny isle chilled by surrounding icebergs, which blight though they can not penetrate. But within the Church there are hundred smitten with a deep sense of evils long endured, yet shrinking from the leaders most conspicuous in reform, and waiting for better guidance. They must have it, or they will turn from the reiteration of pure principles unapplied to those who show their faith by works. They must not only see what is wrong, but what is right. They must be able to meet sceptical philanthropists on their own ground. They must not only be told that without the pervading, vitalizing influences of religion, this "new creation" would be a world without an atmosphere; but they must see how their labors may avail beneath the hand of the Creator, and so in patience seem to hear it said: "The evening and the morning are [but] the fifth day," and wait until, in his own time, God shall pronounce it very good. Again, we conclude, how wide the knowledge, how clear the intelligence the Church demands!

III. The relation of intelligence to the efficiency of the Church in aggressive operations.

Both in co-operation with the world and in distinct enterprises, the Protestant Church of this country finds weakness as well as security in her democratic organization—democratic so far as regards practical interests. However the system may guard against small evils, yet it seriously impairs for the time being the power of energetic and far-seeing action. Like the republic, the Church has thrown off the supremacy of both despotism and aristocracy, and resolved all power and responsibility into the hands of the individual; but, unlike the State, has retained no checks against the results of popular ignorance or indifference. The mass of citizens may know very little about political economy and national expediences; but they must choose delegates, and may choose wise men, to deliberate for them, and their counsels are laws and their estimates are taxes. But the counsels of the Church on practical operations are purely advisory, and her estimates are referred to each member for ratification. The power of the keys may extort gold from the Romish communion, and the religious establishments of Europe may enforce exactions by civil law, and disburse their funds by government authority; but our Churches have neither the power of superstition nor of law. We have no hierarchy to marshal us to the polls when religious interest are involved in legislation, or to assess with authority, and plan and execute with secrecy and energy. We do not even yield to the law of majorities, or admit the argument of general consent. How obvious that the wisdom and knowledge formerly requisite in a leader of the Church militant is now essential to insure the co-operation of every soldier of the host. Only as each man sees, and feels, and wills aright, can Church operations be sustained and far-seeing and systematic.

A similar difficulty attends the efforts of the Church against the heresies and infidelity of the age. The assertion of the right of private judgment three centuries ago, involved a revolution which has scarcely passed its crisis. For a while, the spirit which spurned the papal anathema yet rested on the decisions of universities and the balance of great names. names. The Church militant set her champions against champions, as Israel against the Philistines. The result was for the time decisive. The host fled or pursued accordingly. And though the change has been rapid, not yet have men lost their reverence for authority and traditional opinions. It has been a blessed arrangement of God's wisdom that it is thus; for while no danger can attend the exercise of private judgment on all points, provided that, in the same proportion, each man is qualified to sift evidence and balance argument, yet, should they awake to full assertion of the right before thus trained, men would plunge into inextricable confusion and error. But awe of antiquity and official assertions is rapidly departing, and we fear especially that those who rely most upon the power of the pulpit do not realize the change in the position of the clergy. Personal esteem for their characters, and an intelligent respect for their office, are, perhaps, increasing; but the authority of their teaching rests only on their clearness and force of argument. It were less perplexing if the controversy thus confided to popular hands were only about Scripture doctrines, to be determined by proof-texts and popular metaphysics; but, in addition to these, we are involved in a contest with the arrogance of headlong physical science and a plausible mental philosophy. There is an exhilaration in the idea of detection and renunciation of old superstitions, and a perverseness of depraved nature, which render these assaults against the foundations of the Christian religion most congenial. If, among the thousands now harping upon some fragment of an infidel theory, some disjointed fact or asserted contradiction, there were a society who could understand the whole theory or relations of things when briefly explained they might soon be met. The accomplished engineer strikes his flag as soon as you take his outpost and command his citadel; but these controversial militiamen will crouch into some corner of a dilapidated fortress, and fancy themselves secure. Clearly as we see the truth that, when evidences are conflicting, men are bound to balance probabilities and search out the truth, yet they persuade themselves that they are excused from any action by their momentary confusion, and therefore perpetuate it. The Church membership must have information and true views upon these topics, or their confidence will tremble, and their moral force be lost. The world must feel that the Church knows its strength of position, and can prove it, not only on stated days and occasions, but in the familiar discussions of the field and the workshop. Those only who have been thrown into personal collision with the arguments of every class of society, can estimate the fatal influence of the cloud of half-truths and "little learning" which hangs over our land, and hovers round the Church.

It is an axiom in mental philosophy, that the sensibilities are invariably aroused by the presence of appropriate objects; and in proportion to their healthful susceptibility, will be the promptitude and energy of the response. It might seem, therefore, that the Church needs only an increase of religious sensibility to the claims upon her benevolence; but it is also true, that our sensibilities are excited only in proportion to the distinctness and vividness with which the object is presented. There is need, therefore, of a clear conception of the moral and spiritual destitution of the world in all its appealing reality. God has not designed that our labors in his cause should be merely in obedience to his command, but that they should be the spontaneous expression of feeling hearts; and men are never moved to action by vague generalizations and ghosts of ideas, but by facts, and statistics, and portrayals of the misery which awaits their sympathies. One day on board a shiver, or in a drunkard's home, would be worth months of general reflection on the sufferings of a wife forsaken, or the horrors of the middle-passage. The returned missionary and traveler thrill with emotion at the mention of distant misery, which are beside unimpassioned. Next to the power of witnessed destitution, or the remembrance in after years, is the force of minute portrayals of locality and circumstances, and the whole scene of wretchedness. Without this abiding conception, the appeals of the press or of the platform may awake a momentary sensibility, but can leave no permanent impression. We require, therefore, that the accurate and full information which sustains the zeal and animates the hopes of the leaders in these enterprises, social or spiritual, shall be imparted to the entire membership of the Church.

Yet even a realizing sense of temporal or spiritual destination, is not all the Church requires. To inevitable calamity we bow in silence, and have no heart to attempt benevolent impossibilities. Evils which the race is indignant to have borne so long, were, nevertheless, felt and uttered ages since, but sternly endured, as resulting from the very constitution of things and the will of the Creator. Even when prophecy foretells that the triumph shall be, not by human skill alone, but by the Spirit of God, the Church, seeing no divine march of things, into which it may throw its forces, waits in anguish and groans, "How long, O Lord, how long?" The thought of the seven hundred millions who have been swept into the grave, while the last thirty years of missionary labor were hardly securing a few thousands, and yet another generation hurrying from us, paralyzes the rising energy. We leave action for prayer. But let the Church once feel that she is laboring in the order of that Providence which delights to prepare, in secrecy and slowness, the sudden wonders of his power; which, when the set time is come, can concentrate all political interests and all commercial enterprises, all of earthly as well as of spiritual influence, to the downfall of all empire and all superstition that would oppose his gospel, and her heart will grow strong in expectation of Him that will come and will not tarry. Let her study that wisdom in which the Jewish Church, scattered, and peeled, and half-heathenized among the nations for weary years, was suddenly made the medium of transition to the heart of heathenism itself. Mark how gradually over the Church, in those dark ages, the cloud of falsehood and superstition gathered, until, in the stifled air, all life seemed sinking, when at once the thunder burst over Germany, and, pealing over Switzerland and France, broke against the Pyrenees and Apennines; rolling northward, it swept over Denmark and Sweden; and reverberating through England, lingered longest among the Grampian hills, and gave sunshine and the pure breath of life. Show how, as along the borders of a western prairie, one may kindle fires at early dawn which in the dampness seem to smoulder, and with slow progress spread but a gradual warmth through the wide-spread verdure; so God is kindling, along the shores of continents and around the isles, a line of fires which may smoulder and spread slowly, until there comes—"the wind that bloweth where it listeth," and the quickened flame sweep like a tide of glory over the heathen world. If the faith of the Church be weak, let her sight be clear. She will not withhold her treasures nor her noblest blood, when she feels that "redemption draweth nigh." With all the piety of the Church, we must have comprehensive views, to reason upon all events of the past, and all changes of the present, and all prospects of the future. How can such breadth of view, such extent of information, be gained, but by careful and diligent study?

INDIAN EDUCATION.—In the late council between the Winnebago chiefs and Gov. Ramsey, Big Bear said that he did not want to see any more schools among his people, because, said he afterwards, education makes the young women bad, and the young men too lazy to hunt, and too much like some of the pale faces to speak the truth, keep sober, or behave themselves like honest. Winnebagoes. Big Bear is considered one of the best men in [Minnesota Dem.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

LONDON, December 10, 1842.

On the 18th of last month, our DUKE was interred with solemn pomp and "circumstance" unparalleled. Not many days before, your WEBSTER, a great man, and famous also, though not elevated on so high and unapproached a pinnacle of glory as our warrior and statesman, was laid in his retired grave, amid mourning scarcely less deep, and equally national, though not so world-universal in the echo of its voice and the shadow of its cloud, and incomparably less ostentatious in its ceremonial. But a little before, and HENRY CLAY descended to his grave, and was joined to the generation of his fathers. With Wellington, has disappeared the last, as the wisest and greatest, of the old regime of statesmen and great officials identified with the career of Britain during the last war, and with the long-subsisting dynasty of Tory rule in the Cabinet. With Clay and Webster, again, we are told, that the old and able and famous school of Whig Federalists has disappeared in your country. So times change, as generations pass away. Things, indeed, it is said, run in cycles, and so they do. Yet amid the ever-recurring cycles, there is still a constant progress; even as the forest tree, while it yearly sheds its leaves and renews its bloom, yet every year takes deeper root, and shows a larger growth.

Yes, the world moves on. And hence it is, that in this country, Protection, at length, is both dead and buried. It was publicly interred at St. Stephens, Westminster, not many days ago; and while Peelites, Whigs and Radicals exulted over its corpse, its cowardly retainers and friends had not even the decency to act as pall-bearers or to mourn in its train, but submitted, with culprit air, after witnessing the cool and contemptuous dissection of the dead, to grace the triumph of their foes in its ignominious interment. Never was humiliation greater or more bitter than that of Mr. D'Israeli in the recent debate. The persevering malignity with which, for his adoption of the Free Trade principle, he had pursued the late Sir Robert Peel, gave peculiar poignancy to the disgrace of his recent surrender. However, the up-shot of the whole is, that in Britain, Protection is forever numbered with the things that were, and as impossible to be resuscitated as the Feudal System or old-fashioned Toryism.

And in America, too, we British are told that Free Trade, as well as Democracy, has triumphed, in the person of your present President. The coincidence is worth noting, whatever be our opinions as to the principles involved, or the worth and general policy of the persons who represent them.

You remember the Russell and Palmerston split last New Year, which, in fact, led to the breaking up of the last Government. It has since been said that Russell and Palmerston have again coalesced. But the late debate on Free Trade shows that at present, at least, these two great chiefs are by no means at unison. And on this occasion, as in the case of the Militia Bill, Palmerston has so acted as to rescue the present Ministry from immediate and unconditional overthrow, without any committal of himself to them or any sacrifice to his own consistency—to cause the defeat of Lord John and his immediate followers, and to secure a brilliant success to himself. The Derby-D'Israeli party, at present, are, of course, the inheritors and representatives of that embittered animosity against Sir Robert Peel, which has characterized the "country-party" ever since the session of 1846, when Peel passed his great Free Trade measure, and put an end to the monopoly in corn. Sir Robert they have been accustomed to call a traitor. Lord Derby, indeed, never spoke in any personal or bitter way of the deceased statesman. But D'Israeli was his most truculent and unscrupulous satirist and enemy, and the party in general spoke and felt as I have stated. And the Free Trade measure they have been accustomed to denounce as impolitic, grossly unjust, and most disastrous to the interests of the country. Yet, on entering into office, this same party has made no attempt to restore Protection. Nay, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, (D'Israeli,) in making his financial statement last spring, really stood metamorphosed at once into a Free Trader, and delivered a speech, plagiarized both in argument and style, from the man whom he had reviled. Sir Robert's conversion to Free Trade took place when he was at the head of a great and able array of followers, and commanded a majority in both houses, and when, if he had been a slave to party feeling or personal ambition, or had valued the reputation of consistency more than the good of his country, he would, as he could, have upheld himself, his credit, (for the moment at least,) his personal and party attachments, and his power, by suppressing his convictions and maintaining Protection. But he sacrificed his reputation with very many, his friendship with some, the devoted partizanship of his followers, his own long-professed opinions, and (in the end) his office, and his chieftainship in the Senate, to do what he believed to be due to the industry, and needful to the prosperity, of his country. Whereas D'Israeli, and such as he, have changed their political and commercial creed in a trice from a consciousness of impotence to carry out their principles in the free of the country, and—to keep their place. The contrast certainly is great, and, in the recent debate on Villiers' motion, Villiers and his friends, (Lord John Russell and Cobden being the leaders of that side,) were resolved to point the contrast in the most emphatic, and, of course, to the Government, the most palaful way, by calling upon the House to pronounce Peel's measure of 1846 a "wise, just and beneficent" measure. To do this with a good grace was too much even for Benjamin D'Israeli's versatility and power of face, and the Government accordingly determined directly to oppose this motion, and to stake their existence as a Cabinet upon the issue of this debate. It was time for "their credit to do this, perhaps prudent also, as there are many who, though not with the present ministry, are far from wishing to see Russell again in office. D'Israeli's counter-motion merely admitted that Free Trade had, in connection with other causes, contributed, through cheapness of provisions, to promote the comfort of the masses of the population, and declared that, having been now affirmed by the decisive vote of the country, it must be accepted by Parliament as a principle of commercial economy not to be reversed. This was the neatest way of extricating his party from the difficulties of their position. This contains an ambiguous resolution, pronounced nothing as to the abstract principle of Free Trade, and said nothing about the Bill of '46. Still, if the contest had eventually turned merely on these two motions, no doubt the Ministers would have been defeated and Villiers' motion carried. But Palmerston came forward with an intermediate proposition, which, while it affirmed, in distinct language, that the present comfort and prosperity of the country are "mainly the result of recent (Free Trade) legislation," said nothing specific about the odious Peel Measure of 1846, and left untouched the question of "compensation" to any classes which might have incidentally injured by that legislation. The difference between this motion and that of Villiers' is not very important. The latter was an emetic, the former a purgative and alterative. To take either must have been not only nauseous to the taste, but very unpleasant in the effect produced upon the system, of those condemned to take it. Finding, however, that there was no alternative between swallowing one of these draughts, and leaving office, D'Israeli and his followers decided to gulp the purgative, and decline to take, on the floor of the House, the emetic. Lord Palmerston's gentlemanly consideration in offering to gentlemen a draught which, though sufficiently powerful and unpleasant, was yet as mildly prepared by the aristocratic physician as the case would admit, seems to have been well taken by the party; for the enormous majority by which the Free Traders consented, and they themselves humbly submitted to Lord Palmerston's proposal, they even count, it would seem, as a triumph for themselves! Yet surely, even in its mitigated form, the humiliation was most complete, and the mortification of the defeated party must have been most intense. Mr. Villiers' motion lost in a fuller house than has almost ever been known, by a majority of thirty-three. The final minority in favor of pure and proper protection was reduced to the poor total of fifty-three. So has Peel been avenged, and the bitter personality of D'Israeli been punished. So has Russell been distanced, and Palmerston triumphed.

This great debate, however, was but a prelude to the real business of this brief week's session. On Friday last the Budget came out. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a speech of five hours' length, but sustained in interest throughout with his accustomed ability, made his "financial statement." And, although his statement and proposals contain nothing original, yet so well has the Minister availed himself of appropriate ideas and suggestions, thrown out, at different times, by various statesmen and senators, so skilfully has he pieced the whole together, and so aptly has he provided for the tastes and claims of conflicting parties, that it is impossible to deny to his statement the praise of great ability, not merely as a speech, but as a statesmanlike proposal. It is, indeed, for this kind of thing that the versatile genius of D'Israeli, and his power of mental assimilation eminently fit him. He is not a profound man, but he is emphatically a clever man. He has to a good extent, and far as possible, met the views of the party which brought him into power (Protection in any shape being now out of the question) by proposing to do away with many vexatious and unreasonable imposts which shamefully interfered with the prosperity of the shipping interest, especially the coasting trade; and to reduce one half the duty on malt and hops. This is practically something like compensation for Free Trade. By the latter of these proposals, also, he gratifies the "licensed victuallers" and publicans, and the masses of the population in general, and does some little to atone for the proposed doubling and extension of the house-tax, which will, of course, chiefly fall upon the towns. He further recommends a gradual reduction of the duty on tea to only 1s. per lb. which will please every body. The income tax is to be extended to incomes of £100 a year and upward, and in part to Ireland, which has hitherto exempt from this burden. This will please nobody. A distinction is to be made between income derived from property and that derived from industry. Some concessions and provisions and provisions are to be made advantages to the Colonial Interest. From the surplus revenues of the present year means will accrue for strengthening the navy and the national defences.

This rough sketch will give you some idea of the comprehensive and able scheme of our present Ministry. It was of course prepared in anticipation of the decision in favor of Free Trade which took place a few days earlier. The scheme has a national, a patriotic look, which will help it much. It will please the landed interest, and the shipping interest, and the manufacturing masses. It can hardly much displease the manufacturers themselves. But the middling and lower class of tradesmen and salaried clerks will be the most likely to object to it strongly. Though even these will find some counterbalance in the greater cheapness of tea and table-beer.

The debate on the Budget comes on to-night, and after a general decision on the principle of the measure has been given by House, Parliament will be adjourned until after Christmas.

Emigration is still going on faster than ever. Wages here are rising, and at the same time gold from Australia is rapidly flowing into the country. Every interest is doing well, most are greatly prospering.

The Rev. R. Young has arrived (ten days ago) in London from Lisbon. All the mission party follow him, and will be here in a few days. The Packet Company give them a fresh start, and another passage in a more likely vessel, paying all expenses.

The Deputation to Florence in behalf of the Madial has returned, and their report to the Protestant Alliance as to the issue of their mission has been published. Eminent as they were for rank and character, and representative though they were of the Protestantism not only of Britain, but of France, Germany, Holland, Switzerland and Prussia, his "Imperial and Royal Highness," in a communication as stiff and formal as was at all consistent with courtesy, and as haughty and sky-high as though this petty prince had been the arbiter of kingdoms, has, through his minister, refused to admit the Deputation to an interview, or even to receive the address which the Deputation requested leave to present to him. The Earl of Ilsden had, however, permission (and none but he) to visit the prisoners in their cells. He proceeded to Lucca first, where he saw and conversed with Rosa Madiai, and in a day or two after, to Volterra, a lofty fortress overhanging the sea, fifty miles from Lucca, where he had an interview with her husband, Francesco Madiai. The latter he found ill, and the former very delicate. Both have suffered much from their fifteen month's confinement, and it is to be feared that, if Francesco's condition is not altered before long, his constitution must give way. The prisoners fare poorly, but have air and light, and are not unkindly treated. This affair has made a great sensation on the Continent. The King of Prussia, to his infinite honor, sent a special ambassador, with an autograph letter, to the Duke to represent his views and feelings on this subject. Other crowned heads have not been wanting in the conveyance, though less directly, of their sentiments. The deputation of Christian gentlemen, of so many nations, headed by two English Earls, and including several continental nobles, on purpose to intercede in the case of persons so humble—a traveling courier and his wife—imprisoned for the private exercise of their Bible-reading and Protestant religion, has produced a profound sensation in Italy, and has not a little astonished and confounded the small sovereign who, by an intolerable outrage on the plainest rights of his fellow-men, has raised himself, in a moment, from a position of insignificance, to one of most unenviable notoriety. And the effect of these circumstances on the struggling Protestantism which exists in the very heart of Italy, is likely to be very important. Every where Lord Roden and his companions found themselves in possession of the lively sympathy and almost the veneration of those with whom they had intercourse, or among whom they moved. These feelings were unmistakably manifest in the streets of Florence, and though, for the present, the priest-ridden prince not only refuses to recede, but rather authorizes fresh imprisonments for similar causes, he will be compelled to yield at last. He thought to strike a deadly terror into the heart of young Protestant Italy, but he will rather evoke into action all its hidden life. The Princes of Florence and of Naples, for bigotry and despotism, have now no rivals.

Of the floods that have devastated the Continent and our own island I need not tell you. Such a season is scarcely remembered. We are now paying far dry spring and hot summer. In Methodism here there is nothing new. Across the Channel an ordinance, the effect of which is directly to prohibit the colportage of Bibles and religious tracts, is said to have been promulgated by order of "His Imperial Majesty." But I must not transgress my province. These news reach you another way.

"ONE SIN MAY DESTROY THE SOUL."—It was during a precious season of reviving mercy in N——, that a whole family, consisting of a father and mother and two children, who sat under my ministry, were awakened simultaneously by the Spirit of the Lord. It was a highly respectable as well as amiable family, and soon the mother, with the son and daughter, were rejoicing in hope.

Subbath after Subbath the father would stop to walk with me after church and converse freely and with tears about his soul, and I wondered why he, too, did not find the Saviour precious, as did the others of his household. At last I was informed by some friends, that he was in the habit of using intoxicating drinks. [illegible] receiving this intelligence, I went immediately to see him. Soon he came in, and I saw at once by his glassy eyes and his indistinct and incoherent conversation, that he was intoxicated.

Taking him by the arm I led him into his garden, and said to him, with deep emotion, "Sir, you have been drinking; and I now tell you, that if you do not abandon it, you will lose your soul." He replied, "I do not drink any thing stronger than beer, cider, and wine; and Dr. ——— says this is not wrong." "I care not," said I, "what Dr. ——— says, or any one else; it is clear to me, that unless you abandon them you will lose your soul."

WEARY WORSHIPPERS.

A word of reproof to these, and a crumb of comfort, too, if they will receive it. Saving time and doing things quick has got into the sanctuary. In performing its solemn ceremonies, a "quick" is the word with many of this age. They are "fast men" even in religion. The [illegible] drawn out into the amplitude of seven days, is too long for them; the hymns [illegible] long; the Bible readings too [illegible] become too long. These worshippers are too soon weary—in well doing. They are restless, and look at their watches. If they have any, or turn a glance to the Church clock, if there be one. All [illegible] wish is to say, "It is time to have done with it; this is a dull business; when shall we be through with it?"

General Intelligence.

NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR.—It is well known that the universal "go ahead" Yankee nation has determined not to be outdone by John Bull, and has, therefore, concluded to get up a World's Fair on its own account. Thus far, the auguries of its success are favorable. Foreign Governments have responded warmly to the information of the design, and our own Government has offered every facility and encouragement in its power. The Fair is to be opened at New York, on the second day of May next. The preparations are upon a scale in proportion to the magnitude of the idea. The American Crystal Palace will cover four acres of ground.

In another column the auxiliary committee for the Southwestern States publishes a brief, practical, business-like circular of directions. The gentlemen comprising the committee are residents of New Orleans, and are well known as possessing every qualification of zeal, intelligence and industry. The Chairman of the Committee on Address has the advantage of careful study of the World's Fair at London.

LOW PRESSURE BOATS.—Copl. Shute, of New Orleans, has contracted in New York for a new boat for the Vicksburg trade. She is to have low pressure engines at a cost of $60 000, and the hull to cost $35.000.

A planter near Franklin, La., has gathered this season, eleven hundred and seventy-seven bushels of sweet potatoes, from three acres of land—and left behind, he says, enough to fatten about forty hogs.

AN OFFICE WORTH HAVING.—The fees of ex-Governor of New York, who has just retired from public life, amounted to nearly $14.000 for the past year, and it is said the ex-official gave a sumptuous entertainment on New Year's eve, to a few persons connected with the daily press of the city.

THE MARTHA WASHINGTON AFFAIR.—The steamer Martha Washington conspiracy case is progressing at Columbus, Ohio. The testimony is very strong against the defendants. The statement of Tilley, the partner of Chaplin, (at the time of the transaction,) made upon his death bed, has been admitted as evidence. It gives the particulars of the transaction, and apparently makes all the parties under arrest guilty of the charges preferred against them. The greatest excitement exists in regard to the affair.

A FUND FOR THE ERECTION OF CHURCHES.—An extensive organization has been effected among the various congregational churches throughout the country, for the purpose of raising funds to be applied in the erection of churches in the West, or the assistance of those already established. The money is to be distributed equally among all the churches, $300 being the largest amount which will be given to any one church. The sum to be raised must not be less than $60,000, but it is said that twice that amount has been collected already.

In New York city alone, a large amount was contributed for the purpose on Sunday last. In Dr. Cheever's church the collection amounted to about $1500, and in the Tabernacle to more than $1000. In Brooklyn, the Rev. Mr. Beecher's congregation subscribed $2500, and nearly $1800 were collected in the church of which the Rev. Mr. Storrs is pastor. The well known New York merchants have, it is said, offered to subscribe $10,000, should $50.000 be realized.

WOOL IN THE UNITED STATES.—The Economist says: "By recent scientific researches on the part of Peter A. Brown, Esq., of Pennsylvania, it has been established that the United States can outrival the world in wool as in cotton. Thus Spanish sheep, yielding naturally wool 2000 to the inch, carried to England, degenerated to 900 to the inch, and brought to the United States recovered to 2100, or finer than the original. The fact being once established that our climate and soil produce finer wool than other countries, will give to our manufactures inevitably the superiority in cloths, if the manufacturer is allied in his interest to the grower."

Commodore Charles W. Morgan, who died at Washington a few days since, where he had lately assumed command of the Navy Yard, succeeding Commodore Ballard was the tenth Captain on the Navy list. His age could not have been far from sixty years. Captain Morgan is represented as having been the very soul of uprightness and honor, and was an ornament to the Navy. His services since the war with England have been on the peace establishment, in the command of naval stations at home or of single vessels at sea. He had for some years past been in command of the Mediterranean squadron. To all of these positions he had formed many strong friendships by the courtly and cordiality of his character, and the accomplishments and graces which ever signalized him as a gentleman and officer. Captain Morgan was twice married. His first wife was Miss Read, of South Carolina. The second he married abroad, we believe, and she survives him. He died on the day following that on which the resolution was offered by Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, in the Senate of the United States, to enquire into his conduct, in certain particulars, as Commodore of the Mediterranean squadron.

THE CALORIC SHIP ERICSSON.—It is now one-fifth of a century since Captain Ericsson first brought his caloric engine before the scientific world in London, and it had already been a favorite subject of speculation and reflection with him for many years. The invention excited very general interest, but his main principle was condemned as unsound and untenable by nearly all the scientific men of the day, with the exception of the celebrated Dr. Andrew Ure and Professor Farday. Nothing is at the same moment invented and perfected, and the practical success of the new engine was retarded in consequence of the destruction of its pistons, valves and other working parts, by the oxidation consequent upon the high temperature which it was necessary to keep up in its circulating medium. For twenty years Captain Ericsson has devoted himself, with the enthusiasm of genius and the patient application of science, to the removal of these difficulties and the perfection of his oil-important invention. It has been with him the amusement as well as the work of a lifetime.

DEATHS OF AMERICANS ABROAD.—Information has been received at the Department of State, of the death at London, November 30, of Abraham P. Gibson, for many years Consul of the United States at St. Petersburgh. The U. S. Consul at Elsinenr reports the death of Captain S. B. Reed, and of Charles Claxton.

FEMALE TELEGRAPH OPERATORS.—We see it stated in the papers that the following ladies are telegraph operators—Miss Susan R. Sutherland, in Newark, N. Y.; Miss Electa M. Sheldon, in Jackson, Michigan; Miss Farnsworth, in Concaut, Ohio; Mrs. Fleming, in Newark, Ohio; Miss Wood, in Athlon, Ohio, and a young lady in Dover, N. H.

COMMON SCHOOLS IN PENNSYLVANIA.—We learn from the school report just made to the Pennsylvania Legislature, that there are in that State 9099 common schools, with 7860 male, and 3853 female teachers, and 267,659 male, and 213.719 female scholars. The average cost of teaching each scholar is 42 cents per month, and the total cost of instruction $743.546. The whole amount of school tax levied last year was $982.196, besides the sum of $158,958 appropriated by the Legislature.

THE LATE AMOS LAWRENCE.—It is stated that Mr. Lawrence has, for several years past, given away in charity more than his income. He was busily engaged for several days before his death in packing up clothing and other necessaries for poor and deserving objects. Within a few weeks, he enclosed $100 to a young clergyman of limited means, who had lost his wife, and whom he supposed to be in straitened circumstances.

MEDICINE AND THE RECLAIMED LANDS IN ARKANSAS.—The reclaimed lands in Arkansas, from laying the Mississippi, are enough for a small State or principality. The work done opposite Memphis presents a new and fertile country of large extent, to give future growth to that already flourishing city. More than four millions of acres have been reclaimed, and the work done this season, and yet to be done, will give entire security, says the Memphis Enquirer, to the whole cost, from the Missouri line to St. Helena.

LOUIS NAPOLEON.—"Louis Napoleon," says Victor Hugo, "is a man of middle height, cold, pale, slow in his movements, having the air of a person not quite awake. He has published, as we mentioned before, a tolerable treatise on artillery, and is thought to be acquainted with the manoeuvering of cannon. He is a good horseman. He speaks drawlingly, with a slight German accent. His histrionic abilities were displayed at the Eglington tournament. He has a thick moustache, covering his smile, like that of the Duke d'Artois, and a dull eye, like that of Charles IX."

EVILS OF SMOKING.—A leading medical practitioner at Brighton, England, has lately given a list of sixteen cases of paralysis, produced by smoking, which came under his own knowledge, within the last six months.

Large quantities of lard are being put up this season at Madison and Cincinnati, in tin cans, which are sealed like cans of oysters. They hold as much as lard kegs, cost less, and it is believed are better adapted for the purposes in every particular. They pack closer, and the lard will keep better, so the papers say.

HUMBOLDT.—German papers announce that Herr Humboldt has completed a fourth volume of his "Cosmos;" and the manuscript being in the printer's hand, it is expected that it will shortly make its appearance.

Last Will and Testament of Daniel Webster.

The Boston Courier publishes Mr. Webster's Will entire, as follows:

IN THE NAME OF ALMIGHTY GOD:

I, DANIEL WEBSTER, of Marshfield, in the County of Plymouth, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Esquire, being now confined in my house with a serious illness—which considering my time of life, is undoubtedly critical—but, being nevertheless in the full possession of all my mental faculties, do make and publish this my last Will and Testament.

I commit my soul into the hands of my Heavenly Father, trusting in his infinite goodness and mercy.

I direct that my mortal remains be buried in the family vault at Marshfield, where monuments are already erected to my deceased children and their mother. Two pieces are marked for other monuments, of exactly the same size and form. One of these, to cost $1 per cubic foot, is to be for me, and perhaps I may leave an epitaph. The other is for Mrs. Webster. Her ancestors, and all her kindred lie in a far distant city. My hope is that after many years she may come to my side and join me and others whom God hath given me.

I wish to be buried without the least show or ostentation, but in a manner respectful to my neighbors, whose kindness has contributed so much to the happiness of me and mine, and for whose prosperity I offer sincere prayers to God.

Concerning my worldly estate, my Will must be anomalous and out of the common form, on account of the state of my affairs. I have two large real estates. By marriage settlement, Mrs. Webster is entitled to a life estate in each, and after her death they belong to my heirs. On the Franklin estate, so far as I know, there is no incumbrance except Mrs. Webster's life estate. On Marshfield, Mr. Samuel Frothingham has an unpaid balance of a mortgage, now amounting to twenty-five hundred dollars. My great and leading wish is to preserve Marshfield, if I can, in the blood and name of my family. To this end, it must go in the first place to my son, Fletcher Webster, who is hereafter to be the humediate prop of my house, and the general representative of my name and character. I have the fullest confidence in his affection and good sense, and that he will heartily concur in any thing that appears to be for the best.

I do not see, under present circumstances of him and his family, how I can now make a definite provision for the future beyond his life. I propose, therefore, to put the property into the hands of Trustees, to be disposed of by them as exigencies may require.

My affectionate wife, who has been to me a source of so much happiness, must be tenderly provided for. Care must be taken that she has some reasonable income. I make this Will upon the faith of what has been said to me by my friends, at means which will be found to carry out my reasonable wishes. It is best that Mrs. Webster's life interest in the two estates be purchased out. It must be seen what can be done with friends at Boston, and especially with the contributors to my life annuity. My son-in-law, Mr. Appleton, has most generously requested me to pay little regard to his interests or to those of his children; but I must do something and enough to manifest my warm love and attachment to him and them. The property here to be spared for the purpose of buying out Mrs. Webster's life interest under the marriage settlement in Franklin, which is very valuable, properly, and which may be sold under prudent management, or mortgaged for a considerable sum.

I have also a quantity of valuable land in Illinois, at Peru, which ought to be immediately seen after. Mr. Edward Curtis and Mr. Blatchford and Mr Franklin Haven know all about my large debts, and they have undertaken to see to once whether those can be provided for, so that these purposes may probably be carried into effect.

With these explanations, I now make the following provisions, namely:

ITEM. I appoint my wife, Caroline LeRoy Webster, my son, Fletcher Webster, and H. M. Blatchford, Esq., of New York, to be the Executors of this Will. I wish my said Executors and also the Trustees hereinafter named, in all things relating to finance and pecuniary matters, to consult with my valued friend Franklin Haven; and in all things respecting Marshfield, with Charles Henry Thomas, always an intimate friend, and one whom I love for his own sake and that of his family; and in all things respecting Franklin, with that true man, John Taylor; and I wish them to consult, in all matters of law, with my brethren and highly esteemed friends Charles P. Curtis and George T. Curtis.

ITEM. I give and devise to James W. Paige and Franklin Haven, of Boston, and Edward Curtis, of New York, all my real estate in the towns of Marshfield, in the State of Massachusetts, and Franklin, in the State of New Hampshire, being the two estates above mentioned, to have and to hold the same to them and their heirs and assigns, for ever, upon the following Trusts, namely:

First. To mortgage, sell or lease so much thereof as may be necessary to pay to my wife, Caroline LeRoy Webster, the estimated value of her life interest, heretofore secured to her thereon by marriage settlement, as is above recited, if she shall elect to receive the valuation in piece of the security with which these estates now stand charged.

Secondly. To pay to my said wife from the rents and profits and income of the said two estates, the further sum of five hundred dollars per annum during her natural life.

Thirdly. To hold, manage and carry on the said two estates, or so much thereof as may not be sold for the purpose aforesaid, for the use of my son, Fletcher Webster, during his natural life, and after his decease to convey the same in fee to such of his descendants as the majority of the said Trustees may elect, they acting therein with my son's concurrence, if circumstances admit of his expressing his wishes, otherwise acting upon their own discretion; it being my desire that the son, Ashburton Webster take one, and his son, Daniel Webster, Jr., the other of the said estates.

ITEM. I direct that my wife, Caroline LeRoy Webster, bure, and I hereby give to her, the right, during her life, to reside in my mansion house at Marshfield when she wishes to do so, with my son, to ease he may reside there, or in his absence; and this I do, not doubting my son's affection for her or for me, but because it is due to her that she should reside at the right of both her husband

ITEM. I give and bequeath to the said James W. Paige, Franklin Haven and Edward Curtis all the books, plate, pictures, statuary and furniture, and other personal property in my mansion house at Marshfield, except such articles as are hereinafter otherwise disposed of, in trust to preserve the same in the mansion house for the use of my son Fletcher Webster during his life, and after his decease to take over and deliver the same to the person who will then be owner of the estate of Marshfield; it being my desire and intention that they remain attached to the house while it is occupied by any of my name and blood.

ITEM. I give and bequeath to my said wife all my furniture which she brought with her on her marriage, and the silver plate purchased of Mr. Rush, for her own use.

ITEM. I give, devise and bequeath to my said Executors all my other real and personal estate, except such as is hereinafter described and otherwise disposed of; to be applied to the execution of the general purposes of this Will, and to be sold and disposed of, or left and used at Marshfield, as they and the said Trustees may find to be expedient.

ITEM. I give and bequeath to my son Fletcher Webster all my law books, wherever situated, for his own use.

ITEM. I give and bequeath to my son-in-law Samuel A Appleton my California watch and chain for his own use.

ITEM. I give and bequeath to my grand-daughter Caroline LeRoy Appleton the portrait of myself by Healey which now hongs in the south-east parlor at Marshfield, for her own use.

ITEM. I give and bequeath to my grand-son Samuel A Appleton my gold snuff-box with the head of General Washington, all my fishing-tackle, and my Seldon and Wilmot guns, for his own use.

ITEM. I give and bequeath to my grand-son Daniel Webster Appleton my Washington medals for his own use.

ITEM. I give and bequeath to my grand-daughter Julia Webster Appleton the clock presented to her grand-mother by the late Hon. George Blake.

ITEM. I appoint Edward Everett, George Ticknor, Cornelius Conway Felton and George Ticknor Curtis to be my Literary Executors; and I direct my son Fletcher Webster to seal up all my letters, manuscripts and papers, and at a proper time to select those relating to my personal history, and my professional and public life, which in his judgement should be placed at their disposal, and to transfer the same to them, to be used by them in such manner as they may think fit. They may receive valuable aid from my friend George J. Abbott, Esq., now of the State Department.

ITEM. My servant, William Johnson, is a free man. I bought his freedom not long ago for six hundred dollars. No demand is to be made upon him for any portion of this sum, but so long as is agreeable I hope he will remain with the family.

ITEM. Morricha McCarty, Sarah Smith and Ann Bean, colored persons, now also, and for a long time in my service, are all free. They are very well-deserving, and whoever comes after me must be kind to them.

ITEM. I request that my said Executors and Trustees be not required to give bonds for the performance of their respective duties under this Will.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal at Marshfield, and have published and declared this to be my last Will and Testament, on the twenty-first day of September, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and fifty-two. [Signed]

DANIEL WEBSTER. [Seal.]

Signed, sealed, published and declared, by the said Testator, as and for his last Will and Testament, in the presence of us, who, at his request, and in his presence, and in the presence of each other, have set our names hereto as subscribing witnesses, the word "our" being erased in the third line from the bottom of the fifth page before signing. THE FLOUR REMEDY FOR SCALDS.—It will be recollected that some of the papers have had a paragraph recommending the use of wheat flour in the case of scalds or burns. A gentleman at Dayton, Ohio, saw it, and the other day, as he writes the Empire, tested it to his satisfaction. He says:

"While at the supper table, a little child, which was seated in its mother's lap, suddenly grasped hold of a cupful of hot tea, severely scalding its left hand and arm. I immediately brought a pan of flour and plunged the arm in it, covering entirely the parts scalded with the flour. The effect was truly remarkable; the pain was gone instantly. I then bandaged the arm loosely, applying plenty of flour next to the skin, and on the following morning there was not the least sign that the arm had been scalded did the child suffer the least pain after the application of the flour."

New York World's Fair.

To the Citizens of Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi Texas Arkansas and Tennessee:

The Board of Directors of the New York Crystal Palace having appointed a committee for the Southwestern States, resident at New Orleans, consisting of Jas. Robb Louchs Bonneau, E. LaSere, W. E. Hosmer, W. N. Mercer, H. H. Wood, A. F. Axson, Manuel White, J. D. H. De Bow, A. Holbrook, A. Walker, C. J. Leeds, Newton Richards, the undersigned, upon the part of said committee, would present the following address:

2. The Fair will be opened on the 24 day of May, 1853 for the exhibition of the industry of all nations, in the splendid structure on Reservoir Square, New York, covering an area of 173,000 square feet, or four acres. The building has been made of bounded warehouse by the removal, and already assurances are given of an excensive representation of foreign industry.

3. The object of the exhibition cannot be subserved without an equal representation of all the great industrial interests of our own confederation, whether in raw materials, manufactured products or in the fine arts. The Fair will be opened to the cereal products of the Northern and Western States, the cotton, sugar and rice of the South; the hemp, tobacco and other miscellaneous products of the West; the mineral resources of all these regions. It is extremely desirable that these great interests should be represented as well as the manufacturing. In order that the New and Old World should be contrasted together, and the two regions mutually instruct and be instructed.

4. Applications for admission of objects of exhibition must represent their nature and purpose, with the number of square feet required, whether of wall, floor or counter. Those objects will be exhibited in motion, the motive power to be furnished by the Association, and applicants must state also the amount of power required. Paintings in frames will be received. Where cities are exhibited, they should be accompanied by the rocks on which they are found, and also, if possible, by plans and sections of the measures in which they lie, and models and drawings of processes or manufactures.

5. Prizes for excellence in the different departments will be awarded under the direction of capable and eminent persons.

6. Applications from any of the States named in this address may be made at any time before the first of March, 1853, and must be directed to the Chairman of the Committee, at New Orleans, complying with all the requisitions in section four above. The applicant must describe with precision—state the time the product will be ready for shipment, the port from which he desires to ship, and must also provide for the expenses incurred upon it in the way of freight, drayage, etc., until delivered into the custody of the New York Board.

7. The committee of New Orleans will decide upon all such applications, and upon receipt of their favorable judgment, the party will be supplied with a certificate to be forwarded to New York at the time of shipment. They desire to be informed by the first of March of the quantity of space which will be required from their division, in order to report to the Central Committee.

8. Citizens of the Southwest, you are invited and earnestly solicited to be represented in this first great American Fair. We have products in all abundance in every department of industry and ingenuity, it we will but send them, sufficient to delight and instruct every observer. We witness comparatively unrepresented at the London Fair, but every consideration of patriotism should induce us to co-operate in this one upon our own soil. We are a part of the nation that must obtain the glory of success or the shame of discomfiture and defeat. Let us unite with our fellow-citizens of the North in this great enterprise, and rely upon their co-operation in any movements we may make hereafter, for similar exhibitions in our immediate neighborhood.

This shall we obliterate local feelings, prejudices and antipathies—strengthen the bonds of amity and nonecord—realize, indeed, that we are one people, with one hope and one inheritance, one faith and one destiny.

J. D. B. DEBOW,
N. LASERE,
A. F. AXSON,
Committee.

New Orleans, Jan. 13, 1853.

Later from Mexico.

We have received papers from the City of Mexico to the 21st ult., from which we translate the following items:

FLOOD AT TOBASCO.—Accounts from Tobasco state that that place had suffered from a great inundation caused by the overflow of the river Grijalva. In the city of San Juan the water was three feet deep in the streets. The Cocoa plantations have suffered greatly.

AMNESTY.—The El Monitor of the 10th December says: A project of a law has been prescaled in the Senate and adopted, granting an amnesty to persons mixed up in the movement of Rebolledo. We do not know the terms in which this project has been conceived. As soon as we learn them we have some reflections to make on the subject.

BRITISH CONSUL.—Charles Whitlow has been appointed British Consul at Anapulco, and received his exequatur from the President of Mexico.

The Chamber of Deputies on the 10th ult. was occupied with the Tehuantepec question.

A proposition was made on the 16th to close the present session of the Congress on the 20th December, but lost by an immense majority in the Chamber of Deputies.

The annual examination of the students of the National College at Jalapa, took place about the middle of December, but the usual premiums were not distributed for want of funds.

On the 15th of December a proposition was introduced in the Chamber of Deputies imposing a tax of five per cent. on incomes and employment, and every thing except manual labor, which, after much debate, was referred to a committee by a vote of 50 to 36.

BILLY BOWLEGS IN FLORIDA.—The Telegraph has already announced that Billy Bowlegs had, with his bands, retired into the swamps, with the intention of resisting all hazards, the effect of emigration. We have the following additional particulars:

It is said that private letters received in Washington, from Florida, state that Billy Bowlegs, and the rest of the Seminole chiefs, had refused to ratify the treaty made with Gen. Blake, and that Billy and his followers, after gathering all the arms they could, had fled. Gen. Blake had proceeded to the Florida Legislature, and asked for the immediate raising of a large number of volunteers to compel the Seminoles to leave. It appears that when Billy got back and informed his people that he had signed a treaty, agreeing to leave Florida, they at once refused to ratify it, and as a means of reducing Billy to obedience, took his wives away from him, and threatened to place another man at the head of their affairs. Billy went to his ward for about four weeks, when he grew in, and told Gen. Blake that he could not help it. Red. The War Department has not yet received official notice of the matter, but will, it is supposed, as soon as it is received, order all the available troops to the scene of difficulty.

FIRE.—The Natchitoches Chronicle of the 4th instant says:

About 12 o'clock on Wednesday night a fire broke out in the house of Mr. J. Poisson, on the southwest corner of Second and St. Denis streets. The origin of the fire is not known, but is supposed to be the work of an incendiary.

The fire communicated to the adjoining house on St. Denis and second streets, and threatened to consume the building on the opposite side of both streets, so intense was the heat. It was first discovered in a room used as a pantry, and so rapidly did the flames spread, that the members of the family had barely time to escape with their lives. Mr. Poisson, in endeavoring to save some of his guns, had his hands severely burned. His house and contents, together with the adjoining buildings, were burned to the ground. Its total loss is estimated at $3000. We understand he had no insurance whatever on his property. Mrs. Poisson's loss, in dresses, etc., is about $400.

Louis Napoleon, it seems, has been playing a successful game for wealth as well as for power. According to a paragraph in the Boston Post:

Since the coup d'etat the French railway shares have advanced almost fifty per cent, while the Paris Bourse has been animated with unwonted speculation. There was something unnatural in all this, and people are beginning to find it out. Louis Napoleon, it is said, did it all—and for his own benefit, politically and pecuniarily. It gave a certain eclat to the Administration, and it filled his purse. When shares, etc., were low, he purchased largely, and then patronized the lines they appertained to. His agents filled London and Paris, and his gains are set down by shrewd and able speculators at $16 000 000. With $16.000.000 in his own chest, what may he not dare? But former defeats have taught him caution; he is not ready, and he can wait. The despots of Europe wait upon him, compliment him, court him, and dread him.

JAKING WITH PARIS.—A cotemporary, in speaking of the "awful waste" of twenty-five casks of liquor poured upon the ground in Maine, remarks that "such an amount of liquor 'properly distributed,'" would have carried the primary elections in two or three wards in New York.

TRUE POETRY.—We find the following beautiful and pathetic lines in a recent number of the New York Tribune. They will be of interest to the lovers of true poetry and to all those who bear an undying remembrance (as the writer of this notice ever must) of the incidents of the mournful tragedy which called them forth:

THE DEATH OF MARGARET FULLER OSSOLI.

BY MARY L. AMES.

O Italy! amid thy scenes of blood,
She acted long a Woman's noble part!
Soothing the dying of thy sons, proud Rome!
Till thou wert bowed to deity of her heart!
When thou hadst fallen, joy no longer flowed
In the rich sunlight of thy heaven;
And from thy glorious domes and shrines of art,
No quick'ning impulse to her life was given.

From the deep shadow of thy cypress hills;
From the swift beauty of thy classic plains;
The Noble-Hearted, with her Treasures, turned
To the far land where Freedom proudly reigns.
After the rocking of long years of storms,
Her weary spirit took'd and longed for rest;
Pictures of home, of loved and kindred forms,
Rose warm and life-like in her aching breast.

But the wild ocean roll'd before her home;
And, blending long and wild its fearful notes,
She thought of mythals who had found their rest
Down in its caverns, silent, deep and lone.
Then rose the prayer within her heart of hearts,
With the dark phantasms of a coming grief,
That "None Should, an I, shall go be brief!"
Together—that the anguish may be brief!"

The bark spread out her pennons proud and free,
The sunbeam frolicked with the wanton waves;
Smiled through the long, long days of the summer sea,
And sung sweet requiems o'er her sunken graves.
Even then the shadow of the fearful King
Hung deep and dark'ning o'er the fated bark;
Suffering and death, and anguish reigned, era sunset
Hope's weary dove back to the longing ark.

This was the morning to the night of woe;
When the grim Doom in its fiercest wrath,
Held fearful contest with the god of storms,
Who lash'd the waves with death upon his path.
O, night of agony! O, awful morn!
That oped on such a scene thy sullen eyes;
The shattered ship; those wretched and broken hearts,
Who only prayed, "Together let us die."

Was this thy greeting longed for, Margaret,
In the high mansions of thy lofty pride?
The welcome sight for, in those hours of grief,
When Pride had fled and Hope in these had died?
Twelve hours' communion with the Terror-King!
No wandering hops to give the heart relief;
And yet thy prayer was heard; the cold waves wrapt
Those forms "together"—and the one word brief!

Thus closed thy day in darkness and in fears;
Thus waned a life, alas! too full of pain;
But O, thou noble woman! thy brief life,
Though full of sorrows, was not lived in vain.
No more a pilgrim o'er a weary waste;
With light ineffable thy mind is crowned;
Heaven's richest lore is thine now in heritage,
All light is gained, thy "kingdom" now is found.

Rochester, N. Y., 1852.

We extract the following from the money article of the Philadelphia Inquirer:

The past year closed with an unusually quiet money market. In former seasons we have witnessed in November and December great stringency in money matters, and very high rates of interest attained on the best securities. On the last day of the past year, although there was an active demand for money, the rate of interest for prime commercial paper ranged from 6 to 7½ per cent. Lo

THE BIBLE'S COMPLAINT.

Am I the book of God! then why,
Oh, man, so seldom is thine eye
Upon my pages cast?
In me behold the only guide
To which thy steps thou canst confide,
And yet be safe at last.

Am I the record God has given
Of Him who left the Court of Heaven,
Thy pardon to procure?
And canst thou taste one moment's bliss
Apart from such a hope as this?
Or feel one hour secure?

Am I the Spirit's voice, that tells
Of all His grace and love who dwells
Between the cherubim?
And will thou slight my warning still?
And strive thy cup of guilt to fill,
Till it shall reach the brim?

Oh, turn, at length, from danger's path,
And kiss the Son, lest in His wrath
The Father rise and swear,
That since, in mercy oft addressed,
Thou still has scorned His promised rest,
Thou shalt not enter there!

Know, that in yonder realms above,
Where fondest sympathy and love
For erring mortals reign,
Ten thousand glorious spirits burn
To celebrate thy first return,
In loud, ecstatic strain.

And hark! from that abyss of woe,
Where tears of grief and anguish flow,
Amidst devouring fire,
What sounds of hopeless wail proclaim
The terrors of Jehovah's name,
The fierceness of His ire!

Oh, sinner! hear that doleful cry;
And learn from sin and self to fly,
Ere justice lifts her rod!
List while thou may'st to mercy's call,
For 'tis a fearful thing to fall
Into the hands of God!

Now, now is the accepted day,
And, shadow-like, it fleets away
On wings of awful speed!
Take up the cross and thou art strong,
Come life, come death! Reject it long,
And thou art lost indeed!

6TH REPORT OF THE LOUISIANA CONF. MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The Report from the Colored Missions of the Louisiana Conference for the past year is as follows:

Pearlsa Mission was served by Rev. T. J. Lang. It includes three plantations, with 94 members, and 65 children under catechetical instruction. Amount collected, $300.

Lafourche Colored Mission was served by Rev. Lewis A. Reed. It is situated on Bayou Lafourche, and embraces eleven plantations. 265 members, and 316 children under catechetical instruction. Total amount received up to date, $283. This mission is in a prosperous condition.

Bayou Black Mission was supplied by Rev. W. J. Ferguson. It includes six plantations, 250 members, and 60 children under catechetical training. Amount collected $260.

Baton Rouge Colored Mission includes three plantations, with 103 members, and 120 children under instruction. It was served during the year by Rev. W. Crenshaw. He reports that this mission could be extended.

Madison Colored Mission was served by Rev. John Pipes. It embraces six plantations with 185 members, and 130 children under instruction. The missionary reports that the negroes gladly receive the Word, and appreciate the labors of the missionary. The amount received was $326.

Bastrop Colored Mission was served in connection with Bastrop Circuit by Rev. Reynolds Trippett. It includes four plantations. The missionary reports that the mission can be extended indefinitely, and that during the year the slaves of the neighboring plantations have attended at the regular appointments of the Circuit in large numbers.

Monroe Colored Mission includes two plantations, 36 members, 30 children under catechetical instruction, and was served by Rev. W. H. Rogers. He reports the spiritual condition of the members to be good.

Caddo Colored Mission includes 272 members and 125 children under catechetical instruction upon twenty-four plantations. It was served during the year by Rev. D. S. Watkins. It contributed to the support of the mission $371 75.

GERMAN MISSIONS IN NEW ORLEANS.

The First German Mission is located in the First District. It has been served during the year by Rev. J. M. Hofer. It numbers 75 members. There are 100 children in the Sabbath School. During the year $631 35 were collected and expended in building a mission chapel and other mission purposes.

The Second German Mission in the Third District. It numbers 55 members, with 40 children in the Sabbath School. It was served during the year by Rev. J. A. Paulo. There was raised in the work during the year $241, which were expended in the support of the mission.

The Third German Mission is in Carrollton, Jefferson Parish. It includes 12 members and 15 children under instruction, and was served by Rev. Mathias Maass. Eighty-four dollars were collected and expended upon the mission during the year.

A fine lot, 66 by 120 feet, has been purchased, upon Dryades street, in the First District, and a new chapel built upon the rear part of the size of 50 by 30 feet.

Rev. J. M. Hofer has collected during the year about $1200 in the bounds of the Alabama Conference, and, some $800 have been contributed in the city of New Orleans, for the purpose of building a brick church for the mission.

These missions are gaining in numbers and influence with the German population every year. They are worthy of all the care and support that have been or may be expended upon them.

THE NEGRO MISSION-FIELD OF LOUISIANA.

What say you, brethren, are not "the Greeks" at the door?" Here are immense numbers of slaves without the Gospel upon plantations from which they do not stir from one year's end to another, or during their lives. They are usually in large bodies; a single plantation can furnish a congregation sufficient to inflame the zeal of the preacher. The Missionary Society might employ three times the present number of missionaries in this field, and then their would not be over one plantation supplied out of every ten.

Few American planters are willing to shoulder the responsibility of denying the Gospel to one human being, much less to one hundred. It is a stupendous oversight and blunder of Christian zeal to raise funds to support missionaries at the rising or the setting sun, and at the same time neglect these fields of ignorance and destitution simply because they are in our own latitude and longitude. We do not place slave missions against foreign missions; let no one, on the other hand, put forth the foreign to the exclusion of the slave.

The present system of support throws the whole risk, and burden, and starvation upon the missionary. He goes to the field, does the work of an Apostle, is called a missionary, but gets his support the best way he can. Men engaged in this arduous, self-denying work ought to be supported if any in our connection ought to be. A gentleman of New Orleans, well-known for his liberality, has this year subscribed "for colored missions" five thousand dollars; yet the present policy does not send a missionary to his own plantation within fifteen miles of the city. In the sugar district money comes in only at the close of the year, and in many cases is not paid the missionary until the March following; so that he must have money enough of his own at the beginning of the year to support himself or family until the year's close.

This has been the system. The Board are glad to report the adoption of another and a better one for the ensuing year.

Hereafter the missionaries are to be supported directly by the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, by the payment of the allowance quarterly. And the missionary thus provided for, is expected and required to make collections from every plantation, and part of his work for the support of the missions to the colored people of the M. E. Church, South, and to pay at once all such amounts collected by him, accompanied with the name of each contributor, to the treasurer of the Conference Missionary Society, or to the Treasurer of the General Missionary Society, to be incorporated in the minutes of the Conference.

The Board congratulates the Conference upon this new feature which the negro mission-field of this Conference assumes from this arrangement.

The Board would also present a notice of such matters and events of the past year as affect Protestant Christianity.

On our side of the Atlantic there have been collected and disbursed: by the American Bible Society $308,744 81; by the American Board for Foreign Missions $257,727 95; by the M. E. Church, South, $120,000. Of this last amount $25,831 61 was raised by a single Conference.

The M. E. Church, North, has received a new impulse in their missionary operations from the zeal and ability of Dr. Durbin, the Missionary Secretary. Their appropriations for the year amount to $210,000, and include items for the setting on foot new missions in Turkey, India, Sweden, Norway and France. Their mission to Germany has been very successful.

The Missionary Society of our own Church employs 120 missionaries to the slaves in the South and in the Colored Missions, and includes 33,378 members. In her Indian Missions there are 3711 members, with 1241 Indian children under religious training. In the China Mission there are three missionaries. Her California Mission is fixed fact, and has become a Conference nearly if not quite as large as our own. The number of the Chinese which is pouring into that State present to the Church a new, practicable, and speedy means of sending the Gospel to China. The Chinese will learn our language, and doubtless many of them will become Christians. It is to be hoped that our Church will have an eye especially to the employment of such means.

A late number of the Chinese Repository gives a list of 150 persons who have been or are engaged in the Chinese missionary field. Of these 73 are now in China, and five are absent on account of health or other reasons. Twenty-five died in the field of labor, or on their passage home.

Of the whole number, forty-seven were Englishmen, eighty-eight were Americans, and fifteen were from the Continent; of these now in China, including the five absent, forty-four are Americans, twenty-three are Englishmen, and five are from the Continent.

The discovery of gold in California and Australia has reversed the poles of society. The most enterprising part of the Anglo-Saxon race is to be found traversing the Pacific, or residing on its shores. Islands and barbarous tribes, remote and almost unknown, are become neighbors to the most enlightened nations of the earth. Australia answers to England and California to our Atlantic States. Between these two points lie the great Archipelago, containing 12,000 islands the fairest portions of the globe, blessed with the finest climate, and teeming with the richest productions of organic and inorganic life. These islands are inhabited by savages, who burn their living captives, eat their parents,* and ornament themselves and their dwellings with human skulls and bones. Their population has been estimated to be forty millions.

The present age is an age of extraordinary emigration and colonization. Every body seems to be going every where. Formerly, barbarism threw itself upon Christianity; but now Christianity is throwing itself upon barbarism, and it will thus regenerate the world. By these rapid means the darkest parts of the world are invaded and civilized. We can not over value our position in California in its relation to present operations in China and our prospective and probable missions to other fields in the Pacific.

In Great Britain the three great societies for irrigating the world have collected and disbursed during the year as follows:

Church Missionary society	$593,372 04
Wesleyan Missionary Society	558,654 94
British and Foreign Bible Society	532,245 20

The Wesleyan Missionary Society has endured the past year a fierce and most unrelenting persecution, and that its collection should have come up nearly to the high mark of the last year shows that the cause of missions has formed a hold in the hearts of Wesleyans as strong as the doctrines of Methodism.

The great event in the history of this Society during the past year is the setting off to themselves the missions in Australia and France. It illustrates the great principle that "wherever the Gospel exists in its vital power, it produces every thing necessary to its own conservation and diffusion." The Rev. Samuel Leigh went out first as missionary to Australia, from England, on Feb. 28, 1815. Now the number of chapels and other preaching places occupied by the Society's agents in Australia and Van Diemon's is 280.

The mission in France has proved far less fruitful, as no form of paganism in any island of the Pacific is such sterile ground for the Word as that of a Roman Catholic community.

The contest between Catholicism and Protestantism in England has waged incessantly during the past year, and many who held place and ate bread in the service of the established church, while they held doctrines not separable from Roman Catholicism, have been compelled by the agitation and the force of public opinion to seek a more honest livelihood by an open filial adherence to Rome. There is probably, in fact, no more Anglicanism in Great Britain than there was five years ago, only it is more distinct now than then; and elements which moved so freely upon each other that those who held the Church before the Bible could not be told from those who held the Bible before every thing, are made to declare their real affinity and are every where ranging about the two opposite poles of the battery. Truth has every thing to hope and nothing to fear from the result. Would that the same process were going on in all Churches that "hold truth in unrighteousness."

The evangelical part of the Established Church and Protestants generally of Great Britian were never more active and spiritual. Great efforts have been made by them to recover Ireland from the despotic sway of the Catholic priesthood, and with great success. In a district in West Galway, where there were not 500 Protestants, there are 6000 converts, and 5000 children attending Scriptural schools.

The Rev. William Marrable, Secretary of the Irish Church Mission, states, on the most reliable authority, that previous to the year 1846 the Roman Catholic population of Ireland, amounting to nearly 7,250,000, was for the most part sunk in the grossest ignorance, idolatry and superstition. The effects of the famine, with its consequent diseases, together with the emigration and conversions, have since so considerably decreased the number of Romanists in the country, that, with the exception of the inmates of the workhouses, (about 500,000) the Protestant population now nearly equals the Catholic population.

This is the great Protestant fact of the year—the wonderful change coming over Ireland. It is likely that in ten years this dun of St. Patrick will have been changed into an abode of peace, of a pure ministry, and a pure Gospel.

In turning to the Continent we find the Romish Church occupying a position in advance of that which she held a year since; indeed, she has not held before such authority and power for evil since the revival of the Order of the Jesuits. The political revolutions which occurred in Europe a few years since have resulted in a strong combination of the various crowned heads for mutual safety. In the States of Rome the weakness of the Pope has forced him to complete dependence upon the bayonets of Austria and France. On the other hand, the inherent weakness of the Governments of France, Austria, Prussia and Spain has forced them to call in the aid of the Catholic Church to keep in check their people by the chains and pains of purgatory.

The Pope has let loose upon them the Jesuits, who are busy as an army of fiends sapping every form of truth. The sway of Jesuitism over the councils of the King of Prussia is notorious, and so strong is the impression that his Majesty had become a Papist, in form, that he has thought it expedient to give a formal denial to a report which his conduct, as a sovereign, ought to have contradicted.

Throughout Germany Romanism makes rapid progress, and is aided by a movement precisely resembling the Tractarianism of England. A Romanizing sect in the Lutheran Church openly teaches Image-worship, and the ritual has nearly displaced the preaching of the Gospel.

The expulsion of Messrs. Wingate and Smith, the missionaries of the Free Church of Scotland, when remembered that they began their mission as far back as 1841, with the consent of the Viceroy, clearly enough indicates the future policy of Austria. Tuscany is in her hands. Thence she has banished Count Guicciardini for the crime of disseminating the Scriptures, and without even pretext of political offence has arrested, tried and condemned to the galleys a man and his wife, for the alone cause, charged and proved, of absenting themselves from the ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church, and of reading in company with others the "pure Gospel"—"il puro Vangelo." This undisguised act of Inquisitorial authority shows the fact that the Church of Rome has power in the the dominions of Austria to do by the hands of soldiers, magistrates, and courts of the State, what heretofore she has done only by the officers of the Inquisition.

A letter has been written to Lord Shaftesbury by the Evangelical Alliance of Geneva, dated Sept. 17, 1852, which shows the alarm that this act of Church and State tyranny has caused the Protestants of Europe. It states: "This sentence on the Madiais, if nothing is done to check it, will have a widely extended result. Solemnly pronounced in the face of Europe, confirmed by the sovereign (who might have used the right of pardon, and refused to do so) this sentence must be considered not as an isolated fact. It is the signal of a fearful transition; a return to the spirit of secular princes, to the errors of the past, a fresh encroachment of the canon law on the legislation of their States, and the first symptom of submission of their conscience to the conscience of the priests, however bloody may be its requirements."

In Hungary there are said to be 1,006,000 Lutherans and 1,847,000 Reformed Lutherans. To this body of Protestants General Haynau has recently marked down an ecclesiastical constitution. He is himself alone—consistory, presbytery, synod and council.

In France, as the Cardinal Archbishop of Bordeaux expressed it, "the Clergy are now enthroned again." Between the spiritual and temporal powers, as the President is pleased to boast, there is now concord and perfect harmony. Herod and Pilate join hands. The soldier and the priest are become all-powerful, and France is half barracks and half convent. The people bear a double yoke.

At Estissac, in the Department of Aube, 5 or 600 persons had abjured Popery, and received the communion at Protestant hands. For more than six months they had held their meetings without molestation, and had begun to build a church. In July last soldiers entered the place of worship and ordered their pastor, M. Recordon, instantly to leave off preaching under the penalty of being led to prison.

Mr. Roussel, a distinguished writer and minister, announces that his work in the Department of Charante is stopt. In fact, all those flocks scattered over the country, but chiefly in the Southern Departments, are now proscribed under the sweeping designation of clubs, or illegal societies, including Wesleyan congregations and class meetings.

The Prince President has suppressed the whole system of Public Instruction. The Church Schools, as we should call them, are to be entirely free from secular control, and placed under the inspection of the Bishops.

This is the great Catholic fact of this year—the Roman dominancy of France.

The alliance between the Kings of Europe and the Pope was never stronger, because never before so mutually for self-preservation. Protestantism is set down to be equally the enemy of monarchy and Popery. Religion has not, at any time since the Reformation, been so identified with politics. In this view of the state of things in Europe, we wish to distinguish between the position of Catholicism and the spread of Catholicism. Contradictory as it may seem, we believe that while the Catholic Church has this year greatly advanced in position, Protestantism, and Protestantism alone, has made real progress.

The extension of Popery is rather seeming than real. The very effort to bring the Romish organization to bear for despotism, and against public opinion, in itself proves the extension and strength of those principles of liberty which are, and always have been, the result of the reading of the Bible. Mr. Macaulay has said, and Bishop Hughes has so quoted him: "That during the last two hundred and fifty years the human mind has been in the highest degree active. * * * Yet we see that during these two hundred and fifty years, Protestantism has made no conquests worth speaking of. Nay, we believe that, as far as there has been a change, that change has been in favor of the Church of Rome." But these distinguished gentlemen forget that in the days of Luther the spread of the doctrine of freedom—civil and religious, independence upon the Pope—was reckoned as the spread of the Reformation, and every community that received this doctrine was reckoned to have been converted to the Protestant faith. By this rule we may ask has Protestantism at any time ever ceased her progress, as Mr. Macaulay has intimated? The recent revolutions in nearly all the states of Europe speak to the point, and tell how far these doctrines have leavened the mass. The fact that every one of these Governments has called to its aid the Order of the Jesuits is proof of the hard pressure which it feels from Protestantism.

The military establishments of Prussia, Austria, and France, and the clerical establishments of the Church of Rome are the greatest exhibitions in the world of the power of mere organization. A few minds wield this power as they will, and they have used it to the utmost to put down by main force the sentiments of Protestantism, principles which oppose the tyranny of Rome over the conscience, and the tyranny of kings over life and property.

In the days of Luther the Protestant cause struggled for existence and bare toleration; now the tables are turned. Pope, and cardinals and kings unite to resist Protestantism, that, if possible, they may maintain their being and power. The rising of the tide can not be seen in the waves which roll in and fall back in undiminished volume; but, as the tide-marks on the shore disappear one after another, we can no longer doubt that the sea is coming in. So, the advance of Protestantism can not be seen in the particular events of the past 200 years; but in the present advanced state of public opinion throughout the world the people of Europe will be forced to fight the battle of conscience before that of republicanism. This is the true order; until they are ready and able to do the former they can neither obtain or maintain the latter.

Meanwhile there is to the Christian of the United States final success in the use of the same means which have so far spread light or freedom—the preaching and sending forth the Gospel, the sending forth the Bible, the cultivation of Godliness at home, and the maintaining peace with all the world. Nothing is so much to be deprecated by him as the attempt to propagate our republicanism by the sword, because liberty implies a Bible, conscience and sound principles, which are not to be promulgated by physical force. They that use the sword shall perish by the sword. And whatsoever would array national prejudice against us would equally hinder our mission to the world as Republicans and Christians.

Rome is organized, Sin is organized, Hell is organized: "The kings of the earth set themselves and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord and against his anointed."

Let there be with us organization, order, glory and achievement, yet not according to the flesh: "Though we walk in the flesh, we do not war after the flesh; for the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds."

Here, in this missionary enterprise, is summed up the mission of the American people to the whole world. Here is room for emulation, for self-sacrifice, for adventure, for expenditure of talent, life and wealth, for a loud, and bold, and true advocacy of the pure doctrines of liberty—the liberty of the Puritans, the liberty of Americans, the liberty of the Bible.

Here, too, in the very heart of this enterprise is the true element of combination, of strong effective union—the love of Christ, which constrains all men and every man to publish the Gospel, to exemplify the Gospel. To hold out to the heathen quickly before our own day closes the offer of pardon, the knowledge of life, and their inheritance in Christ. Congregationalism must yield here to a wider law of union. This work of God is not to be done single-handed. All the energies of multitudes of members and societies must be gathered and merged. Small distinctions, and local tendencies, and short reaching policies must be forgotten. Tongues, people and nations are to be evangelized, and let it be attempted adequately with large gathered love, and prayer, and zeal, and gold.

"The state of the Heathen requires it;
The love of the Church desires it;
The Word of the Lord inspires it.

The M. E. Church, South, has a large membership of souls that have been anointed of God by the Spirit, whose eyes, and love, and language are turned toward Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, "and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judea, and Cappadocia, in Pontus, and Asia, Phrygia, and Pamphylia, in Egypt, and in the parts of Lybia about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome, Jews, and Proselytes, Cretes and Arabians;"

She has as much wealth as any other branch of the Protestant Church;

She has the facilities of a commerce that trades on every coast, and the access of Americans to the nations of the world;

She is well fitted by her form of government for wielding wisely, effectively and unitedly all her resources;

She has a ministry of itinerant habits and willing to go forth to the toil of the missionary;

What more need be said of the capacity of any Church for missionary labor?

Alas! one thing she lacketh; that which he lacked who "went away sorrowful; for he had great possessions."

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

OLIO.

Perhaps you would like, Mr. Editor, a few items of news from this quarter; if so, please take them as they come, without respect to arrangement. Our city is, as you know, a thrifty city. Houses are multiplying in numbers and improving in size and appearance. I am sometimes myself astonished to find neat edifices nearly completed on lots which, a few days before, were bare and vacant. But this is a go-ahead age we have fallen upon, the creations of Alladin's lamp hardly surpassing it.

Our city has recently been visited with a variety of fun-makers and dime-catchers. The floating circus has been lying at our wharf for the accommodation of all pleasure-lovers, and you know they are, for number, like the indwellers of the Gadarian swine. A thing just like that mentioned can develop them in any community. Every palace and hut sends them forth, of every dimension and color. Why, people who, I imagine, have not been at a circus since their bare-foot days, were found among the visitors. Oh, the novelty of the thing! Why, just think of a floating circus—no, a floating palace! We have heard of the Crystal Palace, but who ever heard of the like of this? Doing on the water just like they were on the land! Oh, listen at the bells, the bells, bells, bells!

"What a world of happiness their harmony foretells,
Through the balmy air of night,
How they ring out their delight," etc.*

"Husband, I must go; it will never do to let the wonder of the age pass without seeing it." "Yes, wife, you can go, and I will go with you; get ready the children; let them all go." So they post off to gaze at indecencies and to feast upon vulgarities; and on Sunday, Pa and Ma go to Church and kneel around the communion table. A strange appetite, this, which some people have, which allures them to feast with equal gusto upon evil as upon good.

The last show we had was a circus and menagerie combined. This was just the thing for religious latitudinarians. They would, perhaps, have passed their heads into the circus any way, but the animals being along, made the way smooth and broad. "Oh, there is no harm to look at animals; why, wild animals are God's works; we ought to study these; they were made to look at and admire." (Sister Peggy, aside:) "I don't care a cent for the old animals; I have seen them fifty times; I go in for something lively; I desire to view some of these lords of creation in their stockcuts, and hear master clown dispense his anecdotes and fun." Thus her C——, and brother L——, and neighbor G—— go to see the wild animals, because there is a circus with them. Well may the Scriptures declare that "the children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of light." The former have learned their superiority, and are embracing every opportunity of showing it. They laugh over the gullability of many a weak disciple.

The world has found exactly how to get such to balls and dances. Why, just give it out that a particular room will be set apart for Church members and others who may not desire to participate in the ovening entertainment—Ah, this stratagem brings them; but when they arrive there are so many of the Terpsichorean squad that it is found impossible to get on without appropriating the room set apart for the godly. The proprietors of the house make apologies, but they are excused, for nobody feels grieved. Thus the dance passes off, and all go home gratified; the members of the Church go to their beds too full of the world to be serious, and it is too late to pray.

These shows, dances, and the like, keep many of our city Churches almost all the time spiritually dead. One excitement is hardly over before another is kindling. How few professors of religion exemplify in their lives the principles of Christianity. Many, perhaps I might say more than half of these, are "lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God." They do not for a moment consider the mighty import of that remark of the Saviour, when he says, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me."

How many are "living to the flesh" without considering the nature of that harvest they are finally to reap. It is withering to the heart of the pious to contemplate the spiritual adultery of the Church—its unholy alliance with the uncircumcised. Would to God that we might have a speedy and an effectual riddance of this awful evil.

I think it would be a good plan to pray publicly for the annihilation of all these establishments, calling them by name, which so much damage the religious prosperity of the Church. This plan might call the attention of Christians more to the evil, and lead them to make it more a matter of prayer in private. Without adding more, I remain yours. OBSERVER.

CULTIVATION OF TEMPER.—If happily we are born of a good nature; if a liberal education has formed in us a generous temper and disposition, well regulated appetites, and worthy inclinations, 'tis well for us, and so indeed we esteem it. But who is there endeavors to give these to himself, or to advance his portion of happiness in this kind? Who thinks of improving, or so much as preserving his share, in a world where it must of necessity run so great a hazard, and where we know an honest nature is so easily corrupted? All other things relating to us are preserved with care, and have some art or economy belonging to 'em; this, which is nearest related to us, and on which our happiness depends, is alone committed to chance. And temper is the only thing ungoverned, whilst it governs all the rest."—Shaftsbury's Characteristics.

He gives twice who quickly gives, and a frank favor to a kind heart must surely make more impression than a greater boon wrung from us by long solicitation.

BIBLE MUSIC.

"A time to dance."—

"There is a time to d[ance]" Christians and their child[ren] may balls and dancing parties," do y[ou] us see. In the previous verse we read, "A time to kill;" therefore we may butcher our fellow-men. Equally good logic.

There was "time" when dancing did very well. Our Indian predecessors did very well to dance. It chimed in precisely with their painted faces, their war-whoop, and the sensuality of their whole character and habits. Just train our dancers in the war-whoop, and give them necklaces of enemies' scalps, and we will agree the whole will be, at least, in good keeping.

The "time" of knight-errantry was a better "time to dance" than this. Physical excellence and grace were then the height of ambition. The great man was he who could ride a horse, or throw a lance, the best. Then the toasted woman might be [one] who could manage her feet the best, though she knew nothing of such vulgar acquirements as reading and writing. Dancing is as much a remnant of barbarism as dueling.

When will it be a time to [dance] for Christians and those who have the [fear] for our youth at heart? It will be [a time] ing spends no time or money [in] better employed—when it will [not] vanity or pride, or envy or strife, or impurity; when it will not encourage to [excess] tion to personal appearance and [display] it is divorced from drinking and [carousing] when it leads into good [company] does not encourage keeping late [hours] it never injures the health; when [it] unfit the mind for devotional [exercises] dancing par[ties] can be opened [and] with prayer; when [the] mind increases in love [to] world thinks that Christ[ians] when social feelings [are] not otherwise [cul]tivated: when all [the] "the time to dance."

WESLEY ON STUDY.—Wesley [in a] portance of study on the part of his [preachers] To an indolent one he gave the following admonition, not inappropriate to [these] days: "Your talent in preaching [does not] crease; it is about the same as [two] years ago; it is lively, but [has] little variety; there is no [depth]. Reading only can supply [this]. meditation and daily prayer. [Improve] yourself greatly by quitting [visiting]. never be a deep preacher [without] more than a thorough [knowledge] Fix some [hour] [for] have not; what [is] ward be pleasant. [Whatever] not, read and pray [against] there is no other [way] for all your days. [Be] preacher. Do justice to [your] own soul; give it time and means to [grow]. Starve yourself any longer.

THE DEW OF HEAVEN.—"From [the] of the morning thou hast the [dew] youth." Psalm cx. 3. "Thou [art] the morning is the dew of thy youth." [Ad]ams renders it "thine [offspring] of thy youth." The [psalmist] dently, that the [children] poured out on his Church are [compared] the dew which proceeds from [God] the morning; that is, more [abundant] more reviving, causing the desert [to] as the rose; and, we may say, [keeping] grace fresh and green. The [promise] promises fruitfulness, pleasantness [and] titude.

DOOM OF FALSE TEA[CHERS]. [Wan]derers, to whom is reserved [the] darkness forever. [Some] astronomical critic would [have] false teachers are represented [as] or wandering stars, that is, [those] tice run out into an eternal [night] sun of righteousness; [that] which he warms, illuminates, [and] and so are constantly receding from the [foun]tain of light, love and bliss. Therefore [they] they wander through the blackness of [darkness] ness forever; a darkness unpierced [by] ray from the great sun and centre of [the] moral world—"blackness of darkness" abstract predicated of an abstract, strong and gloomy the expression!

SELF-RIGHTEOUS SOULS.—A [blind]ness, says Rev. Samuel Mat[thew] by such characters better [than] for that of Christ, [to] heard of, read of [in] perhaps, times [when] they [have] of this [re]ligion [is] a man [does] at every [turn] like hand [in] ning by [the] Here [one] a poor [sinner] catch some twig of his [garment] how afraid he is to [see] himself stripped naked; [and] good come to him, and the [Lord] for him.

THE TRUSTING HEART.—"A strong man will [remove] mountains," were [the] dying boy in the city of [Lon]don. "About [a] died he saw [a] could not very well [see] much delighted with [the] rents assured him [that] glimpse of it even [though] the vision [was] ture him. CONFERENCE—PLYMOUTH COLORED MISSION.

[illegible]: In noticing the reports of [illegible] Missions in the bounds of the [illegible] Conference, I find the Plymouth [illegible] was served by myself, credit- [illegible] dollars. This is all right. My [illegible]derscald do more, as that was all the money collected when he left for Conference, and notwithstanding he informed the Conference that more would be collected, yet the Committee could not report what they said he informed.

In consequence of the report, an unfavorable impression has been made on the minds of those who don't understand the matter, and, by the-by, does not place me in a very enviable position, and is rather mortifying to the patrons.

You will recollect that Conference before last I reported two hundred dollars, but had only collected about forty; yet as the money was coming to me in virtue of the plan then in operation, I reported it in prospect, and collected it before May. The last Conference convened more than a month sooner, and I sent up sixty dollars. The plan of apportioning being different, and that being all I had in hand, I could do no more. I would say, for the information of all concerned, that Plymouth Mission will pay two hundred dollars by the first of May, and I will be responsible for it. I know the patrons.

I wish you to insert this notice, or so much of it as will cover the ground, and set the matter in its proper light. The money, when collected, will be paid over to Bro. Shaffner, my Presiding Elder, to be disposed of.

I hope this communication will satisfy all concerned, and no blame will be attached to me, or any impression made which may de[illegible] the character or condition of the [illegible] Mission.

I have commenced, and am prosecuting my labors with all the ability I have. I have been hailed by the negroes with expressions of joy and delight, sufficient to move the heart of the most careless. I pray God that I may have strength and ability to prosecute the great work with success.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, January 22.

THE BISHOPS.

Bishop Andrew and Mrs. A. arrived in the city last week, and are enjoying good health. The Bishop preached on Sunday last, in Carondelet street Church, to as good a congregation as the inclemency of the day permitted. Yesterday, he started, in company with Mr. Richardson, for Attakapas, intending to see for himself that beautiful and interesting portion of Louisiana. He will return in a week or ten days, and then proceed to Georgia. Would that all our Bishops could have leisure and opportunity to turn off from the track of Conferences and see the country for themselves, take needful rest, and refresh the Church with their presence.

Bishop Paine passed through the city early last week, homeward, after accomplishing, in good health, his very long and severe tour of Western Conferences.

Sermon.—The sermon of Dr. Summers preached before the Alabama Conference at its last session, in Marion, and requested by the Conference for publication in the Advocate, will appear next week. Subject: The Apostolic Commission.

Dean Fly.—In an article re-published lately in this journal, from the Methodist Quarterly, (not South,) on the relation of intelligence to the efficiency of the Church, our readers of keen olfactories may have detected the savor of a "dead fly." In some haste in selecting copy, upon the eve of departure for Conference, we overlooked it, and this is our apology to-inch. Like the plague-frogs that crept into the Egyptian beds and ovens and knead-troughs, so abolitionism, in some shape, insinuates itself into Northern Methodist literature. Take out this, and the pot of ointment is good. The writer, perhaps, claims full enough for intelligence. Some suggestions are very worthy of consideration. True it is, that "with all the piety of the Church, we must have comprehensive views, to reason upon all events of the past, and all changes of the present, and all prospects of the future. How can such breadth of view, such extent of information, be gained, but by careful and diligent study?"

Oak Bowery College.—The President, in his communication in another column, brings this Institution fairly and strongly before the readers of East Alabama. We have no idea of its dying out. President Samford has rallied an excellent faculty and able patrons. His energy and capacity for the enterprise will make itself be felt. No such word as fail! We cheer him on heartily in his good work. That there should be any unpleasant rivalry in that wealthy and intelligent section of the Conference between Methodist institutions, would be unfortunate and without cause. There is room enough for all, and a work to do.

QUARTERLY REVIEW, SOUTH.

This number opens the seventh volume of the Quarterly fairly and neatly. Dr. Doggett has a pastoral charge in Norfolk, Va., but gives all the needful attention to the Quarterly—at least, enough to make it worthy of that increased patronage the Conference have decided to give.

PROGRESS OF REFORM.

News comes that the license or no license bill before the legislature of Florida, having passed the senate by a decided majority, has been lost in the house. So, then, those republican legislators are not willing to give to the people of each justice's district the power to declare by vote, whether or not spirituous liquors shall be retailed within their limits! What less could their constituents ask than this power? Perhaps our Florida savans wish to let the license system run long enough to kill off the redoubtable Billy Bowlegs, and his men women, and children. Billy is a hard character, and hard to whip out. May be, the case justifies extreme measures and desperate expedients. But the white warriors had better look out—they may suffer some.

The thrifty town of Aberdeen, Miss., has lately taken "no license" ground and elected officers agreeably thereto.

In our own city it seems that having carried the "no license" with the voters, in the First District and some "wards" beyond, the battle must be fought over with the "officials." Some of them feel scruples in giving the law application in those portions which voted "no license" because other portions and the aggregate vote of the city voted "license." To its friends and framers we believe there is no ambiguity in the phrase of the law. The wards as well as whole cities which vote for it are entitled to its advantages and protection. We hope the "scruples" of these official gentlemen are not such as are made up of three drams. Alas, for the liquor influence! It is felt in high as well as low places.

We copy from a correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin a picture of the increase of drunkenness in that city, and the legal measures by which the evil is sanctioned and perpetuated. Who among our readers is responsible for these license laws: upholds them by his vote and influence!

"The most careless observer of things can hardly have failed to mark the rapid progress which intemperance has made in Philadelphia within the past year. Scarcely a day passes in which the foot-passenger is not compelled to turn aside in the public streets to avoid the rude assault, the contaminating touch, or the profane language of some miserable man, freshly cast forth from the dens of debauch, which now crowd the thoroughfares of our once quiet and orderly city. The most disgusting exhibitions of public drunkenness disgrace alike the broad sunlight of noon and the repose of night. The most degrading of vices, emboldened, as it would seem, by the encouragement afforded to it by the law, has thrown off its mask, and no longer finds it necessary to slink into corners, or to hide itself in secret places; but walks daily unabashed before the public eye, rioting in unrestrained license, and displaying its deformity without a blush. No female can now traverse, even for a short distance, the public highway in the early evening; nay, if she is alone, she will not do it without some peril even by day.

"The parti-colored lights, which, like baleful fires, indicate the sources from which this polluting stream is discharged, glare in close proximity along the extended line of travel. Neighborhoods which were once quiet and respectable have become noisy and disreputable. Places of public amusement are demoralized, and the most retired walks of the citizens disturbed by scenes which disgrace a city that once boasted of its order, sobriety, and refinement. In many localities property is seriously depreciated by the contiguity of nuisances which cannot be abated, because the law fosters them, and the State coins from their vices a miserable bounty. Our youth are corrupted, our public manners depraved, our security invaded, our peace destroyed, our public character sullied, our taxes increased, our property diminished, to sustain an evil, which, if it shall increase for any considerable period at the same ratio in which it has grown within the past year, will entail upon us results which years of exertion will fail to remove.

ANOTHER GONE.

Bishop Ives, of North Carolina, has gone to Rome in person, but his heart went before him. When this report was first published his brother-in-law, Mr. Hobart, endeavored to create a doubt whether the Bishop had actually gone over to Popery. Under that doubt we have not published before the following paragraph, that has gone the rounds of the press:

The Philadelphia Catholic Herald states that the change in Bishop Ives's views occurred before his leaving this country for Europe. "For some weeks past," says the Herald, "this interesting fact has been known privately in this city, although the first announcement of it has been made in the Dublin Tablet. Dr. Ives was received in the city of New York by, we believe, Rev. Dr. Forbes, with whom, we understand, he left a written document certifying the fact, and authorizing it to be made public at any time. Shortly after his reception he sailed for Europe, intending to visit Rome."

It is now said to be a clear case—gone ro(n)ming. It is further understood that he has addressed a letter to his diocese, explaining his course.

What light can our friends about Vicksburg throw on the matter? It seems their Church is in motion, but not in the right direction. They are not going to join us. They elect to go further—and fare worse.

The Artesian Well at Charleston, S. C., has reached the extraordinary depth of 620 feet, without coming to water. A tube has been inserted of six inches diameter, connected by screw joints, the entire distance.

Advantages of Printing.—Mr. H——, a well known metropolitan printer, once told us that on one occasion an old woman from the country came into his printing office with an old Bible in her hand. "I want," said she, "that you should print it over again. It's gettin' a leetle blurred, sort of, and my eyes hain't sot they was. How much do you ax?" "Fifty cents." "Can you have it done in half an hour? Wish you would: want to be get the home: live good ways out o' town." "Certainly." When the old lady went out, he sent round to the office of the American Bible Society and purchased a copy for fifty cents. "Let 'em take a shavin'!" exclaimed the old lady, when she came to look at it. "how good you've done it! It's even-a-most as good as new." "I never see nothin' of our'n as what printin' is!"

METHODIST PRESS.

The Mission Conference.—The last date of the Observer received at our office is the 15th ult. It gives pretty extensive and satisfactory news from the Church in California. The missionaries are scattered abroad through the golden land, at work, and reporting very roadably through their excellent organ. We find in this number an editorial defining the relation of Pacific Conference to the Missionary Society, the substance of which may be of interest to our readers. It is in answer to a correspondent who supposed that the Pacific Conference had ceased to sustain the character of a Mission since April last:

We are certainly held and recognized as a Mission Conference.

It was stipulated and understood both here and in the Atlantic Conferences, that upon the condition that a sufficient number of regular missionaries from those Conferences, each collecting one thousand dollars before starting for California, should be sent out by the middle of April, 1852, to make up, in all, twenty preachers, and their respective missionary funds, we should then cease to be a Mission Conference. But the condition was not met—instead of fourteen, (which number was necessary to make us twenty regular missionaries,) we received nine up to the time of our organization, and subsequently three more.

In view of this failure, the condition which it involved being the only one on which it was stipulated that we should cease to be a Mission Conference, it was our distinct understanding that we remained as heretofore, except that we had organized an Annual Conference.

That this view of the subject is correct, will further appear by the following considerations, viz:

The Secretary of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, Rev. L. W. Schon, D. D., in his Annual Missionary Report, which was made up after receiving the account of our organization as a Conference, and which quotes largely from the same, speaks of the "Pacific Annual Conference" as a "Missionary Annual Conference," (see Seventh Annual Missionary Report, page 116,) and, in his recapitulation, gives our statistics as a mission, and concludes by saying, "We give these statistics here in full, and in our next report of course will return them in the list of our Annual Conferences," (page 137.) And on page 138, he gives, as the last item of recapitulation, the Church, "twenty-one missions, nineteen missionaries, and three hundred members," in California.

Now we have supposed all the while that in view of the fact that our plan was not met, the worthy Secretary and Board of Managers did not feel themselves authorized to strike us from the list of missions, and hence the report above quoted. But the condition before alluded to is now being met, and will be more than met by the meeting of our next Conference: and hence we said in our issue of week before last, that we should "take our position amongst the Annual Conferences," etc.; and we were partly led to this thought by the remark of the Secretary, that he would in his next report return us in the list of Conferences.

In looking over the columns of the Observer, lo! our old acquaintance of Alabama, C. H. E. Newton, turns up again. We were afraid he was dead, or something. Rev. Blythe, writing from Nevada City, says:

On Sabbath evening last, we had quite an enthusiastic temperance meeting in our new church. The meeting was organized by the calling of the Rev. C. H. E. Newton to the chair, who, in a few appropiate remarks, stated the object of the meeting. The throne of grace was then addressed in behalf of the temperance cause. After which, addresses were delivered by the following gentlemen, viz: Rev. A. Bland, Rev. J. Phelps, A. A. Sargent, of the Nevada Journal, and J. R. McConnell, Esq. The addresses were appropriate, and told with a happy effect upon the audience. At the close a pledge was presented, and volunteers called for, when thirty persons came forward and enlisted under the "cold water banner." In addition to this, we have a regularly organized Division of the Sons, which has been in existence for some three months, and is increasing weekly.

Rev. A. Graham, writing from Valecitta, gives an account of depravity that must have horrified even Californians:

Here we had religious service thrice that Sabbath, and some three or four joined the church. We have now a small church building, and a flourishing little society in this place. I learn that there has been here a gang of scoffing infidels, and among them two apostate preachers—one a Baptist and the other a Methodist, who have been in the habit of holding religious meetings for sport, exhorting, praying, inviting mourners to the altar, and administering the sacraments in mockery. The patience and long-suffering of God towards them ceased, not long since, and the small-pox carried five of them into eternity—leaving the other repentant sinners, hard by the gates of death, and under the most solemn promises to reform their lives if spared.

A New Law Called For.—A "Wesleyan" thus interrogates the editor of St. Louis Advocate:

Do you know whether Bishop Paine has decided the question submitted to him at the late Missouri Conference by the Chairman of the Committee on Temperance? It is very desirable to know whether the discipline prohibits our members from engaging in the traffic of spirituous liquors, and if there be such law to enforce it: and if not, to go about securing one that will.

Dr. McAnally replies that he has heard nothing from Bishop P. on the subject. But why put to Bishops such a question, and talk about members trafficking! Put it before the people—talk of citizens, and forbid the traffic by a civil law.

Good Old Psalm Tunes.—The Buffalo Advocate gives the following direction for reviving and using them:

They are sung faster than we usually sing them, and, what is better, by a far greater number of voices. It is a great mistake, to suppose that old tunes should be sung in a heavy, drawling style. Our forefathers, in the Church, were cheerful Christians. A psalm of a dozen verses was but short to them. Hence, as well as from other circumstances, it is clear that they sung in a quicker and livelier manner than is commonly conjectured. The Old Hundred tune is made a dirge in our days, but in theirs it was a joyous and an animating canticle. "All people that on earth do dwell, sing to the Lord with cheerful voice!" In like manner, York tune, which is shelved among the dull and obsolete, was, a little more than a century ago, the liveliest and most popular tune in the entire kingdom. But to hear old tunes to advantage, they must be sung in old style. Not only must they be sung with decent gravity and cheerful sanctity, but by masses of people, by a multitude of voices, "by all the people together," as the original directions state. Six thousand voices together went to be heard at St. Paul's cross; "three or four thousand singing at a time in a church in this city, is but a trifle," said the excellent Roger Ascham.

American Bishop vs. English Poet.—The editor of the Philadelphia Christian Advocate concludes a severe review of Bishop McCoskry's sermon on baptismal regeneration:

Baptism is holy enough and efficacious enough to answer the gracious intentions of its divine author, without human additions or conjurations. It is an ordinance unquestionably of our holy religion, instituted by the Son of God, a short time before he ascended; and by it we are introduced, whether adult or children, into the visible, universal church, and consecrated to the service of God; but alas! there are many baptized infidels, as a poet and priest of the church of England said, "the worse for mending, washed to foulor stains," who never gave any evidence of the regenerating influence of the Holy Ghost; and yet the bishop says: "to guard against failures, the spirit of God is given to every child in baptism, without any exception, not only to begin, but to carry on and complete the great work of their salvation." Who is right, Bishop McCoskry or Dr. Young: or are they both right, and "baptized infidels" really the regenerated children of God?

Appropriations.—Dr. Sehon has just finished a long and toilsome trip of observation and assistance among the Missions west. We congratulate the Secretary on the profitable result of these official and arduous labors and his safe return home. We have his official statement of the missionary appropriations:

1. To the Atlantic Division, embracing Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, Florida and Holston	$34,000
2. Middle Division, embracing Western Virginia, Kentucky, Louisville, Tennessee, Memphis, Mississippi and Louisiann	16,000
3. Western, Division, Missouri, St. Louis, Indian Mission, Arkansas, East Texas and Texas	26,000
4. California	12,000
5. China	10,000
	$98,000
Contingent expenses	2,000
	$100,000

Mr. Cunningham and wife had arrived at Hong Kong, China, on the 25th of September. On the Louisville side of the Nashville and Louisville Advocate, (from which is the above extract,) notice is given of a revival of deep and genuine character, at the Brook street Church.

THE CONFERENCES.

By the favor of Rev. A. M. Box, we were able to publish the appointments of the Texas Conference last week. Brother B. has, so we learn by the Banner, sustained his reputation in Texas as a zealous preacher and agent for the Gospel and good causes. He reports this year from Austin and Bastrop Circuit $405 missionary collection, thus making his Circuit in Texas, as he had made it in West Alabama, the banner one, and showing how largely such things depend upon the preacher as well as the place. Among the life-members made by this sum is one old "Aunt Celia," a colored woman, in good report for faith and good works.

The Banner gives a good account of the Conference, held at Bastrop. It was resolved to publish minutes of the Conference. A sermon on holiness by Rev. R. Alexander, delivered during the session, has been requested for publication with them. The following communicable action was taken in a good cause and right direction:

"Resolved, That the members of this Conference take up collections in their respective charges, at such time as may be most convenient, for the purchase of German books and tracts, to aid in the extension of Methodism, and the spread of a pure Christianity among our rapidly increasing German population.

"Resolved, That a public collection shall be taken up on all the Circuits and Stations of the Conference, in aid of our German Missionaries.

"Resolved, That Brother H. S. Thrall is appointed agent to receive collections and procure the books."

Our correspondent from East Texas having failed us, we are left without items, and can not glean any statistics. Will Philo or N. W. B., or some one, write?

The S. C. Advocate reports the Georgia Conference doing well. The editor thinks the Conference as well supplied as any in the connection with preachers. Nine were admitted on trial at the late session in Athens, on the 15th ult. After all the talk about secession within the bounds of this Conference, the Secretaries reported an increase of white members, 925; colored, 567. The Conference Missionary Anniversary was spirited; about 950 dollars were raised.

In Sunday Schools, there was room for improvement. The Conference showed its appreciation of this cause by appointing Dr. L. Pierce a special agent for Sunday Schools, and an onward movement is anticipated the coming year.

OAK BOWERY (ALABAMA) FEMALE COLLEGE.

Yesterday I received a letter from a member of the Alabama Conference, in which he says, "I have circulated your circulars where I have been, and said what I could for your school, but the impression has gone abroad that Oak Bowery has gone down. This has grown out of the fact, or circumstance, of Brother Russell's leaving there. There is a project on foot now to build a Female College in Tuskeegee—an agent appointed to collect funds for that purpose by soliciting donations, etc. In an address, or speech, delivered in Enon not long since by a friend of this projected Tuskeegee College, it was said, as an argument why a College should be built at Tuskeegee, that Oak Bowery had gone by the board; that the united efforts of its friends, with the learned and talented President Russell at its head, had failed to sustain it. I privately contradicted this statement, but there is still an unfavorable impression against you." A gentleman, a member of the Baptist church, met me in the streets of Oak Bowery yesterday, in whose presence I made a statement of this ungenerous representation. He replied that "the same argument had been used in his hearing but a few days ago in behalf of the Female College (a Baptist institution) in Lafayette," the county town of Chambers county.

A gentleman in charge of a Female School in Georgia has been in our neighborhood soliciting patronage, and representing that different families had promised him their girls as pupils. These families disclaim the promise.

In the midst of this ungenerous warfare, I feel called upon to say a word to the public. Oak Bowery is not dead, and does not intend to be buried alive. She is peaceably disposed to all her neighbors, and offers them the "olive branch" in good faith. She expects to live without a resort to the arts of misrepresentation or slander, which she heartily despises and intends to expose.

The Oak Bowery Female College will resume its exercises on the first Wednesday in February, with as encouraging prospects of success and usefulness as ever cheered its friends. There are ample accommodations for boarders, and a fine prospect of full classes. God is blessing its President with improving health. Miss Emily Bailey, Miss Sarah Starr and Miss Mary Jane Toomer are on the ground, and Miss Sallie F. Toomer is daily expected. We "still live." The spring session will commence on the first Wednesday in February, and, consisting of twenty weeks, will close on Wednesday, the 22d day of June, without any alteration in the published terms.

Respectfully,

January 11, 1853. Wm. F. Samford.

SHREVEPORT CORRESPONDENCE.

The holydays are at hand and I send a few new subscribers for a "Christmas," along with "a happy New Year" to yourself and readers. Probably a great many elegies are already prepared in anticipation of the old year's demise, and as many welcomes to the new, crowd your table. Reckless youngsters are uneasy at the delay, and the grown world, true to the instincts of nature, anxiously waits to the end of "fifty-two." Like an old coat, this date has become threadbare, and all are impatient to shuffle it off for a later style. This is strange when we know how many who shall live to put it on, will be burried in it before it has half worn away.

"Oh blindness to the future! kindly given.
That each may fill the circle marked by Heaven."

So says the moralizing poet, and we heartily agree with him. Were the new year opened to the gaze of all who are about to enter upon its experience, its coming would throw a premature blight upon many hopes, and dispel the wholesome buoyancy of all hearts. It is better to hope and to rejoice while we may.

How far the above strain of moralizing would have been carried it is now useless to guess. It met with its present abrupt termination, and came to this evidently untimely end, by the force of circumstances, and the uncertainty of steamboats. For no sooner had my reeking quill paused upon the last period in order that it might see its way clearly to the next, than the Caddo rang her last bell, and your correspondent hastily pocketed ink and foolscap, and registered—"Woodsman;" destination—the capital. Happily the place and date, those usual epistolary appendages, had been forgotten, and that neglected margin became my license for this continuation.

Once fairly afloat, and rapidly leaving the town behind, a reminiscence was recalled. Nearly two years ago I stood upon the top of a bluff point, within the corporate limits of Shreveport, from which a single view embraced a large portion of the town, and so much of the river as washed its front, and stretched no inconsiderable distance above and below. Above, just where the water seemed to lose itself in the intersecting bends of its wooded banks, was a doughty little steamer, a stern-wheel boat, her jackstaff and bow were apparently buried and tangled in the trees, whose branches seemed to come together there, whilst her labored escapements, and the motion of her wheel, which from its earnest but partially ineffectual revolutions, reminded one of something between a scramble and a kick, made her look, for all the world, like a hunted bear seeking to enter an impenetrable cane-brake. Very soon she was out of sight, but not out of mind. That brave little boat, penetrating hundreds of miles farther the wild Western forests, and carrying news and freight to the remotest settlements, and acting as the representative of civilization amongst the wild and roaming tribes of Indians, struck me as the very embodiment of enterprise and adventure. Many times, at considerable intervals, she returned, laden with hides and game from the prairies; and each time that her shrill whistle announced her coming, I delighted to welcome her to port. At length she ceased to come. For weeks and months I listened for her familiar whistle. Other boats came and went; but no tidings of her.

That she was lost there could be little doubt; but how she met her fate, and by what means, was wrapped in mystery. Visions of rafts, snags, sawyers, brush, tomahawks, and explosions, made up the staple of my dreams for a time. In these wild, imaginative flights I sometimes saw the heroic steamer, environed with drift, vainly struggling for deliverance. At other times, whilst under full headway, I heard a crash; the shock stilled her engine. For a moment she trembled in the current, and then went down. Thus my mind, whether working or sleeping, brooded over the probable fate of the unfortunate boat, and my feelings were nearly as much enlisted for her as were the sympathies of the world in behalf of the lamented knight who, for these many years, has been buried in the polar seas. With the departure of hope came resignation, and with resignation came that kind of forgetfulness which time kindly distils upon the back of human troubles.

If this were a romance I would now begin with another chapter, but facts must wear their own garb. One bright spring morning, not more than a twelve-month ago, whilst walking your levee, I observed near the water's edge a single plank, which had evidently been afloat, and was in danger of soon floating again. There were marks of the jack-plane and paint-brush about it, and prompted by one of those impulses which nobody can describe or understand, I turned it over, partly to remove it from the encroaching tide, and partly to see what was on the other side. You can imagine my surprise when I beheld "Woodsman" written upon it! That plank was an old acquaintance, which I had made several hundred miles from the place of present meeting. It was indeed a part of the lost steamboat—not a fragment else, but the name.

But to return from this digression. Now we are on board, let us look about. The water is high—enough so to be in fine boating condition, and we make good headway. The channel is narrow and crooked in places, and our craft, like young preachers, often gets in the brush. Here and there those hoary politicians, known at pleasure by the names of snags, sawyers and polk-stalks, lift their ugly heads, and whilst the pilot keeps at a respectful distance, he curses Congress, and soliloquizes upon internal improvements.

Red river is rightly named. Red it is—very red at this season of the year—as it crimsoned by the rod which once streched over Egypt, and turned its rivers to blood. A red deposit fills the bottoms and makes the banks. Even the trees, in places, are belted with rouge, a fathom upwards, where the mammoth floods have embraced them. Monotonous and lonely is the trip from the point of departure to the mouth. Wild fowl and alligators relieve it in some degree. Ducks and geese rise before the approaching boat, utter their wild and dismal screams, and not unfrequently the traveling sportsman, from the hurricane-deck, wantons in their destruction.

Less cruel is alligator shooting. These "slow bellies" may be seen, on sunny days, lying in state upon convenient logs, or projecting points near the water's edge, where they regale themselves in the sunshine, and seem to repose in the conscious protection of their own hideousness. By common consent they are outlaws, in alliance with nothing human or animate. There is a zest in drawing a bead upon such monsters, and when the long, heavy rifle bears upon one of them every spectator pauses, even the boat seems to hold its vapory breath; in an instant a report is heard, the alligator slips noiselessly, and apparently by accident, from his basking place and disappears. Then handkerchiefs are waved, and the shout and hurrah are raised over the fallen enemy.

You have heard of that part of the river called Bon Dieu. It is a natural cut-off which begins at Grand Ecore and terminates several miles below. The whole volume of the river now flows through it, and the old channel upon which the town of Natchitoches stands is nearly dry. Unwritten history relates that the naiads and gods of the stream turned its course partly to gratify a grudge which they justly entertained against the ancient but impious town of Natchitoches, and partly to wash out and bring into notice a section of swamp before unexplored. Whether this expedient was suggested on the one hand by a similar one adopted by the great Mede, who turned the Euphrates from the walls of Babylon, and on the other hand by that ingenious device of Hercules, who cleansed the Augean stables by pouring the waves of Peneus through its stalls, or whether it was original with themselves, is no where chronicled.

The same authority which I have, for these particulars, gives the origin of the name. Just where the water was turned into its new course is a high and abrupt mound or bluff, forming an angular projection in the shape of a V, between the bed of the old river and its present channel. A Frenchman, by chance, happened to be on this very spot when the truant and distracted river left the old landmarks, and recklessly ventured upon a new and untried path. The opening and receding billows of the Red Sea did not astonish the Israelites more than this astonished our Gallic hero. Under the circumstances what else could he say, but raise his hands to Heaven and exclaim "Bon Dieu!"

Leaving these tradionary classics, let us pass on. Alexandria is the only town between Grand Ecore and the mouth of the river. This is situated about one hundred miles from the Mississippi. It was probably named after the celebrated emporium of Egypt. There is nothing of interest associated with it besides the name. This happily for the voyager, takes him, in imagination, from the wilds of the West to the sunny Orient, and introduces him to libraries of rare old parchment, to learned men, conquerors and ecclesiastics.

The appearance of the Father of Waters to one who, for a time, has been sojourning upon a tributary, is sublime beyond description. A liege and monarch in its own dominions, the tributary becomes a vassal here, and loses all its distant distinction in the majesty of this unrivalled river. Such an idea of largeness and power is scarcely suggested by the ocean itself. This impression is over the same, though you may have felt it a hundred times before. I have never entered the Mississippi from the mouth of Red river without being reimpressed with the feelings which I experienced when, after a long, fatiguing journey through the prairies of Illinois, I stood upon an Indian mound, in the stillness of a summer's night, and beheld, for the first time, its mighty waves, bathed in moonlight rolling at my feet. The circumstances then were all romantic and peculiar. They cannot be replaced, but the river is the same grand, glorious, overwhelming object.

But of the capital. Your letter has already gone before, and what can I more say? To speak of its State-house, the Penitentiary, its Asylum, its schools, and withal of its hospitality, would require a newly mended pen, and another sheet. And then of the Conference, and the preachers, and the Bishop, and of all their doings, a volume might be written. But I forbear.

Woodsman.

January, 1853.

The Cincinnati steam fire engine was publicly tried again in that city a few days since, and the best fire engine in the city was brought out, strongly manned, to compete with it. In ten minutes the steam was up and the engine in operation. The firemen went to work with the ordinary engine, confident of beating the new-fangled affair. The signal was given—puff! puff! went the steam engine, and away spirted the water. The firemen bore down and up in quick succession, and strained every nerve, but gave up exhausted. The steam engine continued unceasingly for half an hour to throw a vast body in a solid stream of two hundred and twenty-four feet. If then threw two streams of water for half an hour longer, to show its power to keep up steam; and finally to prove that fire may be extinguished in confined places by steam alone, without deluging a building with water, a section of India rubber hose was attached to the boiler, and steam passed off through it. It sent forth a vast volume of steam, sufficient to saturate the air, and penetrate into every crevice where the could possibly lodge, completely extinguishing fire. The machine can up hill, and down hill, and was perfectly manageable in every respect.

Spot on the Sun.—An unusually large spot on the sun is said to be visible. By rough measurement its diameter has been found to be about 33,000 miles, occupying an area on the sun's surface of eight hundred millions of square miles, equal to four times the superficial contents of our globe earth. It serves to give some idea of the stupendous bulk of our solar orb, when such a vast destruction may be made from its luminous surface, and yet any diminution of emitted light be imperceptible.

Obituary.

DIED—In Marion, Alabama, December 4 1852 JOHN HARVILLE, son of Rev. Jno. K. and L. S. Armstrong, aged two years and four months.

MRS. SARAH ANN GREEN, wife of Thomas F. Green, and daughter of Edward Stoudenmire, was born September 2, 1830, and departed this life November 29, 1852, being in her twenty-second year.

At an early age she was converted to God, and in her thirteenth year, as might be expected from the prayers, the precepts and example of her godly parents. Her conversion was clear and satisfactory to herself, and readily manifest to all who knew her. Naturally amiable in her temper, lovely in her person, it is not strange that this imbued to her youthful and exemplary piety, should make her a general favorite. For several years she lived as most young Christians live, only rather more devoted and conscientious. Sometimes on the mountain top, and anon in the vale, hoping, fearing, doubting, ardently desiring something beyond, and yet hardly knowing what or how to obtain it.

In this condition she came to Summerfield school, and mingling with Christians here, many of whom are traveling the high road to life, she sought and obtained the great blessing of perfect love; and though young in years, and modest beyond her age or sex, fearlessly professed it on all proper occasions. She was under my charge as a pupil for three years, I think, and most of that time an inmate of my house, and during all my intercourse with her I know not that I ever had occasion to administer the slightest reproof or even to wish her different from what I always found her.

While other girls were gay and frivolous, she was always mild and sedate; while others were studying to decorate their persons she was careful to adorn herself with a meek and quiet spirit; while others of her age and sex were eager to drink at the stream of worldly pleasure, she sought happiness in the closet in communion with the Father of spirits. In all the relations of life she was an ornament to the Church and an honor to her sex, and even in all her afflictions (for she was a long and sorely tried,) I am informed by those who had a right to know,) she never murmured nor complained, but would repeat with emphasis and delight, "These light afflictions, which are but for a moment, work for me a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

This lived Sarah Green, and now let us see how she died, if, indeed, it may be safe to ask what kind of death has been ordered by such a life; but as it was peculiarly hers to die right, as well as to live right, let us hear: She was perfectly conscious of her approaching end, and frequently spoke of it with composure, and even delight, and expressed that they should send for me to preach her funeral, and selected the text herself and how appropriate! "I have glorified thee on the earth, I have finished the work thou gavest me to do." When conscious that death was rapidly approaching, she called all around her, and then exclaimed, "If this is death it is sweet to die. Long," said she, "have I hoped to get to heaven. I had faith believe that I should get there, but now I know it." Having addressed a few appropriate remarks to each of her brothers and sisters she turned to her parents, thanked them for a religious training, and exhorted them to raise the rest of their children in the same way. And lastly, she turned to her husband, and in the tenderly of his lonely and disconsolate condition, assured him God would be his friend, and devoutly commended him to his keeping. Then, said she, "I am going through the cold waters of death, but I shall be over." She lingered on for several hours, and when past utterance, those around her could see from the motion of her lips that she still whispered, heaven! heaven! heaven!"

Who would not wade through afflictions, never deep, or even crawl to the brink of death, upon the condition of such a triumphant crossing as this? I don't wonder that the wicked prophet, in view of an end like this was made to exclaim: "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

Those who have been in the habit of attending the commencement exercises at Summerfield, will not have forgotten that, in 1851, there was a happy group of twelve, on that occasion, received the honors of the institution, and will, perhaps, recognize among the fairest and happiest of the band, Stoudenmire and Laura Lucas, both of whom not only professed religion, but travel the upper route to the Mount Zion above, and died, as I trust all the class may, and as I would die myself, in sight of heaven.

Notice

I have made an arrangement with the house of R. M. Ellis & Co., 92 Camp street, New Orleans, for the transaction of all our shipping and forwarding business. It is therefore recommended to all who may order goods through New Orleans to give the preference to consign to the house above named. We are fully assured that in so doing their business will be promptly and faithfully attended to. E. STEVENSON,

SEA ISLAND COTTON.—The first seed of the Sea Island variety of cotton was sent from the Bahamas to Georgia in 1786, and the first experiments were made with it on the islands near the mouth of the Savannah river. The seed did not bear the first year, but, the winter following the cattoons bore fruit the year following in the quantities mentioned. The original seed came from Malta. The successful growth of this world-wide staple of cotton is confined to a string of Islands reaching from Georgetown, in South Carolina, to St. Mary's, in Georgia, a distance of nearly two hundred miles, including a belt of sand not over fifteen miles wide. The cotton is now being introduced into Florida.

THE OLD CHURCH ROAD.

[illegible] through the [illegible]
[illegible] school-boy [illegible] from [illegible]
[illegible] window where the [illegible]
[illegible] [illegible] at every [illegible]
[illegible] flowers bloom
[illegible] perfume—
[illegible] cottage home
[illegible] like no more—
[illegible] house of God,
[illegible] Old, Church Road

[illegible] in a bevy of green
[illegible] chair,
[illegible] on high
[illegible] the sun and shade,
[illegible] church where first I trod
[illegible] that leads to God—
[illegible] Lane like a weary land
[illegible] along the Old Church Road.

I have come to see once more
The dear haunts I loved of yore;
Come to lay early years,
Where are now your smiles and tears—
Pastimes, visions, tears of joy,
Recollections like the long lost boy
[illegible] calls my listening ear,
[illegible] dear sound is here.
On the grave-stone gray and cold
The sad tale is briefly told;
They have spent their latest breath
In the holiday of death—
Tired with life, they fell asleep
Leaving me alone to weep,
Who would fain lay down life's load
With them, near the Old Church Road.

Grant them'ry, let me deem
This is but an idle dream!
There was one—oh, heart, be still!
Went to wander near the rill
Murmuring yet along the glade
Where our plighted vows were made—
There was one, the maiden queen,
Reigning o'er this sylvan scene,
Who had strayed from Paradise
With the splendor of its skies
Sleeping in her dewy eyes.
Never more must I rejoice
In the music of her voice!
Must the [illegible] lonely tread
Wake but echoes o'er the dead,
In the mute, silent abode
Of the blessed Old Church Road!

Where the sweetest Violets bloom
In the shadow of her tomb
Shall the wayworn wanderer rest,
Finding death a welcome guest!
There, last sleep were passing sweet
Where his dust with thine shall meet—
There, beneath the leaf-mute sod,
Lay him, near the Old Church Road.

Orleans, Dec. 1852.

EVENING BEFORE MARRIAGE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN BY ANONYMOUS.

"[illegible] shall certainly be very happy together," [illegible] Louise to her aunt on the evening before [illegible] and [illegible] cheek glowed with a deeper [illegible] her eyes shone with delight. When a [illegible] it may easily be guessed whom [illegible] world [illegible] means thereby.

"[illegible] it, dear Louise," replied her aunt, "that you continue to be happy [illegible] but that we shall continue [illegible] I have faults, indeed, but [illegible] correct them. And so [illegible] each other, we cannot be un[illegible] will never grow old."

Sighed her aunt, "I thou dost speak [illegible] of nineteen, on the day before her [illegible] is the intoxication of wishes fulfilled, [illegible] and happy omens. Dear child, re[illegible] [illegible] the heart in time grows [illegible] will come when the magic of the [illegible] fade. And when this enchantment [illegible] first becomes evident whether [illegible] worthy of love. When custom has [illegible] the charms that are most attrac[illegible] youthful freshness has died away, [illegible] with the brightness of domestic life, more [illegible] have mingled them, Louise, [illegible] and not till then can the wife say of the husband, 'He is worthy of love,' then first the husband say of the wife, 'She blooms in imperishable beauty.' But truly, on the day [illegible] marriage, such assertions sound laughable [illegible]

[illegible] understand you, dear aunt. You would [illegible] our mutual virtues alone can in earlier years give us worth for each other. But is not [illegible] I am to belong—for of myself I [illegible] but the best intentions—is he [illegible] worthiest of all the young men [illegible]? Blooms not in his soul, every vice [illegible] tends to make life happy"

Smiled her aunt, "I grant it. [illegible] as well as in him; I can [illegible] without flattery. But, dear [illegible] they bloom only, and are not yet ripened. [illegible] sun's rays and the shower. No [illegible] deceive the expectation more than [illegible] never tell in what soil they have [illegible] root! Who knows the concealed depths [illegible] heart?"

"Ah, dear aunt, you really frighten me."

"It better, Louise. Such fear is [illegible] it should be on the eve [illegible] marriage! I love thee tenderly, [illegible] therefore, declare all my thoughts on the [illegible] without disguise. I am not as yet [illegible] At seven and twenty years, one [illegible] into life with pleasure, the world [illegible] a bright side to [illegible] I have an [illegible] husband. I am happy. Therefore I [illegible] right to speak thus to thee to call thy [illegible] to a secret which is not often spoken [illegible] young and pretty maiden, one, indeed, [illegible] not greatly occupy the thoughts of a [illegible] and still is of the utmost importance [illegible] how[illegible]; a secret from which [illegible] springs love and unalterable happiness [illegible]

[illegible] the hand of her aunt in both of [illegible] "Dear aunt! you know I believe you in [illegible] You mean, that enduring happiness [illegible] is not insured to us by accidental qualities, by fleeting charms, but only those virtues [illegible] the mind which we bring to each other. [illegible] are the best dowry which we can possess; [illegible] never become old."

"As it happens, Louise. The virtues also, [illegible] the beauties of the body, can grow old, and [illegible] repulsive and hateful with age."

"How, dearest aunt! what is it you say? [illegible] to me a virtue which can become hateful [illegible]

"When they have become so, we no longer call them virtues, as a beautiful maiden can no longer be called beautiful, when time has changed her to an old and wrinkled woman."

"But, aunt, the virtues are nothing earthly."

"Perhaps."

"How can gentleness and mildness ever become hateful?"

"So soon as they degenerate into insipid indolence and listlessness."

"And manly courage?"

"Become impetuous rudeness."

"And prudent diffidence?"

"Turns to cowering humility."

"And noble pride?"

"To haughtiness."

"And to oblige?"

"To a habit of too ready friendship [illegible]

"Dear aunt, you make me almost angry. My future husband can never degenerate thus. His virtues which will preserve him as he is [illegible] A deep shame—an indestructible [illegible] [illegible] that is great and good and [illegible] in me also, I hope, as in him. [illegible] pledge and security for our [illegible]

[illegible] grow old with you—if it [illegible] to hateful excitability; and [illegible] the worst enemy of matrimony, [illegible] sensibility. That I do not [illegible]; but beware, lest this grace should degenerate into irritable and quarrelsome mortal."

"Ah, dearest, if I might never become old!"

"Were thou always as fresh and beautiful as to-day, still thy husband's eye would by custom of years become indifferent to these advantages: [illegible] is the greatest enchantress in the world, [illegible] the house one of the most benevolent [illegible] She renders that which is the most [illegible], as well as the ugliest, familiar. The [illegible] is young and becomes old; it is custom [illegible] hinders the husband from perceiving the

On the contrary, did she remain [illegible] young, while he grew old, it might bring consolation and render the man in years jealous. [illegible] is better as kind Providence has ordered it; [illegible] that thou hast grown to be an old [illegible], and thy husband were a blooming youth, how wouldst thou then feel?"

Louise rubbed her chin, and said, "I cannot tell."

Her aunt continued: "But I will call thy attention to a secret which—"

"That is it," interrupted Louise hastily, "what is it which I long so much to hear."

Her aunt said: "Listen to me attentively. What I now tell thee I have proved. It consists of two parts. The first part of the means to render a marriage happy, of itself prevents every possibility of dissension, and would even at last make the spider and the fly the best of friends with each other. The second part is the best and surest method of preserving feminine attractions."

"Ah," exclaimed Louise!

"The former half of the means then, in thy first solitary hour after the ceremony, take the bridegroom and demand a solemn vow of him, and give him a vow in return. Promise one another sacredly, never, not even in jest, to wrangle with each other; never to handy words or indulge in the least ill humor. Never! I say, never! wrangling in jest, and putting on an air of ill-humor, merely to tease, becomes earnest by practice. Mark that! Next promise each other, sincerely and solemnly, never to keep a secret from each other under whatever pretext, with whatever excuse it might be. You must continually, and every moment, see clearly into each other's bosom. Even when one of you has committed a fault, wait not an instant, but confess it freely—let it cost tears, but confess it. And as you keep nothing secret from each other, so, on the contrary, preserve the privacies of your house, marriage state and heart, from father, mother, sister, brother, aunt, and all the world. You, too, with God's help, build your own quiet world; every third or fourth one whom you draw into it with you will form a party, and stand between you two! That should never be. Promise this to each other. Renew the vow at each temptation. You will find your account in it. Your souls will grow as it were together, and at last will become as one. Ah, if many a young pair had on their wedding day known this secret, how many marriages were happier than, alas, they are!"

Louise kissed her aunt's hand with ardor. "I feel that it must be so. Where this confidence is absent, the married, even after wedlock, are two strangers who do not know each other. It should be so; without this there can be no happiness. And now, aunt, the best preservative of female beauty."

Her aunt smiled and said: "We may not conceal from ourselves that a handsome man pleases us a hundred times more than an ill-looking one, and the men are pleased with us when we are pretty. But what we call beautiful—what in the women pleases the men, is not skin and hair, the shape and color, as in a picture or statue, but it is the character—it is the soul that is within these, which enchants us by looks and words, earnestness, and joy, and sorrow. The men admire us the more they suppose those virtues of the mind to exist in us which the outside promises, and we think a malicious man disagreeable, however graceful and handsome he may be. Let a young maiden, then, who would preserve but that purity of soul, those sweet qualities of the mind, those virtues, in short, by which she first drew her over to her feet. And the best preservative of virtue to render it unchanging, and keep it ever young, is religion, that inward union with the Deity and eternity and faith—is piety, that walking with God, so pure, so peaceful, so beneficent with mortals.

"See, dear heart," continued the aunt, "there are virtues which arise out of mere experience. These grow old with time, and alter, because, by change of circumstances and inclination, prudence alters her rules of action, and because her growth does not always keep pace with that of our years and passions. But religious virtues never change; these remain eternally the same, because our God is always the same, and that eternity the same which we and those who love us are hastening to enter. Preserve, then, a mind important and pure, looking for everything from God; then will that beauty of soul remain, for which thy bridegroom to-day adores thee. I am no bigot, no fanatic, I am thy aunt of seven and twenty. I love all innocent and rational amusements. But for this very reason I say to thee—be a good dear Christian, and then will as mother, yes, as a grandmother, be still beautiful."

Louise threw her arms about her neck and wept in silence, and whispered, "I thank thee, angel!"

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

I congratulate you, as the representatives of the people, upon the present peaceful, prosperous and happy condition of our State. Since the last session of the General Assembly, by the dispensation of a merciful Providence, we have been saved not only from the pestilence which walketh in darkness, but from that destruction that wasteth at noonday; our harvests have been abundant; prices highly remunerative; labor has received its reward. Capital been employed to advantage, and the country improvements commenced under favorable auspices, and our whole people are blessed with the unmistakable signs of present and prospective prosperity.

While this is our fortunate position as a State, it is a source of heartfelt and thankful congratulation to every patriotic heart, that our common country is in a like happy condition. Never at any former period has the United States exhibited such cheering indications of internal prosperity and progress. Internal improvements are extending their benign influences to every part of the land, uncultivated regions are being subdued to the uses of agriculture, American energy and industry are fast overcoming all obstacles, and pandering the Western Continent to the hardier of the World. The calamities of public lately observed our national horizon and filled all hearts with mourning; but the recuperative energies and patriotism of the republic, forbid us to fear that any serious evils will be the result. The nation has been called to mourn some of her most distinguished sons. Calhoun, Clay, Webster and Woodbury have been gathered from their earthly labors to the rewards of their virtues and patriotism in heaven. These illustrious patriots, for the last quarter of a century, have been the honor, the hope and the leading minds of the country. Pursuing different courses, often advocating dissimilar views, forming the rallying points of their fellow-citizens in various political conventions, these great lights have shone, sacrificing personal ends for the general good, and by their patriotic labors entitling themselves to the gratitude of their country and the admiration of the world. Their memories have been deservedly honored in all the States of the confederacy, and in none with more sincere feelings and gratitude than in our own. These honors are right and just—the rewards to which, without reserve and labors, are useful incitements to surviving patriotism. Though their places are vacant and their voices are no longer heard in our councils, yet "they still live" in their examples, their virtues and their labors, the Government still moves on, and its great objects and destiny are not retarded. This should afford consolation, and lead us to the inspiring hope that though men die, the Government may be immortal.

Another event, viewed by those unacquainted with our institutions and the spirit of our people, as a still more fearful crisis, has just transpired, without disturbing the peaceful relations of the country. American patriotism forbids the successful party to domineer over the defeated, and cordial good will succeeds the fiercest conflicts. Without, therefore, intending to indulge in reflections calculated to arouse unpleasant remiuiscences and party rancor, I would congratulate you in the hope that the marked result of the late Presidential contest will do much to overthrow dangerous, sectional agitation throughout the land. The bold and unequivocal position assumed by the successful candidate on this point, leads us to hope for the best results under his administration, and the overwhelming victory gained over his competitor would tend to the belief that his position had been sanctioned by the people, in an unwonted degree, and the heart of the nation is against fraternal strife and in favor of the Union.

Louisiana is jealous of her rights as a State and would be found in the foremost rank, to defend those of her sisters as well as her own. If unconstitutionally invaded, still her policy, her feelings, her patriotism, her love of the Union, lead her to deprecate sectionalism and cultivate harmony. She would prefer that the constitutional rights of the State should remain intact to making an exhibition of her disapprobation, if they should be unfortunately invaded.

The law passed at the last session of the Legislature, requiring the sense of the people to be taken on the question of revising and amending the then existing constitution, has been duly executed. The voice of the State was in favor of revision.

The Convention for that purpose was held in July last, and the result of their labors approved at the late general election. Though I frankly confess that I was one of the minority who believed that all the changes needed in the Constitution, to make it the full reflection of the unbiassed public will, could have been effected by the mode of revision and amendment provided in the instrument itself, without the expense and risk of an entirely new Constitution, and of this the larger minority who disapproved, of many of the leading provisions of our present organic law; still I am ready and willing to submit my will and my preferences to the will of the majority. But while this is the case, I cannot refrain from expressing the wish and the ardent hope that some of the anti-republican provisions of the present Constitution may be removed from as soon as they can be legally obliterated. Equality of representation—equality of taxation, and freedom from the danger of oppressive burdens, are inestimable privileges, and should always be secured to every citizen by the organic law of the land.

That these invaluable blessings and privileges have not been secured by the present Constitution, is my sincere conviction, and I believe it to be your duty as guardians of the people's rights, to take initiatory steps, as soon as possible, to relieve them from present, and to guard them from future evils—delay in this case may be dangerous. Evils become sanctioned by time, oppression strengthens by age, and burthens sadly imposed are hard to remove. When sanctioned by habit, and sustained by the interest of selfish majorities. One of the most sad and most humiliating of these grievances must be removed at once, if ever it can be done. After the next apportionment of representatives, based on this provision, it may be well nigh impossible to effect what can now be done with comparative ease. The voice of the State, if fairly expressed, is still on the side of the people.

Assembled as you are, for the first time under the new Constitution, many arduous duties will devolve upon you, requiring all your patience, firmness and wisdom, not only to guard against its evils, but to put into operation its improvements and really good and lonely ends by the public will.

The organization of the Judiciary will demand your early attention. I would respectfully suggest for your consideration, whether it would not be advisable, in reorganizing this important department of the government, to create some system of inferior courts, having jurisdiction chiefly in probate matters. I have long entertained the opinion that these matters could be attended to with more safety and dispatch, and less expense in matters of succession, by such courts, than can be done under our Judiciary system, as at present constituted. In addition to this, in our District Courts were relieved from this class of duties, the number of districts and judges might be diminished, and the compensation of these officers increased, without adding to the current expenses of the State. This would enable us to secure on the bench the best order of talents and the highest grade of character and would secure more permanency. The uniform and able administration of justice would seem to require that changes should be less frequent in this department of the public service than any other. Though by no means an advocate for long tenure of public office, without the power of making changes by the people, still when this power can always be freely exercised if necessary, changes in the Judiciary should only be made for good and sufficient cause, and all reasonable arrangements to secure the highest and best order of talents in this department be made.

The authority granted to the Legislature by the new Constitution, to pledge the faith of the State and contract debts for other purposes than to prosecute war and suppress insurrections, is a power that should be guarded with the most jealous vigilance, and exercised with extreme caution. The experience of a long life, no small portion of which has been spent in the public service, has convinced me that the best policy, both for individuals and governments, is to avoid debt as far as practicable. The enterprise of this community is generally adequate to the construction of internal improvements actually required, but it seldom, if ever, happens that the State, in matters of this kind, is not made to suffer. It is doubtless the duty of our State to open and improve our navigable streams, to construct highways, and to provide against inundations; but when she goes beyond this, and lends her faith and aid to companies for other kinds of improvements, she should exercise the greatest circumspection, and look to the "ways and means" of meeting her engagements, lest she leave unpleasant burthens, and hard to be borne, by those who shall come after us.

Another power granted by the Constitution, and which should be watched with even more jealousy and circumspection, is that to create banking institutions. There never was probably a time when it was less necessary to extend this class of facilities than the present. A long period of comparative economy and successful industry has relieved the great mass of the community from harrassing debts; money is abundant and cheap, the community is solvent, enterprise is active without wild speculation, and the precious metals are constantly and abundantly increasing. Why should we, then, flood the country with bank issues? Why afford the means of hasty speculation? Why run the risk of former painful evils? The influx of precious metals from California, Australia and other sources, is unparalleled in the history of the world, and bids fair to derange, even of itself, without artificial aids, the healthy relations of capital and labor. The old arguments in favor of banking, drawn from the scarcity of the precious metals, have all become obsolete, and we now have an opportunity, too which should not be lightly considered, lost, of retaining the precious metals among us, and doing so without circumscribing and limiting our currency as to embarrass commerce and fetter industry. It, however, it should be deemed necessary to increase banking facilities, I would commend to you the propriety of doing so by general laws, based on the free banking principle. This system seems to me better calculated than any other that has been proposed, to guard against excessive issues and protect the bill holders. At all events, whatever system may be adopted, sufficient legal and stringent requirements be imposed as will prevent even the possibility of the banks, whether private or public, from promptly redeeming their issues, to the last cent, in specie. With all our experience, and with the present and prospective abundance of the precious metals, any legislation which would allow of a system of banking, by which the honest husbandman and laborer should be subjected to imposition and loss, would receive and justly merit the severest reprobation. On this point I would only add, that it would be doubtless a great protection to the community, and tend to retain the specie in the country, if some law were passed to prevent the issue of small bills, say under the denomination of five dollars.

But to turn from these thoughts, which refer rather to the future than the past and present, the first and most important subject of your attention is the condition of our State Finances. It is to be regretted, while we are surrounded with so many evidences of prosperity, our State Treasury is not in a like favorable condition. During the past year the Treasurer has been unable to meet promptly many of the most common and pressing demands on his department. Many citizens have visited the seat of Government with demands against the State, and after incurring considerable expense, have been compelled to return to their homes without having their claims adjusted and liquidated. Even the salaries of the public officers, upon which many of them are dependent for the support of their families, have not been paid till many months after they were due.

This state of things has resulted from two causes. The Legislature has made appropriations without providing fully the means to meet them, and the collectors of the public money are, in many instances, slow in making their returns to the Treasury. The first evil can be easily guarded against for the future by greater care on the part of the Legislature, but with the latter, although much dividing the means to pay them, is really a species of bad faith—an attempt to gratify particular interest without assuming the responsibility of the act, which should not be countenanced by your honorable body, and it often leads to disappointment and embarrassment to those who are designed to be the recipients. If the representatives of the people are not willing to tax their constituents to meet an appropriation, it is clear the appropriation should not be made. Appropriation and taxation must always go hand in hand.

To remedy the second difficulty I would suggest for your consideration whether it would not be advisable to require the collectors of public money to make semi-annual instead of annual returns. There seems to be little the propriety in the usual course of allowing the funds due the State so flexibly in the hands of the collectors while it is unable to meet its demands, or is paying interest on borrowed money. This course, too, would have a tendency to prevent applications from public officers for relief, on account of accidents to the public funds while lying in their hands. The public funds are a sacred deposit, and it is due to the people to secure their safe arrival at their proper destination, and to withhold unless under very peculiar circumstances, all clemency from those who may have unfortunately been negligent in their transfer.

Under acts of the last Legislature, I was authorized to borrow certain amounts of money, which I obtained at the usual rate of interest from the Union Bank, at one time $75,000, and at another time $25,000, making $100,000. These amounts could only be borrowed, according to the usages of the Bank, for ninety days. The time of payment has long since passed, only the interest having been paid. It is necessary to provide for the payment of this money at as early a day as practicable.

The report of the Auditor of Public Accounts and Treasurer, which will in due time be submitted to the Legislature, will afford detailed statements of the present condition of the Treasury and suggestions for relieving us from existing embarrassments.

The various public works ordered in different parts of the State, have been prosecuted with as much success as could reasonably be expected from the limited means and force of the Engineer's department. The cases of public improvements, confided to the care of this department, are of such a character as justly to make them objects of State care, and it is to be hoped whether the existing system continues, or the Board of Public Works, ordered to be created by the new Constitution, be put into operation, that sufficient means will be afforded to make this department of the public service as efficient as the wants of the State imperatively demand. It should no longer be left with means inadequate to the ends to be accomplished, causing it too often to be an unjust and undeserved reproach to those who have been entrusted with its management, and a source of vexation and disappointment to the public creditors, under the circumstances, have been improperly created.

In this connection I would again urge upon your attention the necessity of as prompt action as possible, in reference to the important subject of devising and putting in progress some plan for preventing the fearful and destructive overflows of the Mississippi river and other important streams. This last service is a difficult task, a thorough labor, a work of which the future can only form correct views, still it is a difficulty which, sooner or later, must be encountered and overcome for the most serious and alarming evils will be the inevitable result. Let us not lose sight of this subject till the painful and ruinous scenes of 1850 and 1851 shall again awaken us to its importance.

The internal improvement fund, as will be seen from the Treasurer's report, will in a short time be entirely exhausted, and it will be necessary for the present Legislature to make provision for the future support of the internal improvement service.

The faithful and intelligent officer who, until recently, had charge of this branch of the public service, will render an account of his stewardship up to the time of the transfer of the responsible and arduous duties of the Engineer's department to his worthy and capable successor.

Our system of common school education has been again commended to your care by the new Constitution. Although there are, unquestionably, great difficulties to be encountered by this system in our State, owing to the sparseness of the population and the large size of the plantations, in a large portion of the State, still the will of the people on this subject cannot be mistaken, as it has been twice expressed in the organic law of the land. In this matter I fully concur with the people. Our intercourse is based upon the virtue and intelligence of the people, and it is our indispensable duty, if we wish permanence, at all hazards, to educate the masses. If our government fails in its patriotic purposes, it can only be from a want of morality and intelligence in the great controlling masses of the people.

Mexico, a neighboring Republic, possesses a constitution and form of government almost identically the same as ours, and yet she is subject to an almost constant reign of anarchy and despotism, while we enjoy all the blessings of peace and good government. Why is this? Why this difference? It is mainly, without doubt, to be attributed in the superior education and intelligence of our people. The best form of government is of but little avail to a people unless right views and right feelings prevail among its great masses, and this can never be the case unless the youth are blessed with a good education.

Our system of common schools needs a thorough revision and many improvements to adapt it more fully to the peculiar wants of the State. The experience and difficulties of the last few years will afford lights to guide you in perfecting this system. The laws on the subject should be simplified the manner of paying the teachers rendered less complicated and expensive, and the whole system so reorganized as to render it more suitable to our present wants.

The Superintendent of Public Education should have a more ample salary, than that fixed by the last session of the Legislature. The salary should be such as to command the best talents of the country, and the whole time and attention of the incumbent. If it be proper to expend a quarter of a million of the public funds annually in any enterprise, it is surely bad economy to weaken its efficacy by failing to pay its head and representative, who should infuse into it regularity and energy, a salary to be salary to command all his thoughts, and all his energies.

All the details and necessary information with regard to this department will be furnished by its present worthy head in his report.

At the last session of the Legislature, a law was passed appropriating $25,000 for the erection of a Deaf, Dumb and Blind Asylum at the seat of government. The Board of Directors, as required by the law, has been appointed, and a suitable site and temporary buildings for the institution obtained. Several of the unfortunate class of persons for whom this institution was designed, and who had been supported at the public expense in the State of Kentucky, have been transferred to this place, and the institution is already in partial organization. The Board have fortunately obtained the services of Mr. James S. Brown in the organization and management of the asylum, who comes to us from the West, with the highest recommendations both as to character and qualification. He has had much experience in managing a similar institution in the State of Indiana, and his character inspires confidence that he will be eminently useful in the management of this benevolent enterprise. I commend this charitable institution to your fostering care, as well as the kindred institutions for orphans in Baton Rouge and New Orleans.

The lessees of the Penitentiary have accepted the provisions of the law of last session, which requires them to pay annually $4000 into the State Treasury; the financial relation, therefore, between this institution and the State is clearly and definitely settled. Great inconvenience has been experienced for some time past for want of room for the unwonted and unfortunately increasing number of inmates, but the difficulty will in a short time be remedied, as an additional wing to the present buildings will soon be completed. From the best information I have been able to obtain I feel confident that the institution is well managed, and every thing done that ought to be expected for the comfort of its inmates. For full and detailed information on this subject, I refer you to the report of its Board of Directors.

Selections of the swamp and overflowed lands granted to the State, by act of Congress approved September 28, 1850, continue to be made by the United States Surveyor General. No fault can be found in this matter with this gentleman. He has done every thing consistent with his duty as a Government officer to facilitate the business, but as the selections are made merely in connection with his various and multiplied duties, and without reference to the grant made by act of Congress, approved March 2 1849, I would suggest that the selections might probably be expedited and increased if the State had an authorized agent of her own, specially charged with the business. Such an agent could also be required to attend to other duties, referred to in my last message to the Legislature. The land interests of the State have become very important, and demand the special attention of some authorized agent.

The quantity of land patented to the State is acres. Considerable selections have also been made which have not been examined and finally acted upon by the Land Office at Washington.

The amount of money received for swamp and overflowed lands, sold by the State Register under the act of the last Legislature, is $112,872 05. As sales of swamp and overflowed lands were made by the United States land officers, after the grant of these lands was made to the State, but chiefly before the selections were made as the laws of Congress making the donations have been interpreted by the Secretary of the Interior as taking effect from the date of their passage, considerable embarrassments have resulted to those purchasers. A portion of the lands thus taken were located by soldiers' warrants, and the Leisure were paid for at $1 25 in money per here. The purchasers in all cases have been informed by the United States Government that their patents will be cancelled, and informed that their titles to the lands to be valid, must be derived from the State.

I would suggest whether it would not be advisable and just to the purchasers, who have paid their money for their swamp lands, under these circumstances, to confirm their titles upon their transferring to the State their claims for the money to be refunded by the United States, provided it can be done without passing an ex post facto law.

The case of those who have located their lands with soldiers' warrants seems to be more complicated; and I am unable to see any way in which the State can come to their relief.

As a considerable quantity of the swamp and overflowed lands granted to the State have never been surveyed, and as the General Government is not likely to have this done soon, as we have cause to believe that they will fail to the State, some provision should be made to meet the exigencies of the case. It would probably be advisable to have a proper organization of our State Surveyor General's Office, so as to enable that officer to attend to this and other similar duties which might be imposed on him.

In the present embarrassed condition of the State Treasury, would it not be advisable to use, temporarily, the money received for swamp lands to meet our most pressing engagements? If this should be done, however good faith towards the General Government by whom the swamp lands were granted for a special purpose, and obedience to our Constitution, which requires that the proceeds arising from the sales of these lands shall never be diverted from the use for which they were designed, would require some provision for returning the amount to the swamp land fund.

For more full information in reference to the whole subject of the swamp lands, I respectfully refer you to the accompanying letter and statement of the honorable John Wilson, Commissioner of the General Land Office, and to the report of the Register of our State Land Office, at Baton Rouge See document marked A in the Appendix.

No formal report has been received from the Directors of the Insane Asylum at Jackson. The Board are required by law to make biennial reports, and till otherwise directed, will follow that plan. I have, however, received a letter from the Treasurer of that Institution, which is herewith transmitted. See document marked B. in the Appendix. Great inconvenience has been experienced by the Board, during the past year, for the inability of the State Treasurer to pay the appropriations made for the support and extension of the establishment. They had contracted for an additional building, much needed for the accommodation of the increasing number of inmates, but are compelled to suspend the work from want of funds, resulting from the above mentioned cause.

If the appropriations can be paid which have been made for the year 1852 and 1853, the Institution can be successfully carried on, without further aid, but if this be not done, the most serious and embarrassing difficulties will be experienced. I recommend this subject to your immediate and special attention.

The Commissioners appointed, in obedience to an act of the last Legislature, to select a site for the location of a State Seminary of learning in the Parishes of Lafayette, performed their duty in the premises, and submitted a report, which is herewith transmitted, showing the character and advantages of the site by them selected. See document marked C. As the State has no institution of the character designed to be created by the act of the last Legislature, and as a portion of the funds for its erection and endowment have long since been donated by the General Government, I would advise that an appropriation be made to purchase the site, erect suitable buildings, and to put the Institution into active operation as soon as possible. I would also suggest that by connecting with this institution a Normal school, for the education of teachers, provision might be made to meet a great educational want of the State, and one that would tend greatly to benefit and improve our common school system.

Centenary College at Jackson continues to be in a flourishing condition, and promises to be a source of pride, and improvement to the State.

The amount due by that institution for its buildings, library and apparatus, which was purchased from the State, was remitted by an Act of the Legislature, passed at the session of 1847, on the condition that it should educate gratuitously ten indigent young men, to be designated from time to time by the Governor of the State, so as to keep at all times that number at the Institution; the law has been heretofore so construed, as to impose on the College the bounden duty of remitting tuition fees, without providing for the boarding of these State pupils. Some difficulties having arisen on this point from the supposition that it was the design of the Legislature that the pupils designated by the Governor should be maintained as well as taught. I have thought it desirable to call the matter to your attention.

It also is supposed that the law, as heretofore acted upon, is of but little advantage to the indigent youths of the State. As a general thing those in these circumstances make it desirable to have their tuition fees remitted, are too poor to pay their other expenses; while those who can pay their other charges, care but little for the additional expenses of tuition. If this matter could be so changed that even a smaller number could be entirely supported by the Institution it would be far better for the class intended to be benefitted.

Nothing of consequence has been done with regard to the Jackson Monument, designed to be erected in the city of New Orleans. The commissioners having the matter in charge have had several meetings, and examined various plans which have been submitted to them, but nothing final has been agreed upon. The great difficulty is that the amount of means in their hands is inadequate to the end to be accomplished, and I would recommend that such additional appropriation be made by the Legislature as will enable the commissioners to erect a monument worthy the man and the occasion it is intended to commemorate.

The stone for the Washington Monument ordered by the State has been provided; I feel much indebted to Senator Downs for his friendly aid in its preparation.

During the past year, a letter was received from the American sculptor, Hiram Powers, who has been employed to produce a statue of Washington for the use of the State, giving information of the progress of the work, and also a draft on the State for a portion of the money appropriated for this work to be executed by him. As the last Legislature had omitted to renew the appropriation for this work, and that previously made had expired by constitutional limitation, it became necessary in my judgment to borrow the money to meet the draft, and thus save the credit of the State, and prevent embarrassment in a foreign land, to one of our most worthy and distinguished countrymen. In connection with Hon. Charles Gayarre, Secretary of State, I borrowed the sum of $2500 from the Louisiana State Bank, to be paid on the first day of February of this year, our joint note being given for this sum, and I have to ask that provision be made immediately to meet the same, and that the balance of the former appropriation be renewed. We were informed by Mr. Powers that the statue was in progress, and would be completed during the present year.

The quarterly reports of the Board of Currency show that our Banks are in a most sound and safe condition, fraught the great abundance of money in the country, is evinced by the fact that the Banks have a much larger amount of specie in their vaults, than the whole circulation. No Banks in the Union are in a more safe and reliable condition, than those of Louisiana. According to the Statement of the Board, made on the 20th December, 1852 the amount of circulation of the Banks was $5,400,-000 while the specie in their vaults was $8,207,042

Judge Gayarre, the Secretary of State, will present a report showing the condition of the State Library, with suitable recommendations and suggestions in reference thereto. I agree with him, especially in his recommendation that the French and Spanish historical documents belonging to the State should be published. These documents now existing in manuscript should be published not only for their preservation, but as a source of interest and information to the public. The industry and enterprise of the secretary of State has enabled him already to use them in producing his able and reliable history of Louisiana, a work not only highly creditable to the State, but which has placed his name in the front rank of our most distinguished historical writers. I take pleasure in quoting from the following quotation, from Bancro.t's History of the United States, the estimation in which this work on our State is held by so distinguished a writer. He says in the fifth volume of his history, page 112, "The work of the army is one of great merit and authority, built firmly on trustworthy documents."

In this connection I would acknowledge on the part of the state, the reception of an interesting addition to the library from L. C. Duncan, Esq., one of the Commissioners of the State to the World's Fair, consisting of a set of beautiful colored engravings or tableaux, representing the Crystal Palace and Fair, and also a handsome volume, containing the award by the jurors selected to preside over the same.

Owing to the change introduced by the new Constitution, of holding annual instead of biennial sessions of the Legislature, the usual reports from public institutions have not been so promptly presented as they will doubtless hereafter be. You may expect in time for any necessary action of the Legislature, reports from the University of Louisiana, and the Charity Hospital. The first of these institutions continues in successful operation. The wants of our great city demand such an institution, and it should, doubtless, continue to receive the fostering care of the State.

The latter is one of the noblest charities of our country, and although it is a source of considerable expense to the State, still I advise that the usual appropriations for its support be made; the commercial interests of our State and city require this at our hands and I judge few would be disposed to withhold it.

I regret to say that the militia is in no better state of organization than it has been for many years past; it seems doubtful whether any yeomanry additional efficacy can be infused into the present body, without a loss of time and restraints that would be too distasteful to be long cheerfully borne. Occupying as we do, one of the most exposed and important points of the United States, it seems to me that we should not be altogether unprepared for emergencies, and that owing to the great difficulty of organizing an efficient militia all proper encouragement should be given to the formation of volunteer companies.

No appropriation having been made by the last Legislature, to defray the necessary expenses of the Arsenal for the public arms, in New Orleans, some inconvenience has been experienced; it is to be expected that you will make an appropriation to meet the case for the future, and to indemnify the city of New Orleans for the advances made for its support at the instance of the Adjutant General, whose memorial on the subject, copied into his report, will be submitted to you; I refer you especially to the report of that officer for greater detail in relation to the present organization and condition of the militia of our State. I commend that feature of it which relates to volunteer companies in rural parishes, and the supplying of them with more suitable arms than those to be found in the State Arsenal. I refer you further to his observations upon the subject of postage expenses connected with that office: it is scarcely just that general officers of the militia, whose duties are already sufficiently onerous, should be subjected to the necessary expenses of their correspondence with that department.

Few days after the transmission of this message to your honorable body, my official connection with the affairs of the State will terminate. I rejoice that in retiring from public life I leave the State in so flourishing a condition and cheering prospects, and that I am surrendering the Chief Magistracy of the State into hands so worthy to receive it and so capable of sustaining its dignity, its cares and its responsibilities. Our State possesses the elements of incalculable wealth and permanent prosperity, and I implicitly resign to my successor in office and to you, the representatives of the people, the important work of devising and executing those plans of policy which will develop her resources, moral and physical, and make her all that can be desired by her patriotic children.

In the discharge of my public functions, I have doubtless sometimes erred—to err, indeed, is human, and I am not one to claim exemption from the frailties of humanity; still I trust you will believe me when I assure you, and through you all my fellow-citizens who have honored me with their confidence, that my errors have been those of the head and not of the heart. My design and aims have been good, however much I may have failed in execution, and in that retirement from the cares of public life, which is so desirable to me, and into which I enter with so much cheerfulness, I shall ever watch with the liveliest interest and solicitude the progressive development and prosperity of my native State.

THE APOSTOLIC COMMISSION.

A SERMON

Preached by Rev. T. O. SUMMERS, D. D., before the Alabama Conference, Dec. 9, 1852, at its Session in Marion, Alabama, and published by request of the Conference.

"Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee, into a mountain where Jesus had appointed them. And when they saw him, they worshipped him; but some doubted. And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen." Matt. xxviii. 16-20

Thus Matthew closes his Gospel: we leave it to the harmonists to show that there is no real contradiction between him, the other evangelists, and St. Paul, in their several accounts of the Saviour's manifestations after his resurrection. The difficulties connected with this subject subside on a candid and careful investigation; indeed, they strengthen rather than weaken the testimony of the sacred historians. The appearance of Christ, spoken of in the text, was one of great importance; it was one previously appointed by him; a special interview with the college of Apostles, having reference to an object of great interest. He had told them before his crucifixion "After I am risen again, I will go before you into Galilee." Matt. xxvi. 32. And after his resurrection the angel despatched the women with the message to his disciples: "He is risen from the dead, and behold he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see him." And, as the women were on their way, Jesus himself met them, and repeated the order. "Go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me." It is very obvious that he designed this to be a special and solemn meeting: and so it proved to be. His manifestation on this occasion was no furtive apparition. It was clear, full, and satisfactory: so that those among them who feared that the news of his resurrection was too good to be true, were favored with such "meridian evidence" of the fact as left no room for doubt. Galilee was chosen for this interview, it would seem, because there the Saviour had lived before he entered upon his public career: there he had done most of his mighty works; there he had made the greatest number of disciples; there, in the early part of his ministry, he had chosen and commissioned his Apostles. Now, that it became necessary to recollect and re-commission the disbanded college, Galilee, with peculiar propriety, was selected as the scene of the solemn transaction.

This meeting was appointed by Christ for the instauration of the ordination of "the eleven disciples" to the work of the ministry. Under any circumstances, perhaps, this might have been expedient: but it was rendered absolutely necessary by their recent abandonment of him and his cause. They were to be restored to his favor, and to the honorable position which he had assigned them. He had trained them to the apostleship, and did not intend to forego their services, and it was indispensable that they should receive the strongest assurances of the fact. Having, therefore, satisfied them of his personal identity, he proceeds to announce his authority in the premises. "All power, or rather, authority, is given unto me in heaven and in earth." This is not the voice of a mere man: nor is it the voice of a God. In his higher nature he is, indeed, "God of God:" but it was not in this character—this divine personal relation to the Father—that he used this language. Nor can we conceive it possible for any mere man to be invested with such functions as these terms denote. He spake rather as the Messiah, in whose person and offices Deity and humanity are harmoniously blended. Possessing the latter, the authority is given unto him, in view of his meritorious acts and sufferings; possessing the former, he has the dignity and the power requisite for the weighty responsibility of governing the universe. This construction of the language is not only in itself easy and natural, but also agrees with the general tenor of Matthew's Gospel, which is considered peculiarly Messianic in its genius and scope.

Christ had accomplished all that part of his mediatorial work which was to be performed on the earth; he had proclaimed the principles of the New Dispensation: he had illustrated their excellence in his own example: he had fulfilled the types and prophecies of the old economy by his obedience unto death: the success of his undertaking had been demonstrated by his resurrection from the dead: and he was now about to close up his earthly history by his ascension into Heaven. Having made arrangement for the establishment of his kingdom upon the earth, it was necessary, before he vacated the visible superintendency of that kingdom, that he should make provision for its extension and perpetuation: that provision he made by appointing men to attend exclusively to this work—first, the eleven disciples, whose apostleship was not only restored, but also magnified, and their successors, in the ordinary functions of their ministry, to the end of time. For so reads the commission: "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

The text exhibits the Authority, the Work and the Encouragement of the Apostles and their successors in the Gospel ministry to the end of time.

LET US NOTICE, FIRST, THEIR AUTHORITY.

The text evidently considers them ministers of Christ. They are appointed by him; they are his ambassadors. They are not, therefore, self-commissioned; nor are they merely commissioned by the Church. If they are his ministers, they are so by his authority. This is obvious when we consider

1. That Christ is invested with supreme governmental authority in the Church, involving the right of appointing his own ministers, which right he has never delegated to others.

As he possesses all power in heaven and in earth: as he is Head over all things to the Church: as he is King in Zion: no one can have any power at all, any authority to meddle with the affairs of his kingdom, except by his investiture. He has made no transfer of his original authority to any visible monarchical head, or to any spiritual aristocracy, or to the Church at large. No Scripture affirms this—no Scripture implies it.

When Christ said to Simon: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my Church," and, "Feed my sheep," he did not intimate that Peter and his successors should call men to the ministry without first ascertaining that the Lord himself had previously called them. Indeed, those much abused passages do not refer to this subject at all.

Nor does that passage in John. xx. 21-23. "As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you. And having said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost. Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them: and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained." He did not mean to tell them that he invested them with the same plenary authority with which the Father had invested him. He merely states that, as he was the Apostle of the Father, so they were his Apostles. He does not say that he invested them with the independent prerogative of appointing other Apostles. He sends them, duly qualified, to perform a specific work, namely: to declare authoritatively the terms of pardoning mercy, and to open and shut the door of the Church. That is all.

Nor is the affirmative of the point in question countenanced by the case of Timothy, who was taken by St. Paul and adopted as his son in the Gospel: or that of Apollos, who was taken by Aquila and Priscilla and prepared for the ministry, in which, by the way, he had been engaged before his introduction to them; or by the instructions given by Paul to Timothy and Titus, having respect to the ordination of men to the ministry. as 2 Tim. ii. 2: "The things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also:" and Titus i, 5: "For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee." These passages do not state, nor can it be inferred from them, that those who were appointed by the Apostles and others to official stations in the Church, received no other appointment—no higher commision. Do they state, or can it be inferred from them, that the parties in question were not previously called by God to the work of the ministry? Or that the Apostles and evangelists had not respect to this divine call when they laid hands on them for this work? This much, and this only, may be gathered from these cases, that every man who engages in the work of the ministry ought to have the sanction of those who are already invested with ministerial functions. But it does not follow from this that any man may take this honor upon himself, or suffer it to be conferred upon him by others, unless he be called of God, as were the first Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ: he having never surrendered his prerogative in the premises.

2. Christ has always exercised the right of appointing his own ministers.

During the time of his ministry on earth he acted according to his own sovereign will and pleasure in this matter. "He goeth up into a mountain, and calleth unto him whom he would, and they came unto him. And he ordained twelve, that they should be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach:" Mark iii, 13, 14. And when he said that the harvest was great, but the laborers few, he did not transfer the prerogative of increasing the number to those whom he first called to the work, or to the seventy whom he afterwards summoned to their assistance: but, on the contrary, instructed them: "Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth laborers into his harvest:" Luke x, 2.

His ministers are not properly furnished him by his Church, but rather given to the Church by him, as its exalted Head. For after he had finished his earthly ministry, when he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. And he gave some, apostles: and some, prophets: and some, evangelists: and some, pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ."

Accordingly, being duly instructed in the "things pertaining to the kindgdom of God," when the disciples would supply a vacancy in the college of Apostles, they did not fail to recognize the Saviour's prerogative. "And they prayed, and said, Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, show whether of these two thou hast chosen, that he may take part of this ministry and apostleship, from which Judas by transgression fell." And as "the lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord," they, according to the ancient and, obsolete usage, "gave forth their lots, and the lot fell upon Matthias, and he was numbered with the eleven Apostles." Acts i. 21-26. We shall not now inquire whether or not this entire proceeding received the Divine sanction; that question does not concern the present argument; one thing is obvious, that the disciples considered it the province of Christ to select and appoint his own ministers: and that they were not mistaken in this matter is evident from the case of St. Paul. After the Head of the Church had appointed Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, and when he wanted one to act in the special character of the Apostle of the Gentiles, what course did he pursue? Did he look to the college of Apostles to make the selection? Or did he leave it to the discretion of the prince of the Apostles? Neither; but he makes the selection himself. Saul of Tarsus, after his conversion, would not have dared to preach the faith which he once destroyed, had not Christ himself invested him with ministerial functions. This is evident from his frequent references to the authority under which he acted. Take, for example, that passage in his eloquent speech before King Agrippa, in which he cites the very terms of his commission; "I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee: delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee, to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sin, and inheritance among them which are sanctified, by faith that is in me;" Acts xxvi, 16-18. Hence, writing to the Corinthians, he says: "Though I preach the Gospel, I have nothing to glory of, for necessity is laid upon me: yea, wo is unto me, if I preach not the Gospel:" 1 Cor. ix. 16. In his Epistle to the Galatians, also, he lays special emphasis upon the Divine origin of his commission; Gal. i.

But, lest any should suppose that as there were peculiarities in the case of St. Paul, it might have been necessary that he should receive his commission directly from Christ himself: but, that because of these peculiarities, we can not argue from this case that all ordinary ministers are to have a direct Divine appointment to their work, we cite the case of the elders of the Church at Ephesus. So far as we can judge, there was nothing peculiar, nothing miraculous, in their case. The duties which devolved upon them were the ordinary duties of the ministry: the same which the "pastors and teachers" of our time are called to discharge. How, then, were they appointed to the sacred office? Was it enough that they should receive merely the sanction of those who were appointed to ordain elders in every city? Not so. They had their sanction, but they had also a higher sanction than theirs: Hear the charge of St. Paul: "Take heed, therefore, unto yourselves and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers:" Acts xx. This shows us the source of their authority. The Spirit of Christ had called them to this work; he had invested them with this sacred character. And this is the case with every genuine overseer of the Church of God. This is the door of entrance into the sheep-fold; and he that climbeth up some other way, even though he may not be in every instance "a thief and a robber," is not a divinely recognized "shepherd of the sheep."

The Church, therefore, is fully justified in refusing to receive into the ranks of her ministers any who desire the office of a bishop, or pastor, until they shall have made the solemn profession that they believe themselves "inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost, to take upon them the office of the ministry in the Church of Christ;" and shall have given satisfactory evidence that they neither wish to deceive others, nor are deceived themselves.

As Christ has never surrendered the right of appointing the ministers of his Church: but has always exercised that right himself, so it can be made to appear:

3. That as Head of the Church he can not divest himself of the prerogative of supplying it with pastors and teachers to the end of time.

It requires the wisdom of Christ to make the selection; it requires the authority of Christ to confirm the appointment. Such is the character of the men who are required for the service of the Church and the conversion of the world; and such is the nature of the work to which they are called, that the most unhappy and disastrous mistakes will be made by the appointing power, if any act in that capacity, save him "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," and who possesses "all power both in heaven and in earth." Unworthy candidates would be clothed with the ministerial office, because of their high-sounding pretensions and meretricious accomplishments; and holy men of God, because of their retiring and unassuming character and, perhaps, their deficiency in those endowments, which some consider necessary for the sacred vocation, would be unceremoniously rejected. The wisdom of man would scarcely select the prophets of the Lord from among the ploughmen of Abel-meholah, the herdmen of Tekoa, the publicans and fishermen of Galilee. This, however, was done by Him who seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh at the outward appearance, but God looketh at the heart. However well disposed, therefore, the authorities of the Church may be to select proper men for the work of the ministry, they are not competent to make the selection.

But if the rulers of the Church had sufficient discernment, so great is the depravity of human nature, that it would be perilous to invest them with the prerogative in question. If the spirit of favoritism, ambition, and cupidity, were never enfolded in sheerdotal habiliments, the danger might not be so great; the unholy aspirants to the sacred office would be checked by the blasting rebuff, "Thy money perish with thee, because thou thoughtest that the gift of God might be purchased with money." But, alas! while a Peter might take that noble stand, a Judas is found ready enough to sell, not the Church merely, but her divine Lord, for thirty pieces of silver! Ecclesiastical history furnishes illustrations of this subject, melancholy and multitudinous. Acting as though the Lord Jesus had vacated his right and invested them with it, the rulers of the Church have presumed to make her ministers, and the recorded consequences corroborate the assertions which we have made, and sustain the position we have assumed.

Let the Church exercise her piety and prudence in ascertaining whom the Lord hath called to the work, and then however unseemly to human view may be the candidate, let her acquiesce in the Divine appointment. The man after God's own heart is the very man for God's own work. Upon such he will not fail to send down the healthful Spirit of his grace, and to pour upon him the continual dew of his blessing.

LET US NOW NOTICE THE WORK OF THE MINISTRY.

There were certain ministerial services which were of an extraordinary kind, and as such were confined to the Apostolic age, and for the most part to the Apostles themselves. Such were the working of miracles—the writing of Scripture—authoritatively and infallibly determining the faith and practice of the Church. Performances of this sort were necessary to authenticate the New Dispensation: but this being accomplished, and the Church thereby duly accredited as a divine institution, they were no longer needed, and therefore they were not perpetuated beyond the Apostolic age. They are not specified in the text, though, of course, so far as the Apostles themselves were concerned, they are involved in the commission.

The Work of the Ministry here brought to view is common to the Apostles and their successors in every age. It is stated in both general and special terms,

In general terms, it is to "go and mathēteusate" disciple all nations"—that is to say, to make all the people of the world disciples of Christ. Discipleship implies espousal of the Saviour's cause and obedience to his commandments. Hence, in accomplishing their mission, they are instructed, in special terms, to baptize the nations and to teach them to observe all the commandments of Christ.

1. They are first, by the initiatory ordinance of Baptism to bring them into the Christian Church; that is, to lead them to an espousal of the cause of Christ.

This, of course, implies in the case of adults, a previous process of religious instruction. But baptism is named before teaching, because there are many things which proselytes to Christianity have to be taught after baptism—it being absurd to debar them from Church-membership until they shall have gone on to perfection in Christian knowledge. Besides, in the case of infants, no teaching precedes baptism.

This, then, is the first part of the ministerial work specified in the commission: to bring "all nations" over to the embracement of Christianity—to a public profession of the Christian faith and consecration to the service of the one living and true God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

2. They are, secondly, to teach them to observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded them.

Their teaching, you see, is prescribed. They are to teach what they themselves have been taught by Christ. Their commission extends no further than this. And the Apostles never went beyond their commission. Thus St. Paul tells the Corinthians that he delivered unto them first of all that which he also received; 1 Cor. xv. 3; and in writing to the Galatians he pronounces an anathema on any, man or angel, who should presume to preach any other gospel than that which he had preached to them, and which he had received "by the revelation of Jesus Christ." Gal. i.

St. Peter agrees perfectly with his "beloved brother Paul:" thus he says: "This second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance; that ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandments of us the Apostles of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." 2 Pet. iii, 1, 2. And if you examine his epistles you will find that these words of the prophets, and commandments of the Apostles, which he stirs them up to remember, are all comprehended in those doctrinal and ethical principles which had been communicated to him and his colleagues in the sacred office by their great Employer.

St. John, indeed, says: "A new commandment I write unto you;" but as he has just written: "Brethren, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment which ye had from the beginning: the old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning"—as he has just expressed himself in this style, it cannot be supposed that this new commandment is one which for the first time is now published to the world; nor does the phraseology which he employs, obviously borrowed from our Lord, nor the succeeding context, support such a conclusion, but rather one directly the reverse. Compare John xiii: 34, with 1 John ii. 7-11 iii. 11-23. The Apostle's paradox is easily explained. The new commandment which he wrote to them was the very same which Christ had given to his Apostles—a commandment, by the way, as old as Moses, or indeed as old as Adam, in substance, but a new commandment in regard to the new light cast upon its requirements and the new strength imparted to its sanctions, by the teaching and example of our blessed Lord.

St. Jude is very explicit. He says: "Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you, that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints;" v. 3.

These limits the Apostles never transcended. And if they had, it would have been the duty of all men to reject their assumptions. And if the inspired Apostles had no such prerogatives—if they never broached a new principle, referring to faith or practice—what shall we say of their boasted successors, who prate about new theories of development, and "teach for doctrines the commandments of men?" And what shall we do with their new-fangled doctrines! Spurn them with a holy, jealous regard for the sovereignty of Christ. They bear not the image and superscription of the only King of Zion, and no matter whose they bear beside Cæsar's or Pope's—they must be nailed to the counter as base and spurious coin. To give them currency would be a capital crime.

But while the ministers of Christ must teach the world nothing they have not received from him, they must take care not to suppress any of his communications. Not a doctrine, not a precept may be concealed. Their instructions must be not only authentic but complete.

There are no esoteric principles in Christianity: all are exoteric. The entire system, doctrinal and ethical, is as much designed for the laity as the clergy. It will not do for ministers to consider themselves the exclusive depositories or trustees of the gospel. They are, indeed, in a special sense, set for its preservation, propagation, and defence. But to do this effectually, they must make it known to the world. Not a jot or tittle must be concealed, as not a jot or tittle is without profit: and therefore the example of Paul must be imitated by all who are clothed with the sacred functions: he kept back nothing that was profitable, and shunned not to declare all the counsel of God. He knew that Christ had commissioned his Apostles to teach the whole world to observe all his commandments. Not merely to practise all his precepts, but "teerein"—to have and to hold, keep and preserve, the Christian system intact and complete. The whole world of mankind is the depository of Christianity; and to the whole world must it be committed in all its integrity.

It were blasphemous to suppose there is anything injurious or dangerous in Christianity, so that its ministers might exercise their discretion in regard to its publication or concealment, or in respect to the parties to whom certain parts may be communicated or withheld. Every thing in Christianity may be profitable to every man; and if there be those who are unlearned and unstable who wrest any part to their own destruction, the responsibility rests on them, not on the gospel or its faithful dispensers. If men perversely change the truth of God into a lie, and transmute the bread of life into deadly poison, they must abide the result. They may not father their infatuation and impiety upon Christ or his ministers; for their salutary in its tendency and design. No one ever yet experienced any evil result from imitating the psalmist, who said, "I esteem all thy precepts concerning all things to be right; and I hate every false way." Ps. cxix. 128.

This, then, is the Work of the Ministry: to make all nations obedient to the faith of Christ, and to educate them thoroughly in that great system of religion which He first imparted to the Apostles, and which they have embodied in the permanent records of inspiration. What an undertaking! The gospel, in all its vastness, variety, and importance, is to be proclaimed, expounded, and propagated among all nations, and kindred, and people, and tongues, age after age, until the end of time; and all this by a feeble band, bearing, in the world's estimation, a ridiculous proportion to the multiplied millions upon whom they are to operate, to say nothing of philosophic indifference, imperial interdicts, popular rage, savage violence—the universal opposition to be encountered in executing their high commission. In view of these considerations, who will say that the ministers of Christ do no need special encouragement in their great emprise?

LET US NOTICE BRIEFLY THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE MINISTRY.

It is thus stated in the text: "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." Christ did not mean the end of the Jewish Dispensation—that was already finished: nor did he mean the end of the Jewish state, which took place less than forty years after; for this event had but a remote connection with the evangelization of the world; some of the Apostles survived this period, and did not experience the presence of Christ less after it than they did before it, as they certainly did not need it less. Let the language of the Saviour, "eos tes sun teleias tou aiōnos," be rendered "to the end of the world," or "to the consummation of the age"—"of the cycle"—"of this state"—it matters not, the meaning can only be to the end of time; that is, as long as there are ministers to be employed in the service of Christ. The ministry is a unit; an immortal corporation; immortal, until its work is done, and until then it can challenge the promise of the Saviour's perpetual presence. This is an exceeding great and precious promise. See what it implies:

1. Christ is present with his ministers to qualify them for the work to which he has called them.

Without this they are altogether inadequate to the duties of their commission. Accordingly, the Apostles, notwithstanding their long course of training by the Saviour, were not allowed to enter upon their work until the promise of the text went into effect. They were instructed to tarry at the city of Jerusalem until they were endued with power from on high. And although this divine preparation comprehended those miraculous endowments which the Apostles needed for the initiation of the Church, yet it also embraced those ordinary gifts and graces without which no man, however eloquent, learned, or wise, is qualified to minister in holy things. These bestowments, we scarcely need remark, are not designed to supersede the acquisition of moral and intellectual endowments by industrious and patient application; but rather to concur with such application and to secure the greatest practical result.

Happy are those servants who realize, day by day, the cheering and sustaining presence of their Divine Employer! They need never despond, however restricted may be their natural talents or educational attainments. They know that they can apply to their Master, who is ever present with them, and obtain from Him all necessary aid. Even in the culture and development of their intellectual powers, they can thus secure such assistance as will make their profiting known unto all men; so that, they shall reflect as much light upon the world as the wisdom of God sees adequate to the objects and aims of their ministry. But especially in their efforts to acquire greater moral power and higher spiritual endowments—so vitally connected with the successful exercise of their holy functions—do they feel the advantage of the Saviour's presence, receiving day by day those copious baptisms with the spirit of love, and of power, and of a sound mind, which so eminently qualify them for the duties of their high vocation.

2. Christ is present with his ministers to open their way to usefulness, and to crown their efforts with success.

On a certain occasion when Paul was at Troas, in the night season there stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying: Come over into Macedonia, and help us. And when he had seen the vision, he instantly concluded that the Lord had called him to preach the gospel in that place. He promptly obeyed the summons; and though it was in a cloudy and dark day, yet he succeeded in forming a European Church, which became one of the most flourishing of all the Apostolic Churches. And how often, during the course of his ministry, by providential indications and gracious interpositions, was there a great and effectual door opened unto him, even when there were many adversaries. The other Apostles too were favored in a similar manner, and so have been their successors in every age. For this purpose, as well as others, Christ is with his ministers always, even unto the end of the world. His intervention is not now marked by miraculous circumstances as in the Apostolic age, but it is not therefore the less certain and serviceable. By virtue of his presence with his ministers, personal considerations apparently of the most trivial character, political events in themselves very remotely allied to the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, injudicious movements of mistaken friends, persecuting onsets of diabolical foes, all alike have been controled and overruled, and have fallen out to the furtherance of the gospel: as in the Reformation of the sixteenth century, the Revival of the eighteenth, and the Missionary enterprises of the present age.

By His presence He gives them occasions to preach, and inclines the minds of their hearers, and opens their hearts to attend to the things which are spoken to them: He applies the word so that sinners are awakened and convinced of sin, penitent believers are sealed with pardoning grace, and the Church is increased, sanctified, and built up in the faith. These are the signs which follow a faithful dispensation of the Gospel; and as they are above the skill and power of man to accomplish, they unequivocally demonstrate the presence of Christ with His chosen servants. He is in his word as spoken by them; and therefore it is quick and powerful, sharper than any two-edged sword. The gospel comes not in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance. Not unfrequently are such scenes witnessed as that described by St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, (1 Cor. xiv, 24, 25,) when one that believeth not, or is ignorant of the things of God, being in the Christian assembly, is so portrayed by the minister of Christ, that the very secrets of his heart are made manifest; and so falling down on his face, as the Apostle expresses it, he worships God, and reports that God is with you of a truth. Sometimes even scores and hundreds have been simultaneously cut to the heart by the sword of the Spirit, the power of the Lord has been present to heal them, and they have been made to rejoice in his salvation.

3. Christ is present with his ministers to sustain them under discouraging circumstances.

It is then that his presence is peculiarly needed and gratefully appreciated. This promise, therefore, is of singular value in this regard, as there are a thousand discouragements in the way of a faithful minister of Christ. Some originate in the world; some in the Church; some in his own fearful heart and ill-boding spirit; and all are identified with the machinations of the great adversary, who is stung to madness by the successful assaults made upon his kingdom by the sacramental host of God's elect; hence his malice, spite, and revenge towards the leaders in the holy war. And as they are men of like passions with others, they would yield to these discouragements and abandon their sacred calling, did not the presence of their Master secure to them all needful sympathy and support. He goes before them and drives back their enemies with the sovereign word, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm." His sympathizing voice, responding to their cries, comes over the stormy sea of temptation and trial, and speaks in cheering tones to their troubled hearts, giving to every one of his afflicted and faithful servants the consolatory assurance, "My grace is sufficient for thee; for my strength is made perfect in weakness." Such a manifestation of the Saviour's presence might well induce the Apostle to exclaim, "Most gladly, therefore, will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. Therefore, I take pleasures in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake: for when I am weak, then am I strong," 2 Cor. xii. 7, 10. Hear the same Apostle on another occasion—it was when he had made his first answer before Nero, and no man stood with him, but all men forsook him—an occasion when he needed the presence of his Master, and accordingly we hear him exclaim, "Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me, that by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear; and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion." Feeling his confidence rising with the grateful reminiscence, he continues, "And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto his heavenly kingdom." 2 Tim. iv, 16, 17.

What though the beloved Apostle was banished by a persecuting power to a distant and dreary island in the Ægean sea, he was not transported beyond the presence of his almighty Friend. Christ was there to give him the aid and comfort which his circumstances required, and Patmos was Paradise to the favored and illustrious exile.

Strip those scenes in the history of the Apostles of their miraculous appendages, and they are reproduced every day in the experience of the ministers of Christ. Like the Apostles, they may, perhaps have no certain dwelling place—they may be called to prophesy to a rebellious house—amid the frowns and scoffs of a reckless, heartless world, and perhaps the sinister support, the cold neglect, of an inconsistent Church; nevertheless, they claim the promise of the text, and they realize its fulfilment.

Their great Employer qualifies them for the work to which he has called them; he opens their way before them, and crowns their labors with success; and he supports them under antagonistic influences, reverses, and trials. These are the proofs and effects of his constant presence with them. Greater encouragement than this they cannot desire; greater than this Heaven cannot afford.

The ministers of Christ are thus called upon to take the precept in the one hand, and the promise in the other; the former to keep them from negligence, the latter from despondency, in the discharge of their important and responsible duties. None who are called of God conceive themselves sufficient for these things—nor are they—their sufficiency is of God who hath called them: they can stay themselves upon the faithfulness of Him whose name is "Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us." The promise contained in the Ministerial Commission is nothing but the New Testament echo of the divine assurance to Moses, "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest;" or that to Joshua, "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee: I will not leave thee, nor forsake thee."

Acting under the authority of their Master, in obedience to his mandate, and in dependence upon his promised presence, the ministers of Christ have a right to challenge universal regard. Woe be to those who reject their message. They personate their divine Employer according to his own language, "He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me." They are his ambassadors, ministers of reconciliation to a rebel world. Subjectively—that is, so far as they themselves are concerned—they can accomplish the work assigned them, whether you to whom they come with their message will hear or forbear. But objectively—that is, as you are concerned in the matter—they cannot accomplish it, even with divine aid, without your co-operation. If they are to bring you to a profession of the faith of Christ, you must submit to be led by them. If they are to teach you to observe all his commandments, you must submit to the proscribed arrangement and receive their instructions. You must receive them, not with a blind, implicit confidence, but with a docile, ingenuous mind, proving all things, and holding fast that which is good. Nor, on the other hand, must you sit before them as their critics and masters; but seek to be instructed by them, and receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls.

Their grand source of encouragement is in the promised presence of Christ; but you are not unconcerned in this matter; you can do much to discourage them in their work. By accepting the terms of reconciliation which they are commissioned to propose; by consecrating your souls and bodies, substance and service to the cause of Christ—thus co-operating with them in their great undertaking, the conversion of the world—you may be the occasion of their verifying to a greater degree the encouraging assurance, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen."

That One Word.

A single remark of Rev. Charles Simeon, on the blessings which had resulted from the labors of Doctor Cary, in India, first arrested the attention of Henry Martyn to the cause of missions. His mind began to stir under the new thought, and a perusal of the life of Brainard fixed him in his resolution to give himself to the missionary work among the heathens.

Harlan Page once went through his Sabbath school to get the spiritual census of the school. Coming to one of the teachers he said: "Shall I put you down as having a hope in Christ?" The teacher replied: "No." "Then," said he very tenderly, "I will put you down as having no hope." He closed his little book and left him. That was enough. God gave that young man's soul no rest till he found hope through the cross.

A Good Rule.

It is of no consequence where these sentences were found; they are worth treasuring up and practising on:

If you know any thing that will make a brother's heart glad, run quick and tell it; and if it is something that will only cause a sigh, bottle it up—bottle it up. We never get good bread for ourselves till we begin to ask for our brethren. A selfish man is always more miserable than the benevolent man.

We verily believe that the single sin of intemperance is destroying more souls than the ministers in Britain are instrumental saving. [Wes. Magazine.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, January 29.

CLOSE OF THE VOLUME.

The present number ends our second volume. Many thanks to friends and agents for the prospect of entering upon the third prosperously. But, it doesn't rain fast enough. When new subscribers begin to come in at the rate of a hundred per week, and the old ones renewing, then we shall think we are doing something.

The back numbers of January 1st have been all taken up. We shall begin the third volume by striking off a large number of extra papers, and await orders.

Anniversary of the South-Western Bible Society.

The large ball-room of the Odd Fellows' Hall was crowded Sunday night to witness the presentation of Bibles to the Fire Companies of our city. At least fifteen hundred people had to leave, being unable to obtain admittance.

The exercises of the evening commenced by the reading of the fifty-first chapter of Isaiah by Rev. Dr. Leacock, of Christ Church. He was followed by the Rev. Mr. North, who made a short and appropriate prayer.

The report of the Directors commenced by acknowledging, with gratitude, the Divine favor which has attended their labors. The deaths, during the past year, of Webster, Clay and other distinguished men, were appropriately noticed. They, by their bright examples, had added to the long list of those who have triumphed in the faith of the Bible, in that sober hour which more than any other tests the foundation of men's religious hopes. Their names are written no monuments more imperishable than marble. During their lives, although having the cares and honors of the Nation crowding upon them, yet they found time to read the word of God, to meditate upon its truths, to commend its pure and elevating precepts, and to challenge the whole Nation to witness its power to cheer and support them in the hour of death.

The Society have a Depository, under charge of Heman Packard, located in one of the stores of the Odd Fellows' Hall. The stock of Bibles and Testaments has been larger during the past year than previous years, yet not at all times sufficient to meet the demand, as the various sizes of the books, and the different languages in which they are published, create the want of a larger stock than the Board have been able to keep on hand, as their means are limited. The number of Bibles and Testaments issued from the Depository during the last year was 6,330, in sixteen different languages, and valued at $2,636 62. During the two and a half years the Society has been in existence more than sixteen thousand copies of the Bible have been issued.

One of the duties devolving on the Society by act of incorporation is the erection of a Bible House in this city. During the past year they have purchased a large lot of ground on Camp street, near the Odd Fellows' Hall, at a cost of $4500, which is now valued at $6500; they have a clear title to the land and have a balance now on hand of about $2000 towards erecting the building, and they appeal to the public for a further donation of $6000 to [illegible] building will be commenced in the spring, provided the amount required can be obtained. The total amount collected the last year for the Society does not amount to $2000, although the Society is composed of members of various religious denominations. Of the amount collected towards the Bible House, the sums of $1000 and $500 were contributed by two gentlemen from the country.

We have not space for a further report of the address—it was very long and closed with an urgent appeal to the community, of all denominations, to come forward in extend the usefulness of the Society, and to assist in building the Bible House.

After reading the report, the Rev. Joseph B. Walker was introduced and made a most eloquent speech.

On the conclusion of Mr. Walker's address, Mr. J. A. Maylin was introduced and made a long address to the Committee of the Fire Department, presenting a Bible for each Company. Mr. J. O. Denegre received the Bibles on behalf of the Department, and made an address.

The exercises of the evening were closed by singing the Christian doxology.

FINANCIAL AGENCY.

Rev. Daniel Dealy is the financial agent of Centenary College this year. He intends traveling through the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences soliciting donations and subscriptions for the erection of the centre building—so much needed for the beauty and completeness and efficiency of the college. A site for this building has been reserved from the beginning, and an imposing one it is; but the funds and the patronage, heretofore, have not justified it. The college was never more prosperous than now. It is crowded with students, and the friends of education and the church must put forth an effort to provide room for those that more may be entered. The college is doing much for the church and the country. Let it not be straitened and embarrassed in its great work.

There is also a small debt yet due on the wing building that has been so promptly put up in place of the one burned down two years ago.

To realize these funds, and also to create an endowment, putting the college, as every such institution ought to be, beyond fluctuations, Mr. Dealy, besides making collections, is authorised by the joint Board to sell scholarships. These are put at two hundred and fifty dollars, and secure to the purchaser the privilege of twenty-five years tuition in the college—to take effect after five hundred scholarships have been sold.

Here is real economy. Has one sons to educate, or would he like to keep a boy at college, without tuition expenditure? Here is his opportunity. Cheaper than railroad stock, and will pay better per cent. morally and mentally, temporally and spiritually. The Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences hold this college in joint trust and care for the church and country. Let them see that it lacks nothing for efficiency. The Governor, in his late message, spoke in high terms of it; but not more so than was merited. The college ought this year—a year of health and blessings, of large crops, of peace and prosperity,—to be lifted out of all embarrassment. We hope the industrious agent may so report it by the next commencement.

A SUFFERING MINISTRY.

It fell from the lips of a living minister, a short time ago, in the midst of eloquent and suitable remarks to a company of his brethren, that the Lord Jesus Christ needed a suffering ministry. Such were in sympathy with Him and his work who was made perfect through sufferings. Good soldiers, enduring hardness. A state of mind and heart was superinduced by suffering the most advantageous for presenting the gospel, and pressing home divine truth to the conscience, whether in conviction or consolation. It prepared the pastor for soul-dealing. It made the promises precious to him, and well known by experience. By the pressure of sufferings the gospel became to the preacher, in the appropriating language of Paul, his gospel. Its sustaining power was no second-hand story, but m oft proved fact. And so he rejoices in the God of all comfort: "Who comforteth us in all our tribulation that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God."

The statement is a startling one. The natural heart reluctates at it. Sufferings—the college for a successful ministry! This bearing of griefs and carrying of sorrows, necessary! Unpleasant as it may be to flesh and blood, surely the truth is this, and must be owned that the suffering ministry has thus far in Christian history been the successful ministry.

Those who have shrunk from this baptism, have never been chosen by the Head of the Church to its posts of danger and honor. Those who have tripped lightly along after Him who bore a cross, have never been known as chief instruments in building up his kingdom. So runs the history of facts, however the facts may be accounted for.

This being so, does it not appear that many have been timidly and fearfully turned away from their path by the prospect or severe exercises of those very sufferings in the ministry, that would have graduated them to its noblest honors, and fitted them, under God, for its greatest achievements. In so compromising as to retain their ministry without poverty, or peril, or pain, or domestic privation, they bargained away the essential element of success. They sought to sift their high calling of its sacrifices, and lo, they have lost its very life. They exercise a ministry without sacrafice, without suffering, and it is dead.

The sufferings of the ministry need no seeking. There is no cause to turn aside for them. Only push straight on, and there they are. Enter the open door, and there they are. They attend upon the path of the faithful minister. They are inherent in his calling. If [illegible] be exposed. Let him only not [illegible]-ism, and they come up with him. It needs no delinquent Church or membership to supply to him this needful grace. With the liveliest sympathy of these, the faithful ministry is ons of suffering.

It may provoke the ghosts of the fathers, who did quit themselves like men in their holy calling, to hear and see how high those, not ankle deep in the waters, rate their case. How they maguify their sufferings. How they complain at that of which they only need more, if they would bear it, to make them greater. "Light afflictions," truly, Paul would call them. Talk of sufferings, color them never so highly; are they worthy to be set side by side with his? A single chapter of his life, a leaf from his ministerial journal would throw them all into the shade. Can any itinerant even, encounter a swamp as big as the Mediterranean? Are not our slowest and meanest steamboats perfect palaces for comfort, to say nothing of locomotion, compared with the "Castor and Pollux?" Have we any Church members more ready to start aside than the Galatians? Any so stingy and grudging of support to the ministry as the Corinthians?

But let us take from St. Paul a short and slight sketch of some of his sufferings as he was accomplishing his wonderful ministry. How do ours pale before his? If any are bowed down and desponding under theirs let them turn to his tribulations and trials:

"Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods; once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness."

THE CATHOLIC MESSENGER.

Such is the title of a weekly paper, the organ of the Romanists, lately established in this city. It has now reached its fourth issue. The Messenger is just half the size of the Advocate: its subscription price, four dollars a year. It is edited by N. J. Perche, Chaplain of the Ursulines Convent. Its official character is thus described by itself:

We are authorized to state that the "Catholic Messenger" is the official paper of the Most Reverend Archbishop of New Orleans for this Arch-diocese and for the diocese of Natchez, the administration of which is entrusted to the Most Reverend Archbishop during the vacancy of the See. Our paper is also the official paper of the Right Reverend Bishop of Mobile, and of the Right Reverend Bishop of Galveston, for their respective dioceses.

The editor calls on those who have zeal for Mother Church to rally and help: he deplores the influence of the press as now conducted in these parts, and professes the intention of counteracting it by the Messenger, and "confuting the slanders of blasphemers and higots." Five mortal columns devoted, first and last, to an explanation, vindication and scandalous defense of the Madiai case. Perhaps father Perche has not heard by the telegraph that Francis Madiai is dead—died in prison—in a prison where he was put and held by eminent Roman Catholic authority for the crime of reading the bible. We now give him this news. But he greatly mistakes the indignant tone of protesting Christendom if this man, being dead, does not continue to speak. Let father Perche keep his ears open, and he will hear more of it. As he seems behind the times in this matter, we will furnish him, in order, the back numbers of the Advocate, with the letters of our French correspondent detailing the facts.

In a previous number of the Messenger, there were such strong articles against all liquor laws, and such eloquent pleas for "free trade and drunkard's rights," that one, taking up the paper without reading that it was the organ of the Archbishop, bishops, etc., might have taken it for the organ of the Consolidated Rum Association.

We have heard with some satisfaction that the getting up of the Messenger is largely due to the existence of the New Orleans Christian Advocate. We are glad to know that we have been felt, and felt in that quarter. The Messenger is to us a messenger of some good done. We hope for more of it. Meantime, while its editor calls on his patrons to extend his circulation at $4 00 per annum, we may be excused for calling upon ours to do the same for us at $1 50.

To Another District.—The Louisiana Conference appointments as published, place Minden and North Bosier Circuit in the Shreveport District. They belong to the Monroe District.

Jackson, Miss.—The revival noticed a few weeks ago has continued graciously. At last accounts, over seventy souls had professed conversion. The pastor was assisted in the meeting by Rev. J. L. Chapman and others.

METHODIST PRESS.

California.—The Observer of 22d December has reached us. Also a letter from Rev. W. R. Gober, which will appear next week. The Observer announces arrivals:

We have the pleasure of announcing the arrival of Rev. J. L. Saunders, who was recently transferred from the Alabama Conference to the Pacific. He came up on the Golden Gate, (17th,) and, together with his family, enjoys fine health.

The M. E. Church North, was also reinforced by the arrival of Rev. Messrs. Daniels, Wilmot and Hasen.

Lecture on Japan.—The Philadelphia Christian Advocate gives at length a highly [illegible] on the 6th inst., in Trinity (M. E.) Church, on Japan. Since the American naval expedition has been fitting out for Japan, or as the European papers generally read it, against Japan, the quickened attention of the civilized world has been directed to it. Doctor Durbin puts the population at thirty-five millions. Their civilization is rated much higher than we are wont to suppose. They differ from all our ideas of Asiatic communities. They are not that dull, filthy, inactive, serious people, we are accustomed to suppose the Asiatics to be. The common school system obtains among the Japanese. Says the lecturer:

With this state of civilization the question arises what is the state of knowledge in Japan? Although I had supposed that I had some knowledge even of that distant part of the world, yet when I came to examine authorities within reach, I was struck with this singular fact, testified to by every body, that common education is more universal in Japan than in any community known to the world. It is more universal than in Prussia or the United States, and when I have said that, I have said all that can be said on the subject of education. And this is not mere knowledge passed from family to family, but it is a public common school system. Every child, male and female, must go to these common schools; and they pass from the lower and middle classes into the active business of life. The upper classes, containing the sons of the nobility and gentry, pass into academies and colleges. They have also a large amount of scientific knowledge. They have a knowledge of medicine, which is limited only by one of their peculiar religious tenets—that is, an abhorrence of blood, so that dissection of the human body is impossible. Consequently all the knowledge of the healing art that depends upon anatomy they are unable to attain; but in all the other branches of medicine they have a large amount of accurate and useful knowledge.

Pleasant Boasting.—The Southern Christian Advocate sums up the Missionary collections of the South Carolina Conference for the past year $22 316, and the editor does some large crowing over the Alabama Conference, which this year raised only $21,200. Alahama was caught a napping it seems. But the short year—does not that account for it? Working by the rule of three, as eleven mouths: $21,200 :: Twelve months—the answer is the Banner.

But Louisiana holds out to both a tow line. The South Carolina Conference numbering 32,828 white members, and 40,000 colored, raises $22,316. While Louisiana, with only 4872 white members, and about the same number colored, raises $10,297. Where is your boasting now, good brethren? Not quite one-seventh your membership and nearly one-half the cash. The two flags yet wave at the head of the New Orleans Christian Advocate. The one on the left well up to the breeze: the other on the right somewhat at half-mast. Brethren of noble Alabama, carry it up high next year, and nail it there.

Poor Sympathy.—The Buffalo Advocate devotes a large space to revival articles, earnestly desiring one. And it notes a meeting (Methodist) in progress there, in the city, under one Dr. Redfield:

He labors with great zeal, and pours truth hot and fiery, upon the conscience. We certainly have sympathy for the meeting, and can feel with him and the cause abundant success. If he had more reliable information, we judge, he would succeed better. As it is he will create an excitement, and it is to be hoped that something good and great may grow out of the movement.

Dr. Redfield will certainly feel his hands upheld by that paragraph.

Merchandise of the Gospel.—The editor of the Western Christian Advocate clips the following from a late English paper, remarking that if it is not making merchandise of the gospel he would like to know what is? So we:

The perpetual right of presentation to the rectory of Whittington, near Cheltenham, was offered to public competition by Messrs. Smithleworth & Son, at the auction mart, not long since. Its value in the King's books is £13 6s. 8d.; by the "Clergy list," £279; but the vendor estimates its annual value at £405 14s. The population is 234, the duty stated to be easy, and the present incumbent, the Rev. W. Hicks, is in the seventy-eighth year of his age, and non resident. The church is described as very ancient, and the parsonage an ancient stone edifice, of the Elizabethan era, richly mantled with ivy, in a vicinity abounding with delightful scenery, and in a neighborhood of great respectability. The "Clergy list" states the patronage belongs to R. J. Neville, Esq. After a spirited competition, it was knocked down for £2,300.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Jay's Prayers.

A neat and cheap copy (18 mo.) of this book, well known and well used in the devotions of many individuals and families, has been laid on our table by H. D. McGinnis, who has it on sale at 56 Gravier street.

Frank Freeman's Barber Shop. By B. R. Hall, D.D., New York: Scribner & Co., 1852. 12 mo., 342 pp.

Another silly addition to the negro literature that Mrs. Stowe's success has suggested. It inclines South. But who is not sick of these cabins, and barber shops, and parlors, no matter which side they take? A fumigation is needed. The book work is good enough, and the pictures sufficiently thick lipped.

For sale by H. D. McGinnis.

Graham's Magazine.

The last number lacks neither engravings or matter. Under the head of Reviews is contained the fullest, ablest and most satisfactory analysis of the mental and moral character of Daniel Webster we have yet met with: a thorough inventory of the man.

National Magazine.

The January number is before us. We have a standing suspicion of the "dead fly" in all Northern Methodist literature. But if this magazine continues to be free from it, we recommend it to those who want a good one. It is evangelical in tone, tasteful in conduct, instructive and agreeable in its matter, large in its scope—well arranged, well printed, and well worth two dollars per annum.

A SABBATH IN MOBILE.

BY A COUNTRY VISITOR.

The busy scenes of city life are ill-calculated to raise and improve the spirituality of a country visitor. Our natures incline us to walk in the fascinating paths of worldly life, and the snares of man's enemy are spread out, over, to entrap the followers of Christ, and win them from his service.

After a pleasant night's repose at the "Lafayette House," a beautiful Sabbath dawned. The sun sparkled brightly; nature seemed gay: the day was sweet and lovely; the heavy, dull jolting of the dray was hushed: the morning's light was not accompanied with the market bell, or the jingling bread-man's trappings, but at an early hour the deep toned Church bell called, and here was a temptation. A countryman, who has but a few days to stay in the city, and is busy the whole time, is tempted to think it would be no harm to ride to Citronelle on the railroad, and give a lingering look towards home. This temptation beset me. I determined to spend the day in the service of my Master, but how to do so most profitably was for a time difficult for me to decide. My fondness for Sabbath schools well nigh determined me to go to that excellent Sabbath school at the Franklin Street Church, where Bro. McLelland "keeps." Last spring I was there, and was much delighted with the attention paid by the children and interest felt by the teachers, but above all, to hear the interesting infant class lisp their Saviour's praise in sweet, holy, rapturous song. It overwhelmed me with joy, and made me more devotedly the friend of the Sabbath school cause. I know you will not blame me, Mr. Editor, for wishing to visit this school again; nay, you would rather censure me for not doing it.

But I remembered that two good Brothers told me to meet them at the class-room at the same hour. My soul seemed thirsty as in a dry land, and I knew the class-room would suit me best. I found my way to Bro P. W.'s class at St. Francis Street Church, and oh! how precious was the occasion. As I write, joy springs up within me at the remembrance of God's goodness in that house. I was not the only stranger there. Kentucky, Ireland and Mississippi, all had delegates in that little assembly whose faces were strange, but whose hearts were one. A communion of spirits made us know each other well, and the Master owned us all. Thanks to our fathers for this institution.

My next question was—where shall I hear preaching? The thought that blessings had already been in that Church, and they would remain there, influenced me to hear Brother Powell, the pastor, from that very important passage of God's word, "Quench not the Spirit;" and in right good earnest did the preacher enforce the command. The Church members could but be profited by his discourse, and his appeal to the unconverted will surely not be lost. It was good seed, faithfully sown, and ought to bring [illegible] Brother P. is a young pastor, but we [illegible] armer well. May he live to do good.

After dinner, I strolled away to the African charge, and heard a colored man preach to a very large, quiet and praying congregation. I thought him a good man—he might be a good preacher, and do much service, profitably, to the Church with some little corrections. His imitative organs are too strongly developed. The singing was very good. I could but think if a few of our fanatical brethren were present at some of our negro meetings, the spirit of truth would open their understandings and make them better men.

I was very anxious to hear my valued friend Dr. Neely at the St. Francis Street Church in the evening, but I learned that Bro. Milbourn had been preaching a series of sermons to the women of Mobile, and was to conclude them that evening. I expected something good and went there, and do not regret it even now. I had learned to appreciate "women," and award to them high positions, but I learned there to appreciate them more, consider their positions higher, their influence greater, and altogether nobler beings than I had before considered them. Thus closed the day. I can now look back upon its events with the pleasing reflection that it was a profitable day to me. I think my faith was increased, my hopes strengthened, my views enlarged, my charity expanded, my obligations to my Maker made greater, my fondness for Christian association heightened, and my determinations to be faithful, and gain the prize doubly fixed.

It would doubtless be well if our city friends would take one brethren and sisters from the country with them to the house of God, lay off this feeling of diffidence, and provoke them to good works, then they will have the reflection of having done their duty, and we freed from the remorse of guilty consciences for having indulged in these amusements not warranted in the Bible.

REPORT

Publishing Committee of the Louisiana Conference on New Orleans Christain Advocate.

The Publishing Committee of the New Orleans Christian Advocate beg leave to submit the following report:

In accordance with the resolution of the Conference, your Committee met with the Committee of the Alabama Conference on the 1st of May last, and made their report through the columns of the Advocate. From that report the Conference learned the condition of the paper. Since then the Editor, together with the Rev. J. C. Keener made, in behalf of the Committee, a written contract with the printer, by which the paper could be published at the low price of $1 50 per annum. This arrangement has met with the unqualified and unanimous approbation of the Committees of both Conferences.

This reduction of price, effected by a contract, involves no pecuniary responsibility. But it is the opinion of your Committee that this arrangement strengthens the obligations of the Conference to increase the subscription list. For unless the number of subscribers is enlarged to at least ten thousand it is impossible for the paper to sustain itself.

Thus far the paper has gone forward doing a great work, involving no expense, and taking a high stand among our church papers. All the profits that have resulted, or that may hereafter result, belong to the patronizing Conferences. The Editor, who has discharged his duties with great fidelity and eminent success, has received but a nominal salary for his labors. This is no private enterprize. It is a great work, entered into after mature deliberation, by two annual Conferences; they have every thing to gain and nothing to lose. Therefore Resolved, That we will use all laudable efforts to extend the circulation of the N. O. Christian Advocate.

R. H. Rivers,
W. E. Doty,
J. C. Keener,

Lay Committee Co-operation.

The following action was had at the late session of the Louisiana Conference:

Resolved, That the Louisiana Annual Conference earnestly desires the co-operation of brethren, members of the M. E. Church South within the bounds of the Conference, to advance the several benevolent and financial interests which have heretofore been under the sole care of the Conference.

2d. That it hereby pressingly invites each of the Quarterly Meeting Conferences within its bounds to select some gentleman, a member of the Church, to attend at the place where the next Annual Conference shall meet (Maunfield,) to give aid and share in the committee-action of the Conference upon the cause of Missions, the cause of Education, the Sabbath School cause, the Church publications, and the support of the Ministry.

3d. That the Conference shall now appoint from its members the chairmen of the several committees on the aforesaid benevolent interests, who will be expected to prepare, during the year, a report upon the various interests they represent, excepting the Committee on Missions, which shall meet and act with the Board of Managers on the first day of the meeting of Conference.

4th. That on each afternoon of the days upon which the Conference shall meet, the Conference shall resolve itself in a Committee of the Whole upon some one of the aforesaid benevolent causes; and shall, together with the committee-men from the Quarterly Meeting Conferences constitute the Committee on Education, the Committee on Church Publications, the Committee on Sabbath Schools, the Committee on Missions, and the Committee on Ministerial Support.

The appointed Chairman shall preside, and shall report upon its rising to the President of the Conference the action of the Committee of the Whole, in a written report.

5th. That the preacher in charge of Mansfield be requested to make provision for the entertainment of committee-men of the Quarterly Conferences at the next Conference session.

6th. That the following be the chairmen of the several committees for the next Conference:

Chairman of Committee on Missions—The President of the Conference Missionary Society, R. H. Rivers.

Chairman of the Committee on Sunday Schools—J. B. Walker.

Chairman of Committee on Education—C. A. Frazee.

Chairman of Committee on Church Publications—Linus Parker.

Chairman of Committee on Ministerial Support—S. J. Davies.

South Carolina Conference.

This Conference, we learn by our Charleston cotemporary, held a pleasant session in Sumterville, commencing on the 5th inst., Bp. Capers presiding. Eleven preachers were received into full connection—a class of peculiar promise. The following five were admitted on trial, viz: G. W. Stokes, W. H. Lawton, A. H. Lester, J. S. Ervin, E. J. Price, G. W. M. Creighton.

The Rev. Joseph Cross was transferred by Bishop Andrew from the Tennessee to the South Carolina Conference, and stationed at Bethel Church, in Charleston.

The following brethren located: W. M. Lee, O. A. Chrietzberg, W. J. Pennington, D. Hilliard, T. E. Ledbetter and A. Nettles.

The number of members reported is as follows: Whites, 32,828; colored, 40,358; shewing an increase during the past year of whites 435, colored 2877. The joint board of finance settled with the claimants at sixty and a half cents on the dollar. This is an improvement of twelve and a half per cent on the operations of the preceding year.

The educational interests, under care of the Conference, were well reported of. Need was felt for a Female College in the central part of the State, and measures taken to establish one. Wofford College will be organized by the election of a faculty in the course of next year, the suite of buildings being in course of rapid erection, under the superintendence of a very reliable architect.

Address of Rev. Jos. B. Walker,

Before the Southwestern Bible Society, New Orleans, January 23.

Mr. President: The very excellent report to which we have just listened, saves me the task and the trouble of entering into the details of this Society's operations. This report sets forth in lucid and forcible terms the great fact that God has raised up, in all ages, illustrious witnesses to the truth of the Bible; and especially that our own country, from the days of Washington, has enjoyed the labors and counsels of a succession of great men—great in the army—great in the cabinet, and great in the Senate, who have bowed with adoring homage to the truth and divine majesty of the Holy Scriptures.

I need not to tell you, sir, that a bright galaxy of the "Immortal names that were not born to die,"—

names that are the glory and the heritage of all coming time, are found arrayed under the banner of Inspiration as the firm believers and staunch defenders of the Bible.

We learn from this excellent report, sir, that the Society has not been idle—that it has already done much good; that it is now most efficiently organized; that it contemplates moving forward with longer and bolder strides; that it intends to take no step backward, and will never say "full."

It is matter of devout congratulation that Bible Societies are rapidly spreading throughout the world. More than sixty grand Bible organizations exist, with thousands of auxiliaries. Forty-nine years ago the first was organized, and already more than forty millions of copies have been issued, in near two hundred different languages. I cannot but recur in passing to the fact that the great Bible enterprise and the Emperor Napoleon were inaugurated the same year. Perhaps a greater than Napoleon never lived; his resources were vast—his success the most brilliant, but his sun went down in clouds and gloom, and the splendors of his victorious and the grandeur of his Empire live alone in history; but the Bible still sits enthroned in the affections of crowded millions. It has won for itself a vast and enduring dominion. Yes, sir, it now reaches from the frozen poles to the burning line, and claims for itself lands that never saw the Eagle of Rome or heard the Lion of England roar.

Hail, sir, the triumph of the Bible has been a bloodless, sinless triumph. How, sir, have the truest friends of humanity wielded this sword of the Spirit? By giving it to the soldier and the sailor. And to change the scene: By sowing the copies of the Word of God broad-cast among the millions of the destitute poor; by freighting ships bound for heathen lands with cargoes richer than California's golden dust. But enough of this.

I am here, sir—if I understand my position—to advocate the claims of the Bible to a more general circulation. The Bible itself, sir, needs no advocacy from me. "A George III said, when he read Bishop Watson's Apology for the Bible—not recollecting that apology means a defence as well as an excuse—he said, 'the book was well enough; but he did not like the name; he never knew before that the Bible needed an apology.'" Neither does it sir. It only asks to be candidly read; it is itself entirely competent to its own defence, and to assert its claims to the faith and veneration of men.

When I remember, Mr. President—that all the great truths of Revelation were once locked up in the great mind of God—and that whenever the Chariot of God through a period of a thousand and five years came driving to announce these truths to man, a wonder was wrought here below—the sea divided, the heavens dropped manna, the flinty rock yielded a crystal flood, the sun stood still, the storm was calmed, the sick were healed and the dead were raised, I can but feel a solemn reverence for the Book. When I think of the sublime truths it contains, its lessons of heavenly wisdom, its exceeding great and precious promises, and all its immortal hopes, I love and venerate it. When I remember its venerable antiquity, its eventful history, the noble and glorious bands ages since sold to death, who were once employed to pen its immortal lessons; when I think how for thousands of years it has fought, its way through fire and sword, I must confess I look upon the Bible almost with awe.

When I call up how many millions in so many lands, under such varied fortunes, have been by it instructed, comforted and cheered on their march to immortality; who in I survey its progress and see in every zone that hails the globe, men reading the Book of God—that the sun never goes down upon its dominion; when I read its splendid and unparalled destiny—that it shall have a universal extension and universal reception—that it shall be the rule of right and the standard of judgment for all men—that its hallowed memories, its wonderous history and magnificent future, fill me with emotions which the contemplation of no other subject can inspire. But more to the point.

Let me say, sir, that I profoundly respect the American Bible Society. It is so Christian, so anti-sectarian. For we stand to-night upon high and holy ground, where the veriest bond slave and lack of sectarianism discerned dare to bring or to utter the shibboleth of his sect. This great Christian Association seeks to re-echo the cradle song of God, "Let there be light." Yes, let it shine abroad and every where, until all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of God and rejoice because their light is come and the glory of the Lord hath risen upon them. This great Christian Association, sir, sweeps through the churches and gathers their concentrated influence and power, like the mighty river that sweeps through the great Valley of the West—collecting into its broad deep channel, the resources of a hundred rivers, but it takes the name of none of them. It is not the river of the north nor of the south, but it is the river of the continent.

Such, sir, is the great Association. All may participate in its labors, rejoice in its far spreading triumphs, but none may claim it as but the offspring our common Christianity—it is the noblest embodiment of modern Christian enterprize.

I am so much of an American, I have so exalted notions of the glorious destiny that awaits our country, and of the mighty part she is to bear in christianizing, civilizing and liberalizing the degraded and oppressed nations of the earth, that I can but love the name—the American Bible Society—so broad, so comprehensive, so like our great and matchless country. Sir, the Society is aptly named. It would seem that it was organized after the model of our Federal Union. Our Federal Union is a union of the States; it bears the name of none. The Society is a union of the churches, but it is called after none of them. New States coming into our Union must be republican; they must subscribe to the Federal Constitution; but they may have their local politics and peculiar legislature. The North may abolish a particular institution as not adapted to her climate. The South may retain it as suited to her necessities. Massachusetts and New York may have their high-toned views of Federal power, and South Carolina and Virginia their notions of State rights. Veto of the press be free; let the people of every section think for it is a base unwisdom and of reason to resign our right of thought." So, sir, the Church must christian: they must subscribe to the Bible, but they may retain their names and peculiarities. I know of no branch of the Church but what could unite with the American Bible Society, without sacrificing any fundamental doctrine, or giving up their denominational character. Sir, I repeat, I love the name.

Mr President I have sometimes feared that the very comprehensiveness of the American Bible Society might possibly operate somewhat against its success. There is an old adage which says, "what is every body's business is nobody's business." We must guard this point, and see that all the Churches and the citizens be urged to do their duty. Let me illustrate, in a homely way, how I see the danger to which I have alluded:

In a certain neighborhood lives a Mr. A. and Mr. B. Mr. A. is one of the most estimable of men—he know him is to respect and love him. Mr. B. is a man of fair character and respectable calling, but he has not so large and warm a circle of friends as Mr. A. enjoys. Mr. A. and Mr. B., in the revolutions and vicissitudes of time, have met with severe pecuniary reverses—in a word, they have failed in business, and some benevolent gentlemen propose to do something for the relief of these worthy but unfortunate men. The community is called on for aid. "Well," says one, "although there is no man I love so much as I do Mr. A., and no one that I would sooner aid in relieving, yet he has so many friends, that no doubt he will receive help from every quarter—so I will help poor Mr. B." So says another, and another, and all with one consent praise Mr. A. and deeply sympathize with him in his losses, but give all their real help to Mr. B. Poor Mr. A. gets nothing but sympathy and kind words.

So, sir, every body prizes the Bible. Oh, the Bible is the best book in the world. The American Bible Society is one of the noblest charities of our age; it ought to be sustained; no doubt it will be sustained—surely, surely, but here, it is to be feared, that the matter will rest and end. Each individual man is so intent upon his own private plans; each sectional or denominational association is so engrossed in carrying forward its own peculiar objects, that this great enterprise is in danger of being overlooked or left to the care and sympathy of a few devoted friends. This must not be, sir. All Christians and all good citizens generally we must rally around this great enterprise, and never let it languish for want of our prayers, our sympathy and our material aid.

While touching rather incidentally upon this point, permit me, sir, to reply to an objection that is sometimes urged against sustaining with material aid the American Bible Society.

It is said we abstract from charity, and deprive the poor of that which should be given to them. Our reply to this is a flat denial of its assumption, and a round assertion that those who give to the Bible will never give less to alleviate the wants of the destitute and deserving.

But we would go further, and affirm that by giving the Bible to the child and the poor, we prevent an evil which is always infinitely more than to cure one. Nothing so much exalts a man's character as a just appreciation of his intelligent and immortal nature, and no book so fully and forcibly teaches this great lesson as does the Bible. When a man learns that he is highly appreciated by the highest, that the best have put forth great efforts to advance and bless him, he at once arouses himself to self-expection and make some return; he at once conceives of himself and of his position as too important to be trifled with, and his life at once becomes a scene of noble activities. Now, all this reasoning holds eminently true of the bearings of the Bible upon the mind and the life of man. He learns from the Bible the grandeur of his origin and his destiny—that God is his Father—that God has so loved him that he has sent forth his Son upon a mighty embassy of redeeming mercy—that the Divine Redeemer came down and bled to win his love—died to open to him the gates of pardon—and rose from the dead to unfold to him the portals of immortality. These lessons exalt and dignify human nature. But merely to give material, without combining with it mental and moral aid, it is fasten it ever and irrevocably upon the poor the habit of helplessness and dependence. It is matter of history that the poor rates of England have increased to a fearful extent the pauperism of that great, but over-taxed nation. Let enough upon this point.

We proceed to say, sir, that the general circulation of the Bible among our population is one of the great necessities of our country and of our time. I know as I should be extravagant in saying, it is the greatest and most imperative of all our necessities. I must be pardoned for repeating to the thousandth time, (for it is a great fact in the character of our government,) that ours is a government of public opinion—that all its constitutions and laws are but the legalized embodiment of public opinion, and upon public opinion alone, now, they depend for their perpetuity and their power. In the estimation, then, of every enlightened and patriotic citizen, how vital must be the question of maintaining a sound and elevated public sentiment. No book, sir, in all the vast literature of the civilized world can so well accomplish this great work as the Bible.

Our population is a mixed multitude, from many lands and speaking many languages. Europe is annually pouring upon us an mighter army than Napoleon marshaled to the snows of the North. They are coming from sunny Spain and frozen Norway—from Poland on the East and Britain on the West. These people have different language, different educations and varied prejudices—they have been accustomed to various forms of religious and political government. How, sir, can this heterogeneous mass be melted? On what common ground can they be united? What will prove an universal solvent, and melt them into one homogeneous mass? We reply, the Bible, sir, and nothing but the Bible. The people all come from Christian lands—they all believe the Bible to be the Book of God, and the rule of right. The Bible unites us all—and it is through centered the far-bounding circle. Christian men and Christian nations hold all manner of theological, ecclesiastical and political opinions. Like the rays of light, they are found looking to every point of the compass; but, like these rays of light, they acknowledge a common centre and a common source—that source is God—that centre is the Bible. Let us send the Bible throughout the land, among all the people, and, as an alkali neutralizes the chemical incompatibility of oil and water so the Bible shall subdue the national, political and social incompatibility of the many tribes and tongues that have come to dwell in our midst, and bind us together firmer than a band of iron. In a bond of political union, from the Rio Grande to the St. Lawrence, and from ocean to ocean. But, Mr President, to present this idea in a somewhat different light.

In the despotisms of Europe, law has long been associated in the common mind with oppression and wrong, for a thousand enormities have been perpetrated in the time-hallowed name of law. Is it any probable, sir, that when the oppressed millions of Europe come to know, as they will know, that their long cherished and bitter prejudices against law will they not look with some distrust upon a Government that claims to be a Government of law? just, indeed what the despotisms that have wronged and oppressed them claimed to be. And is there not danger that, as they associate law with oppression and injustice, they will take the other extreme, and associate liberty with licentiousness? What, sir, is to give them wholesome and elevated ideas of a Government of self-imposed laws? What is to teach respect for magistrates, and obedience to lawful authority? We reply, the Bible—the wholesome lessons of the Bible. To the Bible will regulate the individual and the family—and what is a nation? What is our glorious republic but an aggregation of individuals and families? Whatever then, sir, the individuals—the families are—the republic must be—will be.

Some of our wisest and most patriotic men have looked almost with painful apprehension upon the mighty tide that sets in upon our shores from the over-crowded nations of Europe—they have feared that we have not enough of the true leaven to leaven so mighty a lump—that our nationality would be swallowed up, and the institutions built upon the hopes and cemented with the blood of our fathers would be swept away, and the noblest example of self-government lost to the world forever. But, sir, let us never despair of the republic. We have, sir, in the language of an eloquent writer, a great American mill to grind over the nations and Americanize them. To put ask, sir, what is this great millrot which we speak? I cannot enter into details, sir, but the Bible is the mother millstone—the common cylinder in the upper millstone, and our broad land is the hopper. Let the nations come, sir—yes, let them come from every land to our mill, and we will grind to powder their bigotries and prejudices of a thousand years, and make them a new and Americanized people.

Let me say to you, gentlemen, who represent in this splendid hall the numerous—the self-sacrificing—the energetic Fire Companies of New Orleans—you who fly to the rescue of life and property—you sirs, to whom we all are deeply indebted—that I witnessed for the first time

Address of J. O. Denegre,

...BEHALF OF THE FIRE DEPARTMENT, IN REPLY TO ...I MASON, ESQ., ON RECEIVING THE BIBLES.

...Sir—The honor has been conferred on me of expressing to you, on behalf of the Fire Department of New-Orleans, their thanks for the valuable presents, which, as the agent of the Bible Society, you have just bestowed.

It is usual for men to value gifts on two accounts: ...m the kind feeling they are intended to manifest, ...the real for their own intrinsic worth. Both these ...ons occur to make us estimate most highly the Bibles ...ich you have presented us. Any evidence that we ...e the good opinion of a society composed of so many ...st distinguished alike for their great respectability, ...r benevolence and their piety, cannot fail to prove a ...rce of gratification to every virtuous mind; and there ...ems to be a peculiar appropriateness in the tokens you ...ve selected to show that good opinion.

...A body of men like the Fire Department of New-Orleans, composed as it is of volunteers banded together for ...poses of public good, cannot find a better guide for ...r actions than is presented in that Holy Book, whose ...ce is Virtue, whose precept is Charity. Thus, there-...re, while the occasion bears testimony to your liberality, ...ur gratitude, let us still indulge the hope that it may ...ve to inculcate in our minds a sense of the obligations ...we to the Good God who has cast our lot in his Christ-...n land, and has vouchsafed to us the many rare bless-...s we enjoy.

...Perhaps the tenderest associations connected with our ...ves are those which cluster round this sacred volume. ...t is needless that we first opened its pages on a mo-...ous occasion, or perchance that as we left the bosom of our ...ther it was the parting gift of a dear mother whose ...ry accents less holy than that of God himself, brings ...k to fall hearts those cherished memories that are ...re far than gold, and richer than diamonds and pre-...us stones. It is but natural that this occasion should ...ng back to our minds scenes such as these, and it is ...ll to dwell upon them. I thank you, Sir, that you have ...ade instrumental in recalling them, and believe that ...re is no book so well calculated to prepare us for the ...ll enjoyment of them, as that for which I now beg ...ave, in behalf of my brother Firemen, to return you our ...most sincere and heartfelt thanks.

THE REVOLUTION IN MEXICO.

...Incunte in Mexico, the pulling down of ...d the lifting up of another set of rulers, ...s common a thing as to excite no surprise ...scarcely be worthy of the name of a civil ...volution. hold
Eternal anarchy, amidst the noise
Of endless wars, and by confusion stand.

This question cannot be answered by the political economist. The answer lies in the RELIGIOUS SYSTEM OF MEXICO. Our politicians speculate, our editors write about it, and go all round this point—sometimes almost venturing to utter the fact—It is Popery. No country is so blessed with religious privileges—after a sort. Of all swarms, that of Roman priests is thickest, fattest, and most devouring. They were at work there long, long before the first Protestant spire rose in the United States. They have baptized the whole nation. They have had their teaching and their ruling. And this is what we see. By their fruits ye shall know them.

CONFERENCE MINUTES.

To the Preachers of the Alabama Conference.

The minutes of the late session of our Conference are now in press and will be out in a few days. They have been delayed by the failure to receive Doctor Hamilton's sermon, the last pages of which have only come to hand to-day. As soon as they are published I will have them put up in packages to the several Presiding Elders and forwarded as follows:

For the MOBILE DISTRICT....To Rev. G. Garrett, care Baker & Lawler, Mobile, Alabama.

For the DEMOPOLIS DISTRICT....To Rev. J. T. Heard, care Rev. T. H. Foster, Demopolis.

For the GAINESVILLE DISTRICT....To Rev. E. Cullaway, at Macon, Miss.

For the TUSCALOOSA DISTRICT....By stage to to Rev. T. J. Koger, Greensboro, Ala.

For the BLOUNTSVILLE DISTRICT....To Rev. L. B. McDonald, Blountsville, care T. J. Koger, Greensboro, D. R. Bine, Tuscaloosa, who will please forward.

For the SUMMERFIELD—CAMDEN—MONTGOMERY—EUFAULA and TALLADEGA DISTRICTS....To Dr. Hamilton, in Selma, who has kindly promised to forward them to the respective Presiding Elders.

THOS. W. DORMAN,
Secretary Alabama Conference.

COLUMBUS, Miss., Jan. 22, 1853.

NOTICE.

I have made an arrangement with the house of R. M. Ellis & Co., 92 Camp street, New Orleans, for the transaction of all our receiving and forwarding business. It is therefore recommended to all who may order books through New Orleans to give us authority to consign to the house above named. We are fully assured that in so doing their business will be promptly and faithfully attended to. E. STEVENSON.

OBITUARY:

DIED—At the residence of his brother-in-law, Doctor Samuel B. Malone, in Columbus, Miss., December 13, 1852, of consumption, JOHN JAMES SYKES, of the firm of J. J. Sykes & Co., Mobile, Ala.

The deceased was born in Decatur, North Alabama, but for several years was a resident of this State. He had been a member of the M. E. Church about five years, and held his membership at the time of his death at Toulmanville, in the vicinity of Mobile, where he resided. For several months previous to his death, he had been traveling through Alabama and Georgia to recover his health, but finding the pursuit delusive and unavailing, became to this city some time last fall, that he might close his days among his numerous relatives, at the house of his fund and only sister. Her kind attentions with those of her husband, conferred upon him every comfort that a sister's love could suggest, or that experience and skill could devise. His sorrowing wife and children were soon at his bedside, and from the midst of this circle of loved ones, he passed away to await their arrival among the loved ones in Heaven.

I was unacquainted with the deceased, until we met in his sick chamber in this place, and therefore knew but little of his life and character, except what I heard from those who knew him long and well: from them I learned enough to know that he needed no eulogy from me. His many manly virtues speak his praise in language more impressive than aught I can say.

I found him, on visiting him in that state of mind, not uncommon to those in the same condition. He knew that his end was nigh, but feared that his preparation was not sufficient for the crisis. Of this, however, he was soon relieved, though doubts occasionally passed over his mind. But as he neared the river of death his horizon became clear, and when the moment arrived, he entered the cheering waters without faltering, and sweetly and safely passed the flood. The last night of his stay on earth was one of peculiar interest. It was Sabbath, and the duties of the day being over, I had retired to rest; but about eleven o'clock was summoned again to his bedside. He asked in a low and tremulous voice for prayer, after which he expressed a will to receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which was accordingly administered. his weeping wife and sister, with a few other friends, participated with him. This being over, he appeared composed, and fully resigned, expressed his restlessness and anxiety to depart. About eight o'clock next morning, he requested them to sing for him, and before the third stanza of a favorite hymn was closed, his happy spirit passed away to join the sing of the redeemed in Heaven.

So fades the summer cloud away;
So sinks the gale when storms are o'er;
So gently shuts the eye of day,
So dies a wave along the shore.
Life's duty done, as sinks the clay
Light from its load the spirit flies,
While Heaven and earth combine to say
How blest the righteous when he dies.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

CHARITY HOSPITAL.—We have received through Mr. Henry Bier Secretary and Treasurer, the Report of the Board of Administrators of this noble institution, for the past year. The following are a few of the leading statistical statements: Admitted 1852—of whom 10,441 were ... Discharged 15,067. Died ... of which 3 were fatal. ... admitted during the year ... Cost of maintaining the Hospital for the year $20,032 89. Total expenditures, $81,252 42. Gross income, $80,252 01.

The report is a very gratifying one, and in every way creditable to the zeal and intelligence of the Administrators. We hope our Legislature will never detain from this noble charity the aid to which it is so justly entitled.

DEPARTED MORTALITY FROM CHOLERA.—The brig Zodiac, from New Orleans, bound for Liberia, with emigrants, put into the river below Savannah, on the 17th, the cabin on the 1st inst., the colored emigrants, who were shipped under the auspices of the Colonization society. On the third day out the cholera made its appearance on board in a most malignant form. The captain and twenty-seven of the emigrants have died, and others of the officers, crew and passengers are seriously ill.

THE ST. CHARLES HOTEL.—This magnificent temple, devoted to the service of luxury, has at length reached its completion, and, furnished and opened in a manner to please every taste, was, on Monday morning, 24th inst., thrown open for the reception of visitors.

Whether we consider the spacious design on which this establishment has been projected—its classic modelling and tasteful architecture—the lightness of the thralls and the elaborate air of comfort and luxury that pervades it in all its appointments—it stands unrivaled in the Country, and may be truly called "The Palace Hotel."

All visitors to this city in the days prior to the disastrous fire that consumed the old St. Charles, and robbed it of one of its greatest wonders, will remember the former edifice, and to such a detailed description of the outward appearance of the new building will be unnecessary. With the exception of some lesser details now added, an extension of its dimensions by forty feet in the rear, and the absence of the former lofty cupola, lifting its head in architectural pride, and standing as a beacon to the gazers of the stranger—the new building differs little from the old. To such, however, as never saw the old structure, a partial description, embracing its prominent points, may not be out of place.

Immediately after the destruction of the old hotel by fire, (which occurred on the 18th of January, 1851,) energetic steps were taken to rebuild it on a like scale of magnificence. The call for this purpose was promptly answered. A company was formed and a sufficient sum raised to carry out the object, and this with the greater facility, as the former foundations remained undisturbed and were in fact better from having acquired solidity under the great pressure of the old walls. Under the architectural direction of Mr. George Purvis, who planned such improvements as have been made, the work progressed rapidly, as I now stands in all its severely classic completeness, o an honor to the taste and pride of our citizens.

The building covers an area of nearly an entire square, with a front on St Charles street of two hundred and thirty feet, running back on Common and Gravier streets by a depth of two hundred and twenty feet. The basement is built of gray granite entire, with walls in imitation of white marble above, rising to a majestic elevation. The first prominent point that strikes the eye and delights by its exquisite symetry the gaze of the beholder, is the facade fronting on St. Charles street. The two wings abutting on Common and Gravier streets are ornamented with pilasters with Cythdilian capitals, surmounted by cornices of the Ionic order. The portico between, adorned in the pride of art and presenting a light, airy, graceful, and withal permanent aspect, is supported by a double row of fourteen columns with fluted shafts and Corinthian capitals—six of these columns rising in the front and eight in the rear. Opposite and corresponding to these last are a number of pilasters of a similar order of architecture.

The old foundations have been used, except where the addition has been made of forty feet to the building.

ARRIVAL OF THE FALCON.

The U. S. mail steamship Falcon, Lieut. Henry Rodgers, U. S. N., commanding, arrived at an early hour Friday morning from Aspinwall, bringing the California mails, 150 passengers, and $250,000 on freight and in the hands of passengers. The Falcon left Aspinwall on the 20th, and has experienced heavy weather and head winds during the entire passage.

The steamship Georgia left Aspinwall on the evening of the 19th for New York, via Kingston, with 300 passengers and $2,500,000 on freight.

The steamship United States left the same evening for New York, via Kingston.

The following persons died on the passage of the Falcon from Aspinwall to this port:

On the 23d of January, W. Brown; on the 25th, W. Quinn; Thomas M. Lillas and Samuel Gallagher.

CROPS.—Sacramento, Marysville, Shasta, and several other parts of the State, have suffered severely by storms and freshets. At Sacramento, the river rose to an almost unprecedented height, and, the levee giving way, a large portion of the city was inundated. A great amount of property was destroyed, and among the poorer classes, who had suffered by the fire, the suffering was intense. At last accounts, the flood was subsiding.

The town of Marysville was submerged.

The Stockton Journal is filled with accounts of disasters by the storm and flood in that vicinity. Almost every bridge on the Calveras was swept away.

The number of affrays, murders and robberies continues to be about as large as usual.

The two hundred and thirty-second anniversary of the Landing of the Pilgrims, was celebrated at San Francisco in handsome style.

In the bay of San Francisco on the 25th ult, one hundred Chinese, who had taken passage on board the bark America, rose in revolt as the vessel was about to sail. The Herald says: The pilot took command, and had just given orders to raise the anchor, when the Chinese gave a yell of war whoop, and rushed down below in a body. In a twinkling they came tumbling up, every man brandishing a knife. They made a lively attack on the officers and crew, who, to avoid being made mince meat of, were compelled to beat a hasty retreat over the sides. None stood on the order of their going, but they went quickly. Assistance was soon obtained by the officers, and they retook and gained possession of the vessel and sent the rebels ashore. The Chinese, it seems, were falsely informed by some one that the supply of provisions and water on board was insufficient, and hence their revolt. They have since attached the America for their passage money.

Speaking of the decision of the U. S. Land Commissioners, confirming the claim of Col. Fremont to the Mariposa ten league grant the Alta Californian says:

If Mr. Frehmont gets possession of this estate, the grant stories of his immense wealth, which made even the millionaires of Europe stare, will be realized. That genius possession is the rub. The universal hands of the virgin are mostly occupied by miners who are not likely to go off. We have no doubt but Mr. Fremont's claim is valid otherwise it would not have been confirmed by the Commissioners; but the decision will have to be confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States before Mr Fremont and the claimants under him get possession—and they will not get it then, except nominally.

El Dorado.

The El Dorado News contains the following items:

The entire roof of the Empire Theatre gave way on Thursday night last, from the great weight of the snow that had fallen upon it.

The miners in the vicinity are now busily engaged in their diggings, and as a general thing with fair success.

On Sunday last, the firm of Bernstein & Co. of this place, purchased from the miners one hundred pounds and two ounces of gold dust.

On Wednesday morning last, the thermometer stood in this place at 20 deg. This was the coldest weather ever experienced in this region.

Snow commenced falling in this region on Tuesday morning last, and continued, with little cessation until Thursday evening, when it commenced raining. The immense quantity of water which is now running into the creeks and ravines, cannot fail to overflow the Sacramento Valley unless these streams very rapidly recede.

About one o'clock on Thursday morning, the roof of the Placer Hotel, in this place, fell in with a tremendous crash, caused by the great amount of snow that had accumulated on it during the two days previous.

Teamsters are asking from 11 to 15 cents per pound for freight from Sacramento to this place.

Property to the amount of two thousand dollars has been destroyed in this place, by the recent rains.

Haughton's Creek is now higher than it has been since '49, and that remarkable individual, the "oldest inhabitant," says that the freshet continues longer than it ever has before.

Later from the Sandwich Islands.

By the arrival of the brig Wallace at San Francisco, from Honolulu dates to December 1—two week later have been received from the Sandwich Islands. The Polynesian has the following:

THE SUGAR CROP.—The manufacture of the sugar crop commenced on those plantations where the cane blossoms and from present appearances a large yield will result from the favorable season the planters have enjoyed, so far as weather has been concerned. The nimrod drouth of 1851 destroyed much cane, but there has been no lack of rain the present year. We have heard persons who have visited the plantations on Kauai say, that heavier crops were never witnessed than were growing there a few weeks since.

From Peru.

The Panama Star has the following news from Peru:

The American ship Trenton sailed on the 3d November from Callao for a port in the United States, with guano, on the 27th of the same month met with a heavy gale, in which the ship made water so fast, that the pumps were ineffectual for her relief. Capt. Thompson put out his boats into one which he had scarcely had time to get himself and crew together with a small supply of bread and water when the vessel went down. Capt S and his crew arrived at Valparaiso on the 30th November.

The new screw steamer Amazon built in England for the Peruvian Government, had arrived at Tabelmonio and was taking in coal for a voyage to Callao. This vessel is represented as being a superb specimen of naval architecture. She is 300 tons, 200 horse and carries thirty guns. She was be quite a formidable addition to the Peruvian Navy, which has lately been quite augmented by the purchase of several fine and very large ships among them the brig Davis an American vessel.

Important from Mexico.

...by the steamship Falcon, at San Francisco, with dates to the 12th inst from Mexico. ... Arista has fled, and Miñon has been routed by Uraga. We subjoin the transactions of the Progress relating ... with Items from those of the Pic... The following is from the Diario de la Marina (ultra) of the Vera Cruz papers of the 11th:

The fact which array I yesterday from the city of Mexico, confirms the rumors which were circulated. It is said that Don Mariano Arista had resigned the Presidency and Don Juan Bautista Ceballos President of the Supreme Court, had assigned the direction of the Government in virtue of his office. The Siglo of the 9th says:

Yesterday every thing was moved gaily in the city. Startling rumors circulated the night in the streets, beside all parties in a ferment, and there was much doubt as to which either Arista would reclaim or cede. Those who feared one or the opposed the resignation. The Ministry declined to assemble public opinion on the question, and longer rumors were heard to the prevailing opinion. It is declarly with the members of the Finance Committees, both Houses, that Arista is coming prepared that he could not obtain extraordinary power from Congress, resolved to resign the Presidency.

This determination became public and alarming rumors were circulated, but it was had so little effect that the theatres that night was filled to overflowing. It was suddenly stated in one hand, that a Dictatorship would be proclaimed, whilst on the other it was announced with equal certainty that a provisional government had taken place in favor of the plan of Guadalajara. At this was unfounded Public tranquility has remained undisturbed in the capital. A few foreigners appeared in the coffee-houses and in the German club with arms, but only with the view of protecting property in case of any disorder.

The Siglo has left the palace at half-past one in the morning, in his coach, with an escort of fifty men from the Police Brigade, and a small guard from the fifth Regiment. We do not know where that route he took.

"The President of the Supreme Court of Justice arrived at the palace at midnight bearing letters sent for by the President who, on understand, left with him the letter addressed to the ... and handed him an official communication authorizing him, in conformity with the constitution to assume the Executive power.

"The Chambers are called to meet at 10 o'clock this morning, and perhaps a President ad interim will be named to-day. Present appearances lead to the belief that a majority of the members desire to maintain order and there is every probability that Senor Cevallos will be elected. The new Government has a legal origin and the events of the past three days prove that the people desire an observance of constitutional and legal forms, and the preservation of our institutions.

We continue our extracts from the Vera Cruz papers of the 11th:

"By the telegraph yesterday, we learned that the troops of Miñon have been completely routed by those of Gen. Uraga.

"Advices have been received by telegraph that the Texan rebels had entered Queretaro at the head of eight hundred men, determined to sustain the plan of Guadalajara. It is many then probable that the principles of the revolution are now governing the State of San Luis.

The following items are from the Vera Cruz papers of the 12th:

"We are informed that the Commandant of this city yesterday received a communication from the Government which has succeeded Arista, desiring to know if he recognized the authority of the new President. We learn that the reply was in conformity with the principles proclaimed in this place on the 29th ult., and that, consequently, the parties in the city of Mexico should communicate with them. Uraga, the only supreme chief recognized by the revolution.

"Senor Cavallos has formed his Ministry as follows: Gen. Blanco, War; Senor Bache Treasury; Senor Landron de Guevara, Foreign Relations; Senor Fuentes Justice. These names indicate the determination of the new Government. A change of persons, but no reform in the order of things. The same necessities, and the same causes for revolution exist. But this Government is more ephemeral than that of Arista, and will soon give place to the plan of Guadalajara, the dissolution of a Congress which has forfeited the confidence of the country, and the election of a President in accordance with the will of the people."

It is said that, in Vera Cruz they were anxiously expecting Gen. Woll, who is to head the movement in that State. General Santa Anna is expected at Havana where he will wait the progress of things, and watch an opportunity to take a part in them.

The Diario de la Marina says it learns from good authority that Mexico was about to pronounce for Gen. Santa Anna and the Guadalajara plan. General Sala and Lombardine being at the head of this movement. At this news is confirmed, the Presidency of Cavallos, which has been confirmed by the Chamber of Deputies, will not last long.

Colonel Robles had left Mexico for Guadalajara, it is thought, on same parliamentary mission.

Colonel Tenorio entered Queretaro at the head of 800 men, disposed to support the Guadalajara plan.

Further from Mexico.

The Trait d'Union, of the 8th inst, publishes President Arista's letter of resignation to the Minister of Foreign Relations, and also his letter explaining his reasons for resigning which was addressed to the Minister of Justice. Among his reasons is one, that the populace had determined to place him in absolute power, and he dreaded the consequences to the city and country, of such a movement.

The attack made by Gen. Miñon on Guadalajara, though very spirited, was without other results than the effusion on both sides of a great deal of blood. Fifty pieces of artillery played from each army during the space of two

This was followed by a sortie from the city by General Blanearte. One of the columns of Miñon sent to arrest its progress, was completely defeated, with a loss of three hundred killed and wounded.

A second sortie from the city, following half of Miñon's troops to San Pedro, and attacking the other half at Bosplein, defeated both corps entirely. The survivors dispersed.

The excitement was caused by Arista's leaving the city, and Juan B. Ceballos, formerly Governor of Michoacan, was the next day elected President ad interim. He accepted, and was installed in office the same evening.

It is affirmed that the new Government will set at liberty, or recall to the capital, persons imprisoned or exiled, for political causes, by Gen. Arista. This is to win the good will of all parties, and establish a feeling of friendship among themselves.

The Apache Indians, since the departure of the French expedition, have been committing a great number of robberies and murders in Sonora. They continued their ravages as far as the gates of Ures, the capital of the State. It is said that Rojo el Sol the famous Comanche Chief, has been killed by the Apaches.

CONGRESSIONAL.

WASHINGTON, January 18.

SENATE.—Passed the House bill appropriating $50,000 for the equestrian statue of Washington.

An act for the relief of the widow and children of Col McKee, of the army, was passed.

The Pacific Railroad bill was taken up and then postponed.

Mr Pettit, Senator elect from Indiana, was sworn in.

Mr. Cass's resolution, re-offering the Monroe doctrine and applying it to Cuba, was taken up.

Mr. Cass commenced his speech which is three columns long.

He was followed by Mr. Butler, who generally endorsed his views.

Mr. Hale followed, repudiating the justice of interdicting Spain from selling Cuba, and said if the doctrine was to be acted upon, let us commence by notifying England that she is not to sell Canada or any other of her possessions on this continent to any power than the United States. Canada was of more importance than Cuba.

Mr. Mason next obtained the floor, when the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE.—Mr. Brooks, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill for the establishment of a mint at New York, which was read.

Mr. Chandler objected to its second reading.

The House then took up the bill to suppress the utterance of small bank notes in the District, which was amended and passed.

The House then adjourned.

WASHINGTON, Jan 18, 1853.

SENATE.—Mr Badger introduced a bill abolishing the right to hold ... bail in civil cases in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Shields reported back House bill appropriating $50,000 for the erection, by Clark Mills, of an equestrian statue of Washington, in the City of Washington, and it was taken up and passed.

Mr. Mangum submitted a resolution, which was agreed to, directing an inquiry into the propriety of purchasing for the use of the navy, Espy's conical ventilator.

Mr. Soule submitted a resolution calling for correspondence relative to the claims of citizens of the United States against Hayti. Adopted.

Mr Brooke's resolution relative to the causes for the suspension of diplomatic relations with the Nicaraguan Minister, was withdrawn for the purpose of being offered in Executive session.

Mr. Chase's joint resolution re-affirming the Monroe doctrine, was taken up.

Mr. Chase said that two Presidents—Mr. Monroe in 1824, and Mr. Polk, in 1845—had made this declaration, and he [gives] good reasons why it should be adopted. Their declarations were but an Executive protest against the re-colonization of any part of the American continent by any European power. The right to assert such a right resulted from that principle of the law of nations which always adapts itself to the circumstances of the world. The right of the title by discovery, and that resulting from the discovery of America, and has since become an established principle.

To give any European power the right of dominion over any of the American States, or to place them in the position of dependent colonies, then this nation would become paralyzed in inexplicable difficulty. The provinces thus colonized would in the event of any European war, become disturbed and divided in it as partisans of their respective governments, and in this way our commerce and relations with the world would be embarrassed and circumscribed. The right of self-protection justified this declaration and its maintenance. In the correspondence between Mr. Rush and Mr Canning, in 1824, this right was published and advised by Mr Canning.

When such men as Mr. Monroe, Polk and Canning believed this right to be just, those who hold the doctrine now could stand undismayed by the sneers and scoffs which everlastingly were thrown upon them. If such a course was right thirty years ago, how much more was it proper and necessary now when our position has grown into strength and importance in the world. There was no doubt that the declaration made by Mr. Monroe had its due effect, and it was not to be denied that the opinion was fast growing in Europe that the United States did not seriously intend to hold to its declaration. It became our duty to declare that we do intend to maintain that declaration, and that of Polk, to be acted upon by any European nation who will resist it by force.

The declarations of Messrs Polk and Monroe had lain dead in the archives and should receive a legislative sanction and force. It was evident to the world that experiments were now making on our forbearance, and being yielded to in any case, events of critical importance will be based upon us. Our timidity and negligence have laid us open to these attacks upon our rights. Public sentiment has always been right upon this subject, and for in advance of Congress. Some years ago, when Mr Allen introduced resolutions on this subject, the Senate refused to take them up. It will have to be acted on at some time. The South American States were failing to

The Trait d'Union, of the 8th inst, publishes President Arista's letter of resignation to the Minister of Foreign Relations, and also his letter explaining his reasons for resigning which was addressed to the Minister of Justice. Among his reasons is one, that the populace had determined to place him in absolute power, and he dreaded the consequences to the city and country, of such a movement.

The attack made by Gen. Miñon on Guadalajara, though very spirited, was without other results than the effusion on both sides of a great deal of blood. Fifty pieces of artillery played from each army during the space of two

This was followed by a sortie from the city by General Blanearte. One of the columns of Miñon sent to arrest its progress, was completely defeated, with a loss of three hundred killed and wounded.

A second sortie from the city, following half of Miñon's troops to San Pedro, and attacking the other half at Bosplein, defeated both corps entirely. The survivors dispersed.

The excitement was caused by Arista's leaving the city, and Juan B. Ceballos, formerly Governor of Michoacan, was the next day elected President ad interim. He accepted, and was installed in office the same evening.

It is affirmed that the new Government will set at liberty, or recall to the capital, persons imprisoned or exiled, for political causes, by Gen. Arista. This is to win the good will of all parties, and establish a feeling of friendship among themselves.

Congressional Proceedings.

WASHINGTON, January 21.

In the Senate to-day several bills were passed, including one compensating the representatives of Major Twiggs, of South Carolina, for property destroyed by the British during the revolutionary war.

The House was engaged in discussing a motion to reconsider the order to print the President's message, respecting our relations with Spain. After considerable debate, Mr. Cable, of Ohio, demanded that the message be read.

Mr Polk called for the clearing of the galleries, and moved that the House go into secret session. The motion was negatived and the message was received. It was found to contain a communication from the Secretary of State, which stated that measures are in progress for the settlement of claims forbidden, and affairs are in such a condition as to render it improper at present to give the information called for by the House. Both Houses adjourned over to Monday.

WASHINGTON, January 25.

In the House to-day it was agreed to committee to report a bill in favor of reciprocity in the trade with Canada.—The Committee on Investigation appointed to examine the charge of fraud against Mr Strong the Superintendent of the extension of the Capitol, reported that the charges have not been substantiated, and that the slightest pretext for such a charge could not be discovered. MEMORY.

Soft as rays of sunlight stealing
On the dying day,
Sweet as chimes of low bells pealing
When eve fades away,
Sad as winds at night that moan
Through the heath o'er mountains lone,
Come the thoughts of days now gone
On manhood's memory.

As the sunbeams from the heaven
Hide at eve their light,
As the bells when fades the even
Peal not on the night,
As the night winds cease to sigh
When the rain falls from the sky,
Pass the thoughts of days gone by
From age's memory.

Yet the sunlight in the morning
Forth again shall break,
And the bells give sweet voiced warning
To the world to wake!
Soon the winds shall freshly breathe
O'er the mountain's purple heath,
But the Past is lost in Death—
He hath no memory!

From the Boston Journal.

THE LATE PROFESSOR WILSON.

A SKETCH; WITH SOME PERSONAL NOTICES OF A FEW OF HIS LITERARY CONTEMPORARIES.

The year 1852 was singularly fatal to great men, both in this country and in Great Britain. Here, the nation lost a Webster, a Clay, and a Rantoul. There, a whole country wept for a Wellington, its greatest soldier, and it now mourns John Wilson, one of the brightest stars in its literary hemisphere. Other mighty spirits have also departed during the last twelve months, but their "lesser lights" pale amid the blaze of glory in which the greater luminaries of the time have set.

Yes, John Wilson is no more! Glorious old "Christopher" has laid aside his crutch forever! At "Ambrose's" there is another vacant chair! Never more shall "North" discourse eloquently whilst "discussing his tipple" with Morgan, O'Doherty, and James of Ettrick. "Under canvas" those "Dies Boreales" have ceased to charm. His lashing critiques will no longer make literary temples shiver in their scarified skins; nor alas! shall we again have from his fascile pen Caledonian tales, with their "lights and shadows," nor fresh batches of glorious piscatory rambles, such as have often vividly led us in fancy by the banks of Irtun and Tarn, and by the sides of roaring rivers, such as are only to be found in the "Land of the mountain and the flood."

One by one—each after each. How, during the last few years, have the great authors of our time passed away! We can, as we write, call to mind some foremost writers, men and women, nearly all of whom we have had the honor of personally knowing, who have gone down to the grave. Walter Scott! It was never our privilege to "see in the flesh; but well do we remember Crabbe, the first great poet we ever looked upon; Southey, whose personal kindness we can never forget; Coleridge, at whose feet we have sat, as at those of a modern Gamaliel; Wordsworth, whose grave, almost melancholy, face still haunts our memory in thoughtful hours; Hood and Hook—personally and socially the opposites of each other—but alike in wit and wisdom; Miss Landon, sparkling yet pathetic; Miss Joanna Baillie, sage and serious; Harriet Lee, conversational, Jane Porter, [illegible] have known well and long, and mourned for when dead. And now comes to us o'er the broad Atlantic, the tidings of the departure of one of the last stars of that glorious galaxy of genius, which during the last quarter of a century commanded the admiration, in all civilized countries, of every arbiter of taste and master of opinion!

Of the few writers connected with what may be termed the Augustan age of English literature, who yet remain, may be mentioned as the leaders—James Montgomery, Walter Savage Landor, Joseph Cottle, T. B. Macaulay, Sir A. Alison, and DeQuincey. There are, probably, others, whose names do not readily occur to us just now, these are undoubtedly the most prominent.

So much for retrospection, which such an event as the death of Professor Wilson could hardly fail to evoke.

The readers of Blackwood have, doubtless, when perusing the brilliant articles of the editor of that magazine, pictured to themselves the personal appearance of the man whose vigorous sketches of "fish and fell" so charmed them. The masculine breadth of those descriptions of deer stalking, or of salmon fishing, and such like, could scarcely have conveyed any other impression than that Wilson was a physical as well as an intellectual giant. And such an impression would have been a correct one. But let us give a pen-and-ink description of him as he appeared on the occasion of our first marking his really majestic presence.

On our first visit to the Scottish metropolis, we felt naturally anxious to behold the living as well as the dead lions of the place. Fortunately we were supplied with introductions, so that no difficulties had to be surmounted. Already had we wandered about the Canongate, and each of those other places which the genius of Scott had made classic; had climbed to Arthur's Seat—wandered through the halls of Holyrood—and, in short, had stared at nearly all the stone and mortar celebrities of Edinburgh. And now we began to look about for the great men.

Nor had we long to wait. A "bonnie" young student (he too is gone) with whom we had become acquainted, was one morning chatting over the wonderful variety of good things which [illegible] a Scottish breakfast, when he suddenly exclaimed—

"By the way, Wilson gives his introductory lecture to-day. Would you like to go with me? You'll have a fine chance of seeing some of the Dons of our modern Athens."

Of course we were like Mr. Burke's "willin," and at the appointed hour we, with our friend, were in the lecture room, on the tip-toe of anxiety to hear the Professor of Moral Philosophy.

Mac—— knew every body, and so was a capital companion for a stranger. As the theatre filled, he pointed out one and another of the "Dons;" some of them we have since seen. But we will do our best to describe them as they appeared to us on that memorable occasion. First impressions are generally more correct than subsequent observation. The persons we are about to slightly sketch are now as deeply engraved on our memory as they were then vividly outlined on our retina.

But, before the Professor enters, we will glance at that brilliant audience, and select from it a few subjects for pen-pleturing.

Directly in front of the lectrure table is a tall, thin, delicate looking man. He has a high, white forehead, over which flows brown hair. Large gray eyes stare out wildly from their sockets, with a restlessness indicative of mental over-excitement; they roll from side to side, surveying, as would seem, every thing and every body at a glance. The nose is small, the nostrils large, and the complexion cadaverous. The dress of this individual is carelessly arranged—indeed it is almost slovenly; but then, he is evidently a thinking man—a close student. It is Robert McNish, who wrote under the name of "the Modern Pythagorean," in Blackwood for years, and whose "Anatomy of Sleep," and "Anatomy of Drunkenness," must be familiar to many of our readers. McNish was a young, striving, struggling surgeon in a small country town—a profession, the ardent pursuit of which, in connection with excessive literary labors, killed him while yet young, but not before he had witnessed his dawning fame. He was a vigorous poet, too, as his contributions to magazines abundantly testify.

Perched in among a bevy of beauties, to whom he is pleasantly chatting, sits a dapper personage, apparently some thirty-five years of age. He has a round, florid face; a keen, dark eye; a low, broad forehead; an aquiline nose, very white teeth, and partially gray waving hair. Very different in personal appearance is he from McNish, but he too, like him, worships at [illegible] shrines—those of Apollo and Esculapius. Like McNish, too, he is a regular contributor to Blackwood. It is D. M. Moir, of Musselburgh, better known as "Delta." Mr. Moir died about two years ago, and in his magazine Wilson paid a noble tribute to his genius.

But who is that small gentleman with the ill-natured physiognomy, who sits, as it would seem, chewing the end of a "bitter" thought in yonder remote corner of the theatre? Though somewhat minute in body and extremities, he has a wonderful head. What a brow! It is the redeeming feature of the countenance. The nose is ill-shaped, the mouth cynical, the eyes malicious, yet full of the fire of genius, the chin long and peaked—the entire expression ill-natured, with a tinge of gloom and suffering. That man has written one of the most striking books of modern times, and at the time we now write he is flinging off productions of unabated vigor. Of him James Hogg said that he was "a spiteful little opium chewer." It is Thomas De Quincey, at this day, we believe, as great a consumer of the poppy juice as ever.

And there sits Jeffrey, the emperor of critics, with gray head, and such a good-natured face that it is hard to believe in his literary scalping propensities.

But a round of applause is heard as the Professor enters. The buzz of conversation ceases: people settle themselves into their seats, and all are waiting anxiously for the first word from Wilson's tongue.

Wilson was then but a very little past his prime, and a magnificent specimen of stalwart manhood, he stood before that intellectual assemblage. Imagine, reader, a man, considerably over six feet in height, with a frame of corresponding proportions. His head was superb. A high well balanced brow was partially shadowed by an abundance of hair, which was tossed about carelessly over forehead and temples, and streamed down in dishevelled masses over his shoulders; large bushy whiskers of the same hue—but a trifle grayer—flanked his cheeks, which were tanned by sun and breeze, for there never existed a greater lover of out-door sports than Wilson, as they who knew him when he resided at Ellery will attest. And what remarkable eyes were his! They did not look at you, but they pierced into you, and shot through you. They were so bright and so keen, as the glances came from beneath the bushy brows, that from the position in which he sat, we could not for the life of us detect their color.

Two years ago, however, whilst strolling through the exhibition rooms of the Royal Academy, in London, we came upon a portrait of Wilson, by Sir James Watson Gordon, and there they were painted of a light hazel tint. That prominent feature, the nose, was large and aquiline—such a nose as Napoleon would have liked. The mouth was characteristic of great energy; but it was an organ which could expand into a broad grin, as well as compress itself into a state of savage glee, when its owner was dashing off such an article as that in which he flayed Bob Tatan Mon gomery. But there was dignity about it too. The combined expression of these several features greatly reminded us of Audubon, whom in many respects he much resembled. Add to this pen sketch of the head and face—a pair of broad shoulders, a vast chest, and long muscular arms, indicative of unusual strength; a pair of lengthy lower extremities, which might carry their owner over chasms which few would dare to leap—and you will have some idea of John Wilson, the immortal author of the "Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life;" "The Isle of Palms," and the no less immortal owner of "The Crutch"—Christoper North!

Wilson's style of lecturing was widely different from his style of writing. You could not have recognised the eloquent "North" of the "Noctes Ambrosiana," in the dry lecturer on moral philosophy—for a dry lecturer he was. Now and then, however, he would kindle and blaze up, and then the editor of "Old Ebony" might present himself. He was only truly great when, pen in hand and paper before him, he poured forth his thoughts like a flood—or when at the social board, he flung philosophy to the winds, and rattled off an after dinner speech. Then he was brilliant, indeed! Occasionally, however, he was injudicious in his [illegible] of the poet's sons, he fiercely criticised the follies of their wonderful sire. This he speedily regretted—for after the dinner, Wilson, with William Thorn—the weaver poet of Inverzany—visited Burns's birth-place, and whilst they were sitting on the bed in that sacred room, Wilson expressed a fear that he "had gone too far." Poor Thorn, who was half-starved to death, himself told us this, not long before he expired in want and woe at Dundee.

Much more could we say about Wilson—how he years ago made Wordsworth's reputation by never sending forth a Blackwood without a laudatory notice of him. How he patronized with pen and purse many a needy author—but we may not add, at present, to this hasty memorial. Suffice it to say that he was a great and good man—a true poet—a fine philosopher—one who has done the Estate of Literature great and lasting service. The page of "Muga" which may chronicle his death, and perhaps furnish his memoir, will be read with mournful interest wherever Genius and Taste have the power to charm—and who reads not Blackwood—that Prince of Periodicals with which the imperishable renown of John Wilson will forever be associated?

AN OLD CONTRIBUTOR.

January 6, 1853.

KNICK-KNACKS.

We take the following extracts from the editor's table of the Knickerbocker:

"Mrs. Neppins, in a very severe critique upon the style of our correspondent, who first brought her son Conklin Neppins, the poet, into notice, writes as follows: 'Now, of you want a real correspondence into your Magazine, you git my sen, of the name of Conklin Neppins, which, though brought up on shore-sass exclusive—that's 'sters, clams and scollops—I guess few can beat him in potry or a-prosin' 'nary one. He's a goin' to issoo a Ladies' Magerzine, into parts which appears ony wunst a manth, which I send you the perspectus herewith. But he can't begin afore he gits well. He would go a-bathin' into the harbor, which I call a-flyin' in the face of Providins, which made water for shore-sass to live into and not for us humans in cold whether. Seye Conklin to me, says he, 'Mer, I'm goin' to brest the billerin' nudges.' He talks that way cos he's a pote. Says I, 'Conklin,' sez I, 'don't you do no sitch a thing, for,' sez I, 'there's a nateral ile onto the hnamn skin; that's what keeps us wholesome, and if you go into the nudges,' sez I, 'you'll wash the nateral ile off, and tha water'll strike in onto yerstummik.' It did'n't do no use't: Conklin went into his nudges, and is now onto his 'chased cowch,' as he calls it, with an almighty colik in his intellex.' The 'Perspectus for The Quay Litery Gem,' to be conducted by a 'Litery Corps,' will appear 'iuto' our next number. It 'promises' rarely."

"A Texas correspondent writes: 'Some gentlemen were engaged in conversation the other day, when the subject of fighting came up, which, by the way, is a pretty fruitful topic down here in Texas; and several persons were named as being 'some' in a 'rough-and-tumble' fight; and among others, a man belonging to one of the churches in town was considered to be 'about the toughest customer to handle.' 'Yes,' remarked the parson of the very church to which the man belonged, 'I believe that brother D——, unrestrained by grace, could whip any man of his inches in the State.' A good clerical proviso, that!"

"I send you," writes a correspondent from Seneca county, "the following true incident, thinking it may do to go with the 'tooth-brush that belonged to the bont.' It is a positive fact: A Sucker, apparently for the first time from out his native 'grove,' hearing me, just after dinner, at the 'Hardy House,' Lasalle, asking the clerk for a quill, turned to me and said: 'Strauger, did you want a quill for a tooth-pick?' 'Yes,' I replied? 'it was for that purpose.' 'Well,' said he, taking from his pocket what appeared to be a dried sprig of balm, 'here is a piece of a 'yarb' that grows on the prairie: after you dry it, it gets as hard as a bone, and makes a right smart pick. I have used it two weeks; you may have it: I know you can get more!' He evidently thought me 'stuck-up' when I thanked him, and declined his friendly offer."

"A friend, writing to the editor from the good old Oneida region, and speaking of the 'Maine Law,' is reminded of a scene in a bar room, which accidentally came under his observation not a great many years ago: 'An old and inveterate toper stepped up to the bar, and asked for a glass of wine; the spruce and expert mixer of sherry cobblers handed down the decanter with a flourish, whereupon the old soaker very deliberately filled the tumbler nearly two thirds full, which he as deliberately, of course, swallowed, and then laid down a sixpence. I wish you could have seen the appearance of the indignant and astonished bar-tender! His eye glowed, his face kindled up, and, as our friend Dempster sings, in one of his humorous Scottish songs, 'An angry man was he, O!' as he quickly, and with a jerk, threw the 'siller' into the till, and slammed down three cents. The man of drink asked, with astonishment, and apparent simplicity, 'What! don't you charge sixpence a glass now for wine?' 'No!' said the enraged attendant; and his face wore a most ferocious look, as he quickly added: 'When we sell it wholesale, we always sell it cheaper!'"

IN VINO VERITAS.—"Mr. B——, a distinguished advocate and attorney general of a far 'down east' State, was sitting with his hat over his eyes, and his chin on his breast, bolstered up on either side with chairs and table, and sleeping as comfortably as 'the indomitable spirit of gin' would allow, in the court-house at A——, when 'the court' entered and took his seat on the bench. Observing the situation of Mr. B——, which had not changed on the entrance of the court, the judge looked at the sheriff, who seemed to understand that it was his duty to get the sleeper into 'condition.'

"'Mr. B——, the court is in.'

"'I won't give the reply. Suffice it to say, the sheriff had a decided objection to going to the murky and sulphurous place to which he was consigned.'

"'Mr. B——,' said the judge, 'we have observed, with profound regret, your conduct during the last week; and this morning we find you in no better condition to take up your cases than before. We are disposed to hear with you no longer. You disgrace yourself and your family, the court and the profession by your course of conduct.'

"'This reproof elicited the following colloquy:

"'Did you-r honor speak to me?'

"'I did, sir!'

"'What re-mark di-did you make?'

"'I said, sir, that in my opinion, you disgrace yourself and family, the court, and the profession, by your course of conduct.'

"'May I-i-it plense your honor, I have been attorney in-in-tu this c-court for fifteen years; and permit me to say, your honor, that that is the first cor-rect opinion I ever knew you to give!'"

THE WHITE ROSE.—Written in the fifteenth century, and sent by the Duke of Clarence (of the house of York) with a white rose to Lady Beauchamp, a violent adherent to the house of Lancaster:

"If thys fayre rose offende thye sighte,
Plac'd lune thye bosomaie fare,
Twyll blush to finde itselfe soe white,
And turne Lancastrye une there.

But if thye rulye lippe it spye
As kyss it thou may'st deigne,
With envye pale it wyll lose its dye,
And Yorkysh turne again."

COLONIZING SLOCK COUNTRY.—The Kanesville (Iowa) Bugle, of December 22, gives the following account of a man freezing to death on the Sergeant's Bluff, on the Missouri. Two men, Phillips and Mayfield, started from the Lamb settlement, on the little Sioux, to go to the Mormon Crossing on the Missouri river. They traveled the greater part of the day, when they sought the bluffs for protection against the freezing blast on the bottom land; but the cold was more intense among the bluffs than on the open prairie, and Phillips, overcome by the cold, could go no further. He urged his companion to go on, and send some one back for his body before it was devoured by the wolves. Accordingly, Mayfield traveled a quarter of a mile, when he, too, became so benumbed by the cold that he dropped upon the ground, unable to proceed any further. While he lay thus insensible the snow formed a deep drift over him, which broke the action of the wind, and saved his life. He revived after the lapse of a few hours and ultimately reached the house of Mr. Sisson Chase, and directed a party out in search of Phillips. Mayfield relates, when he left Phillips, his arms were both frozen up to the elbows. Mr. P. is lately from California.

PICKENSVILLE FEMALE INSTITUTE.

INSTRUCTORS:

R. BRADSHAW, A. M. Principal.... MRS. E. BRADSHAW, Superintendent of Domestic and Social Duties.

PROFESSOR C. F. YEAGLE, Instructor in Music: Piano, Guitar, Violin, Harp, etc.

Assistant Teachers: MISSES ANNIE E. RIACH, C. VIRGINIA SMITH, AGNESS B. RIACH, LIZZIE M. BRADSHAW.

The PICKENSVILLE FEMALE INSTITUTE is now, with a very full corps of experienced teachers, in successful operation. The Misses Riach, whose names appear with the other instructors, though natives Americans, were both educated in England. These ladies are not only finished scholars but experienced teachers. The Board of Trustees would, with confidence, recommend this school as worthy the patronage of an enlightened public. In point of merit they consider it second to no other similar institution in the South.

They would also assure the public that there has not been a death, nor a case of protracted sickness, in the school for the past three years.

☞ The next regular session of five months will commence the 1st day of MARCH. Pupils, however, will be received at any time, and will be charged only from the time they entor.

☞ Catalogues containing every necessary information respecting TERMS, etc., can be had by applying to the Principal.

LAGRANGE COLLEGE,

SPRING SESSION.

The Spring Session of this Institution will open the FIRST MONDAY in January, 1853. The Faculty is full and will so remain. The expenses per session of five months are:

For Board	$45 00
For Washing	5 00
For Tuition	25 00
For Room Rent and Servant's hire	3 00
Total of College charges	$78 00

The Students occupy rooms in the College building, and furnish their own candles, wood and other convenience, the cost of which varies from ten to fifteen dollars during the year.

The Faculty of the College take this opportunity of informing its friends and the public, that in future all just and proper means will be used to promote the interests of the Institution.

The Grammar School connected with the College is admirably taught and supervised by Mr S. P. RACE, a Teacher of experience and superior skill.

By order of the Faculty.

December 4, 1852. T. G. RICE, Secretary.

MARION FEMALE SEMINARY,

MARION, PERRY COUNTY, ALABAMA.

Faculty.

Rev. JAMES K. ARMSTRONG, A. M., Principal, and Professor of Moral, Mental and Natural Sciences.

Mr. H. M. DALY, Professor of Vocal Music, Piano and Harp.

Mr. NICOLA MARSCHALL, Professor of Drawing and Painting, of the French and German Languages, and Instructor on Guitar.

Miss M. L. THOMPSON, English.
Miss M. J. BONDURANT, English.
Miss INDIANA CLARK, English.
Miss ——, Music.
Mrs. REBECCA CLARKE, Matron and Nurse.

A commodious and splendid brick edifice has just been completed—ninety-seven by forty-seven feet, three stories—which for stability, convenience of arrangement, and for number, size and comfort of private and school rooms is not surpassed by any similar one in the country. The Principal resides in the building, and with his lady and competent female assistance, superintends the Boarding Department. A lady will reside in the Seminary, who faithfully discharges the duties of Matron, Nurse and Governess, so that at all times, pupils will find the comforts, kindness and attentions of home. The Principal, with the aid of female teachers, who also live in the Seminary, diligently guard and form their morals, manners and habits of the pupils. Being under his charge at all times, they are constantly exercised under a wholesome system of regulations, respecting neatness, order, punctuality, economy and regularity, calculated to give a safe and vigorous development to character. The applianbes of home and family are not removed by this arrangement, but perpetuated and strengthened.

The ensuing scholastic year will commence on Thursday the 23d of September, 1852. Pupils can enter at any time during the year, chargeable from the time of entrance. No deduction will be made but by special arrangement with the Principal.

Boarders study at night under a teacher. They are required to retire 9 o'clock at night, and rise early in the morning at a given signal, and to take frequent and wholesoom exercise.

Private rooms are large, conveniently and comfortably furnished. Pupils are required to keep their wardrobes and private apartments in neatness and order. A proper officer weekly takes charge of their clothing, inspects its condition, and every Saturday morning instructs them in plain sewing and necessary repairs of clothing. Every article of clothing must be marked with the owner's name.

Bi-monthly reports are sent to patrons, which are a faithful showing of the scholarship and deportment of pupils.

Pupils are not allowed to attend parties, balls, dancing classes, or any amusement calculated to interfere with their studies.

Visitors are not received by pupils, except with suitable introduction to the Principal from patrons.

The Principal must have certain information respecting every correspondent. Pupils are required to attend Church and Sunday School on Sabbath.

No accounts will be opened in Marion but with the expressed permission of patrons. When articles are to be purchased, the lady of the Principal must approve the purchase (who superintends their trading), and thus expenditures will be controlled. Patrons should anticipate and supply the wants of pupils as far as is practicable.

Dental operations will not be performed but by special permission from patrons.

Patrons are earnestly requested to encourage economy in all the expenditures of pupils—clothing, pocket money and jewelry.

The Institution has graduated forty-four young ladies since its organization, and arrangements are being made for furnishing, improving and increasing its Library, Apparatus, Cabinet and Herbarium.

The Professors of Music, Drawing, Painting and Modern Language have been engaged in this Institution for the last five years, with decided acceptability—are superior Musicians and splendid performers on Piano, Harp, Guitar, Organ, Melodeon, Violin, etc., and highly accomplished in other departments.

As to rates of Board and Tuition, $147 will pay the Board, Tuition and incidental fees of a Young Lady for the whole year in the collegiate course; $117 will embrace French and Latin; $225 the above, with Music on Guitar; $257 Music on the Piano, French, Latin and Board, regular course, etc. Books, Stationery, Music, etc., are furnished by the Principal at reduced rates.

Lights and towels for private rooms, to be furnished by pupils. The Principal can furnish lights very low.

One-half the Board and Tuition is due in advance—For further particulars, or catalogues, apply to sep18 3m J. K. ARMSTRONG, Principal.

MRS. READ'S SEMINARY,

BATON ROUGE, LA.

This Institution commenced its present session on the 27th of September, 1852, and by a liberal supply of talented teachers, is prepared to aid pupils committed to its care in acquiring a thorough and accomplished education.

Especial and kind care is bestowed on children in the preparatory Department. In the higher Departments, no effort is wanting which can advance the interests of the student.

Pupils admitted at any time and charged from the time of entrance to the close of the session.

No pupils are received except with the understanding that they are to remain until the session in which they enter is closed, which will be after the annual examination in July.

Expenses per session of ten months, for board, lodging, washing, and English tuition..... $200 00
Music, on Piano, with use of Instrument..... 70 00
French Language..... 30 00
Latin, Spanish, Italian, with drawing, painting, etc., are extra charges.

For further particulars apply to

CENTENARY INSTITUTE.

SUMMERFIELD, DALLAS COUNTY, ALA.

THE Exercises of the Tenth Session of this Institute will commence on the First Monday of October next, under the control and direction of the following named gentlemen and ladies, who compose the Faculty:

Rev. A. H. MITCHELL, D. D., President and Professor of Mental and Moral Science.

REV. ED HOPKARD, A. M., Professor of Ancient Languages.

MR. THOS. C. BRAGG, Professor of Mathematics and Chemistry.

REV. T. Y. RAMSEY, Professor of English Literature.

MISS JULIA O. TOWLES, Teacher of English Branches.

MISS MARY S. GARRETT, Teacher of the Preparatory Class.

MONS. JULES BRADY, member of the Royal Academy of Paris, Principal of the Musical Department, and Professor of French.

MRS. LUCINDA FERGUSON, Assistant.

Rates of Tuition for the Scholastic Year.

MALE DEPARTMENT.

Primary Class	$25 00
English Grammar, Geography, Arithmetic and History	30 00
Latin, Greek, Mathematics and Natural Sciences	40 00

FEMALE DEPARTMENT.

Collegiate Department	40 00

Extra Charges.

Music on the Piano	45 00
Music on the Guitar	40 00
Use of Piano	5 00
Drawing, Painting and Embroidery	15 00
French Language	25 00

Each student will be charged two dollars per year for the purpose of furnishing wood and water and for other necessary attention to the school rooms.

One-half of the Tuition Fee is payable in advance, the other half at the close of the session.

BOARDING.

Board can be obtained in the village and its immediate vicinity, in the best of families, at, from ten to twelve dollars a month, including washing, fuel, lights, etc.—half payable in advance, the other half at the end of the term.

Should parents be unable to accompany their children to the Institute they need not hesitate about sending them on account of boarding, as the President of the Institute will carefully see to it that they are provided with good boarding houses.

Parents are requested to send their children in time for them to be ready to enter upon their studies the first day of the session. This is highly important as the pupils will experience, through the whole course, the benefit of beginning with their classes.

The healthy location of this Institution—its entire exemption from local causes of disease—the moral and religious character of the community—the prohibition of the sale of ardent spirits in the village, and for two miles around it—its central position and convenience of access and facility of communication (having a daily mail, Sundays excepted,) together with the established reputation of the faculty in their several departments of instruction, should ensure to this Institute a liberal patronage, and the Trustees confidently recommend it to parents and guardians who have children to be educated.

CHURCH BELLS.

CHURCH, FACTORY, STEAMBOAT AND LOCOMOTIVE BELLS constantly on hand and PEALS and CHIMES of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast iron YOKES, with moveable cranks attached to these Bells, so that they may be adjusted easily and properly, and springs also, which prevent the clapper from resting on the bell; thereby prolonging its sound. Hangings complete (including Yoke, Frame and Wheel,) furnished if desired.

An experience of thirty years in this business by their late father, enabled h. to ascertain the best form for Bells, the combination of metals, and degree of heat requisite for securing in them the greatest solidity, strength and most melodious tones; which improvements together with his very extensive assortment of patterns, are now held by the subscribers, who have grown up in the business, and who will use every endeavor to sustain the reputation which the establishment has before enjoyed, both in this and foreign countries; the Bells from which have repeatedly received the highest awards of the New York State Agricultural Society and American Institute, and at which were completed Chimes and heavy Alarm Bells for different parts of the Union and Canada.

MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS will still be manufactured by the subscribers, of which they will have constantly on hand an assortment of Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyor's Compasses, (plain, nonius and improved,) etc. Also, Brass or Composition Castings of any size cast to order.

A PARTNER WANTED

IN A SUGAR PLANTATION.

A Sugar Planter of Louisiana, who owns a large Sugar Plantation convenient to the City of New Orleans, and also to the contemplated New Orleans and Opelousas Railroad—situated in a fine neighborhood—entirely secure from inundation, and with open land enough to employ from 70 to 80 hands, and to make from 500 to 700 hogsheads of sugar annually, desires as a partner some good man, who can add to the present force on the place from 25 to 30 hands, and advance from ten to fifteen thousand dollars in cash. The crops will make all the other payments that will be required. If desired, he would sell one half of the servants also with the land, provided a larger amount could be paid in cash. For further particulars, refer to the Editor of the New Orleans Advocate, or to Cherry, Henderson & Co., New Orleans.

☞ The Southern Christian Advocate, the Nashville and Louisville Christian Advocate, and the Richmond Christian Advocate, will please to copy the above till the 1st February next, and forward their accounts to this office for payment. sep18

A PRAYER IN SICKNESS.

Savior of man, on whom I call
In pain and sore distress,
In mercy let thy pity fall,
And heal my troubled breast.

Accept, O God, my humble prayer!
My health and strength restore;
Upon my heart thy altar rear,
And let me doubt no more.

O! may my heart be raised to thee
In love and thankfulness;
My soul from sin forever free,
My idle thoughts arrest.

And should I leave the couch of pain,
O! may I ne'er forget
From thy kind love the mandate came,
Which saves and spares me yet.

THE SNARES OF MINISTERS—DESULTORY HABITS.

Cecil says of a minister; that "he must not be to be had." That is to say, his calling must so entirely pre-occupy him, that nothing else can take possession. He must be able to say, "This one thing I do." He must keep his powers in tension, and his time occupied, so that trifles shall not divert him. The idle must turn away from him, feeling that he has nothing for them. His people must be made to feel that long calls are a bore to him. That they have to say and do with him must be with dispatch, that he may be about his business. He must go through the work like a strong man running a race, to make every body feel that he must get out of his way or be knocked down.

This is the way that all doing executive men succeed. If they were men "to be had," they would at once sink to the vulgar level of the do-nothings. "Bonaparte has been four hours hard at work this morning," says John Foster, on one of his days of late rising. Well might Foster feel rebuked by this indomitable builder of empires. And well may every minister who is "to be had," feel the same. Take a peep into Wall street, and see the lines of care which business has written on the features of those who make or mar fortunes. Their fingers are ever on the pulse of the market, their eyes intent upon the waxing or waning stocks, and their nerves are nerved up to the highest tension, as their feet haste to be rich or richer. These money hunters are not the men "to be had." Wife, friends, home, family, recreation, conversation, visits, books, excursions, everything must yield to the one absorbing idea of making money. Let the minister scrutinize the men of thrift among the farmers, mechanics and merchants of his own parish, and he will find that application is the secret of their success.

Be instructed by these examples, thou shepherd of souls. Is thine a calling to the highest of success at a cheaper rate? Canst thou gain pre-eminence in thy calling, and not be a man "to be had," the foot-ball of circumstances, the top of the unoccupied? Then set as much in thy calling to arouse, concentrate and absorb the faculties as in any other! Is there not as much to demand a rigorous disposition of time, and to penurious-ness in the expense of moments? "Ask nothing of me but time," must be the language of a minister's life. Who can estimate the value of one soul! One soul lost through any neglect is a wider waste than all the forces that ever carelessness rendered bankrupt. What interests can compare with those which cluster around our immortality? What! a man intrusted with such interests always ready for idle conversation, unoccupied hours, yawning listlessness, unnecessary and protracted visits, amusing stories, barren jokes? Oh! God, avenge not the horrible perversion upon thy thoughtless, forgetful servants.

The pulpit ought to be the intellectual as well as moral and spiritual educator of the people. Its business is to arouse thought, to excite and gratify the thirst for knowledge, to procure reflection and study, cultivate a taste for useful reading, and to interest the whole mind in the highest and most improving themes within the range of the human understanding. But is this a thing to be done without earnest and rigorous application? Can a man do it, and yet "be to be had?" He must plough and cross plough his own mind; yea, subsoil it, bring up and all its hidden stores of strength, and use it intellectually and spiritually produce to the full extent of its capabilities. Imagination, fancy, wit, poetry, feeling, judgment, reason, dramatic talent, every element of power in the mind, and capable of being acted upon it, the minister must cultivate. He would make the most of himself, and act successfully on the minds of his people, a man must duly farm his own intellect, or he cannot be an instrument of forming others. Nor can he bring beaten oil into the sanctuary when his own faculties lie torpid as serpents in their wintry dens! How can he preach from two to four hours to the same people each week so as to interest and instruct them, when there is no activity in his own mental machinery, and he is a man "to be had for any diversion?"

A lazy ministry makes a listless people. A pastor who has time for long visits, sub-visits to long calls, loves the places where good things are got, whiles away his day in mystery, and everything that happens along, has no special study or business at his heels, urging him to his utmost speed, such a man is a sinecure upon his calling. Were his sensibilities alive, shame would mantle and burn on his cheek at the contrast of his habits with the demands of his calling. We dare not estimate the waste thus made of ministerial energy. We fear the larger half goes in this way. The temptations to such a waste are innumerable. They begin with early life, and extend to dewy eve. They come in the form of charming society, ladies society not unfrequently; they assume the seductive garb of pastoral visits spun out to an inordinate length, to take tea and talk about whatever comes to hand; they cover themselves under rides and journies to attend this public meeting and that convention, when nothing is gained but dissipation of mind and unsettled habits; or they hide themselves in a budget of periodicals, which are with too many the larger share, if not the sum total, of their reading. A man must have an iron inflexibility of will to avoid being "to be had" under the circumstances which surround most ministers; and yet it can be done, provided you adhere to a few simple rules:

1. Never fail to have some hard task on hand in the way of study or writing. A farmer who clears an additional ten acres, with his own hands every year, will have no time to spare. And the minister, who has set himself to explore more untrodden field of thought, to make just the ablest sermon that time and diligence will enable him to make, to do his very best in something demanding strength and power, in addition to the ordinary routine of his pastoral studies, such a man will be penurious of moments. I say, in addition to the ordinary routine of studies and duties, for it shows that the mind is not well balanced, to allow its special intellectual enterprises to trench upon those which belong to the every day demands. A farmer who allows the land already cleared to go to waste for the sake of the ten acres he is clearing, does not act wisely. Do every ordinary duty, and something right hard in addition, and you will "not be to be had."

2. Keep the love of your work in a state of activity. This thought involves a glowing state of your spiritual affections. You will escape from the snares of these ministerial tempters.

3. Keep in view the walks in science and literature which you have not trodden, but which are within the reach of your diligence and industry. Some ministers are like the rustic who never traveled because he did not know that there were places to go to. How can you keep your faculties in tension when they are not awake to what is to be gained?

4. Get new books on all useful subjects, and read them. Read the dead languages. Be a man of right hard work, high aims, indomitable perseverance, and you will escape the snare of desultory habits.

LIFE-PREACHING.

As the sleighing was fine, Mr. Lamson with his family drove to an adjoining county, to visit Mr. Earl, an old friend, who had emigrated with him from the Eastern part of the Bay-State. In the evening, as they sat before a blazing wood fire, the conversation related to subjects connected with religion, of which they were both highly esteemed professors. As was natural the merits of their respective ministers were discussed, but not in a spirit which, I grieve to say, is sometimes manifested by professing Christians towards those who are over them in the Lord.

"We have," said Mr. Lamson, "the greatest preacher in all our region."

"Indeed! I never heard him spoken of as a great preacher before. I scarcely ever heard of him."

"I can't help that. I hear of him pretty often, and pretty effectually."

"I never saw his name in the newspapers. If he is such a great preacher I should think he would be making speeches at the Anniversaries."

"I do not think that follows as a matter of course. Speech making and preaching are two different things. I have heard a good deal of both. I do not think our minister would do for the anniversaries, at least not for some of them. At some of them the object of the speakers seems to be to make the people laugh or stamp. Now our minister could not do either if he were to try, and I am sure he would not try. When he speaks he always keeps the people still, and sometimes makes them weep, but he never makes them laugh."

"I heard him preach once when I was at your place on business for the county, and was detained over the Sabbath. It did not strike me that he was a very smart man; I remember that I thought he had a very orderly congregation. They were very still and attentive to what he said; but the sermon, though very good, had nothing great in it. He appeared to be a very good man, and I listened with pleasure, and I trust with profit to his discourse."

"What was his subject?"

"It was on foolish talking. He showed many ways in which Christians are apt to sin against the rule, without thinking of it. I found I had been guilty much oftener than I supposed."

"Have you ever heard the Rev. Doctor X——, preach?"

"Yes, I heard him about a fortnight ago."

"A good sermon?"

"Grand. He is a great preacher."

"What was his subject?"

"His subject was—let me see: I don't exactly recollect what it was."

"It would seem that our minister's discourse made a far deeper impression on your memory than Doctor X——'s. I call that the best plough which turns the best furrow."

"That is true. But do you think yourself that Mr. Harley is what would be called a great preacher?"

"He is not what some would call a great preacher."

"He does not take great subjects, does he?"

"He takes subjects which come home to men's business and bosoms, and treats them in a way to make them remembered, as your own experience can testify. When I spoke of him as a great preacher, I had reference, not so much to his sermon as to his life. Preaching is not all done in the pulpit."

"It must be prepared in the study."

"And illustrated in the life."

"Yes, the preacher must be a good man, of course."

"He must be a very good man if he would be a great preacher, and I call him a great preacher whose preaching produces great results. Mr. Harley's preaching has produced great results. He has been with us fourteen years, and many hundred souls have been converted under his preaching. His congregation has had an even and steady growth. For many years there have been no seats to let in the meeting house, which you know is quite large. When he first came there were some who said he was a small preacher, and several of the wordly minded portion of the society made some opposition to calling him. They are now among the best members of his church. When Mr. Miles, the great lawyer, offered himself as a candidate for admission to the church, and told his experience, he said it was Mr. Harley's consistent life that first induced him to attend meeting, and this to put himself within reach of the truth. 'His life,' said Mr. Miles, speaking of the minister, 'but not in his presence, so upright and benevolent, created within me a desire to hear him preach. So I went one morning, and was so much interested that I concluded I would go again. As he preached only what he practiced I listened without prejudice, and after a time some impression was made upon me, which, through the grace of God has, I trust, made a new man of me.'"

"Mr. Miles thinks Mr. Harley a great preacher. He never likes to have him away a single Sabbath, no matter who is in his place."

"It is a blessed thing to have so good a man for one's minister, and I doubt not that in most places such men, even if they have small abilities, do the most good in the end. But in some places it seems necessary to have a popular speaker in order to draw the people in: don't you think so?"

"It is desirable to have a good speaker, certainly: but what I call life-preaching is more effective in drawing in people than a pleasant voice and fine periods. Since Mr. Harley has been with us the other denominations in the place have tried the experiment of getting what they call great preachers. They have made a little impression on our congregation for a short time, but no one would leave Mr. Harley's ministry. And his has attracted many who would never have been attracted by oratory. His influence has been increasing ever since the day of his ordination. He has great influence over many who care nothing about religion. They will often, out of regard to his feelings, avoid acts of wickedness which they would otherwise commit. A few Sabbaths ago a number of ungodly youth, who came to live here last year, made up a hunting party to go to the mountain on the Sabbath. Their way naturally led by his door, but they went nearly a mile around to keep out of his sight. They were asked if they were afraid he would prosecute them? They said no: but they did not wish to hurt his feelings. By and by he will get those young men to attend an evening meeting, and then they will come to the sanctuary where it is to be hoped God will meet them in mercy and power. I do not think the church realizes sufficiently the importance of holiness in ministers. She does not pray for her ministers as much as she ought."

"That is very true."

"People seem to think that ministers are responsible for their spirituality, and do not consider that they are responsible in an equal degree for the spirituality of their ministers. A people feel the minister's influence on their piety, and the minister feels the influence of his people on his piety."

"Do your people pray much for their ministers?"

"They pray for him a good deal, though not so much as they ought to. Mr. Harley has taught his people to pray for him. At first when he earnestly begged their prayers, they seemed to think he was not in earnest. Each one seemed to feel, 'he is so good a man, he can't need our poor prayers.' But he convinced that he did need them."

Reader do you value piety in your ministry more than you value acuteness of intellect and pleasantness of voice? Do you pray for your minister at the family altar and in your closet? Do you thus aid him in preaching by his life as well as from the desk? [N. Y. Observer.

DISHONOR DONE THE BIBLE.

We commend to our readers the following from the London Biblical Review:

The most serious damage and dishonor are done to the Bible by interpolations which have gradually crept into many of the passages in common use. These, probably, originated in the desire to make more plain the supposed meaning of the written text, or to express the theological sentiments of the persons adopting it. Nevertheless, these alterations are anything but improvements, as may be seen in the following examples. The memorable promise of our Savior, Matt. xviii, 20, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them," is often used with the addition, "and that to bless them." This additional sentence is probably a mutilated fragment of the promise of Jehovah, Ex. xx, 24, "In all places where I record my name I will bless thee." But it is a superfluous appendage, not in harmony with the design of the Redeemer's promise, and when attributed to him, as his own words, is incorrect. The wish expressed by the Apostle Paul, 2 Thess. iii, 1, "That the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified," is often quoted with the addition, "and run." This appears to be an incorporation of the proposed marginal reading, for "free course" is mere tautology, and consequently should be avoided. The cheering declaration, Eph. iii, 20, that God "is able to do exceeding abundantly, above all that we ask or think," has often appended to it, the somewhat unmeaning and unscriptural sentence, "or at all worthy to receive." Now, as salvation is of grace, we are not worthy of any mercy at the hand of God, and this addition is, consequently incongruous with the passage. The beautiful and affecting declaration, Psalms cxxi, 7, that "with the Lord there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption," is sometimes encumbered with the ungraceful appendage, "that he may be sought unto," which certainly is not in the text, nor in the ode from which it is taken.

All sorts of emendations have been attempted on the Lord's Prayer, and in the apostolic benediction, 2 Cor. xiii, 14, with which our public religious services usually conclude. Indeed, so common are the alterations in the latter that, in a majority of instances in which it is used, it is employed with some interwoven comment or addition. Surely, the beautiful, comprehensive, and universally appropriate words of the Christian form of benediction might be allowed to obtain among us, as it was in apostolic times, without the numerous interpolations which conceit or vanity foist into it.

Many are the misapplications of Scripture in common use, even when accurately cited. We content ourselves with noticing only the following:

We have often heard persons, both in and out of the pulpit, quote, with a view to prove the universality of the divine influence, I Cor. xii, 7, "But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal." The slightest examination of the context proves that the "manifestation" refers to spiritual gifts, not to grace: and that the "every man," means not every human being, but every privileged person in the Corinthian Church. This quotation is often mangled, as well as misapplied, by substituting the phrase, "a measure" for "a manifestation." Some pious persons, supplicating a blessing on the preaching of the gospel, pray that what "is sown in weakness may be raised in power." Now, to say nothing of the uncomplimentary character of the allusion to him who sows the supposed seed, it is a sad misapplication of a figurative statement concerning the resurrection of the human body, contained in the sublime argument of the Apostle Paul for that doctrine in 1 Cor. 15. The striking phrase in Malachi ii, 15, "Yet had he the residue," (margin "excellency") of the Spirit is inappropriately employed in prayer.

A careful examination of the passage will convince us that it refers to the creation of the first human pair, as one flesh and one soul. Archbishop Newcome renders it, "And did he not make one flesh and one spirit thereof-a godly seed!" The received version shows clearly enough that this disjointed sentence should be used in prayer as an argument for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in the church and the world.

The passage in 1 Cor. ii, 9, 10, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him," is almost universally applied to illustrate the supposed entire ignorance in which even Christians are found of the joys of heaven; a dogma which appears not much in harmony with other statements of the Bible. This, however, is a misapplication of the saying, which being a quotation from the Old Testament, refers to the imperfect acquaintance of men in the early ages of the world, with the disclosures and joys of Christians. This is evident from the words of the Apostle immediately following: "But God hath revealed them unto us by the Spirit."

There is a deceitful handling of the Word of God, in which certain doctrinal points are undertaken to be proved, by the citation of a disjointed phrase, which bears a distorted or opposite view of the passage to which it belongs. As when the passage, Philip ii, 12, 13, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his own good pleasure," is arbitrarily divided in twain, the one part used, and the other suppressed; or as when fragments are torn from their connection and strung together in conformity with the whim or caprice of the person using them. Such tampering with any other kind of documentary evidence would be justly denounced among honorable men; but persons often take such liberties with the Word of God as would render them liable to a charge of untruthfulness if they so acted in reference to the words of their fellow creatures. It may be well to remember that we are told concerning all the words of Deity, "Add thou not unto them, lest he reprove thee:" Prov. xxx, 6, and that the closing part of Revelation guards sacredly the integrity of the Apocalypse by the most solemn threatenings against those who shall "add to, or take from, the words of this prophecy."

The Word "Selah."

The translators of the Bible have left the Hebrew word "Selah,"-which occurs so often in the Psalms, as they found it, and of course the English reader often asks his minister, or some learned friend, what it means. And the minister, or learned friend, has often been obliged to confess ignorance, because it is a matter in regard to which the learned have by no means been of one mind. The Targums, and most of the Jewish commentators, give to the word the meaning of—eternally, forever. Rabbi Kimchi regards it as a sign to elevate the voice. The authors of the Septuagint translation appear to have regarded it as a musical or rhythmical note. Herder regards it as indicating a change of tone. Matheson thinks it, as a musical note, equivalent perhaps to repeat. According to Luther and others it means—silence. Gesenius explains it to mean: "Let the instruments play and the singers stop." Wocher regards it as equivalent to sursum corda, Up, my soul! Sommer, after examining all the seventy-four passages in which the word occurs, recognizes in every case "an actual appeal or summons to Jehovah. They are calls for aid and prayers to be heard expressed either with entire directness, or if not, in the imperative. 'Hear, Jehovah' or, Awake Jehovah' and the like, still earnest addresses to God, that he would remember and hear."

[to borrow a phrase] we might call digestive assimilation. It would secure this its beneficial effect, in molding the spirits of the people, by its iteration, by its emphatic style, and by aid of the pleasurable excitements of music."

THE CHURCH OF SPAIN.

We see in Blackwood, for December, an article under this head, being a review of the practical workings of the Church of Spain, by a Mr. Meyrick. We will call out some of the facts contained in this article:

Spain is the only great kingdom in Europe which has been ruled, in all her faculties, by the Church. The priest has been the great depository of Spanish power. When the French invasion passed the Pyrenees, the people rose and resolved to be impoverished no more by the clergy. The monasteries were robbed, the revenues of the clergy converted into pensions; yet, in consequence of the ill use made of the spoils, Spain is not yet the richer for the plunder of her priesthood. In short, continental Europe now resembles a vast dungeon, with one-half of the population in arms to keep the other half in jail. The monarchs are the head jailers.

No Protestant worship is allowed in Spain, not even in private houses. We can not except properly the consul's house, at Malaga, where the Spaniards look upon the meeting as a mere civil affair, the consul's flag being the only protection. If worship were performed in any Protestant assembly, except at the consuls, the hearers would be fined, imprisoned, or sent out of Spain.

On Wednesday of the holy week the images of our Savior are dressed up and exhibited for adoration. In the evening was a grand procession. Four horsemen led the way; then a military band; then a long double line of men with candles; priests chanting; an image of our Lord on the cross; finishing the whole with a troop of soldiers and music. All images for worship, of any kind, are forbidden by the decalogue. The pretext that the Papist does not worship the wood or stone is answered at once by the sight of the worship. What are incense, genuflections, and bowing down to an image, but image-worship, rank idolatry?

A Spanish gentlemen told Mr. Meyrick as follows in regard to the clergy:

"They make vows of chastity, yet they are not chaste; vows of poverty, yet they are avaricious; vows of humility, and they are proud; and they have deeply injured the faith of a religious people."

Popery has now produced the same effects in Spain which it long since produced in France, as almost every man of intelligence is an infidel. The Spaniard is still cautious in speaking of the Church, but he exhibits his liberty by scoffing at the Scriptures; which, however, not one in two thousand ever reads. The celibacy of the clergy is a sore place. On this we have the following note respecting Malaga:

"The experiment of a celibate clergy has been attended with the worst results. There are families known to be the children of monks and priests. Under the weight of this the whole religious system seems to have broken down."

In the matter of confession, the mainspring of Popery, mammon interferes, and the "certificate of confession" may be had for money. Formerly, confession was required before any man could hold an office under government; but the annoyance of submitting to confession was easily obviated, the certificate being sold for a small sum.

The small amount of preaching in Spain is not exposition of holy Scripture, but harangues about purgatory, masses, and the like. Take a specimen: When the Virgin fled to Egypt she fell into the hands of robbers. Demas, their captain, released her. This Demas, however, was none other but the penitent thief, who, through the intercession of Mary, was saved.

Take another specimen: The Virgin will never permit one of her worshippers to be lost. According to the doctrine of the Church, he can not enter heaven if he die in mortal sin; yet our Lord can not reject his mother's petition. Hence, a man thus circumstanced is sent back on earth to earn money enough to pay for his sins, and Liquori and other divines are quoted to prove this.

Bills of indulgence are granted with great readiness, and to any extent. In the Spanish Almanac, for 1851, it is stated that Pope Pio Nino has given to all Spaniards the privilege to eat "wholesome flesh meat, during Lent, with certain exceptions." The price is about eight cents for the indulgence; yet, for all Spain, it is a handsome amount. Spain is the most extraordinary country in Europe, from the superiority of its climate, the advantages of its position, the variety and richness of its productions. The whole area of Spain is about 185,000 square miles, or double the area of the British Isles; yet its population is only ten millions. Once sovereign of Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain has lost them all. She has lost her rich possessions in the Western World. Cuba alone remains, and her tenure is very precarious. Spain has never recovered from the destruction of her Armada. This noble country is in a state of ruin for want of the Bible and the religion of the Bible. See the effect which the religion of Rome has produced on the morals of Europe. Look at the punishment of the European Nations for abandoning the dictates of Scripture, and worshiping according to the dictates of man. See the invasions, the convulsions, the conspiracies which have wrought their punishment before heaven. The entire Popish continent is now in slavery; while England has been preserved for three hundred years. Here is a contrast between Protestantism and Popery. [West. Christian Advocate.

Religion.

Religion is like the firmament: the more one searches it, the more stars are seen. It is like the sea, the more one views it the more boundless it appears.

LEAVES, WITHOUT FRUIT.

Christ cursed the fig tree, and it withered under his frown because when he came to it he found leaves upon it but no fruit. It wore the appearance of thrifty, vigorous, and productive life; but that life came to nothing. It had no results. The tree did not accomplish its office. It did not fulfill its promises, even; and when he looked to pluck ripe figs from it, to satisfy his hunger, it offered him only the useless foliage. Therefore he cursed it; and the very same power that gave sight to the blind, and hearing to the deaf, and strength to the lame, and life to the dead, the power that was always controlled by wisdom, destroyed the fig-tree, instantly and utterly, because of this barrenness in the midst of large promise. There is a moral in the fact.

How many Christian professors are there who have Leaves but no Fruit! The doctrines of Christianity, intellectually believed, frequently announced, perhaps argued for, gloried in, are these leaves; and beautiful they are, glossy, complete, the creatures of God. But there is no fruit, of pious, noble, self-denying action, beneath this foliage, and so it is worthless. The forms of religious observance are such leaves; attendance on prayer-meetings; an austere countenance; or certain habitual tricks of speech, by which all men may recognize them as "professors." But the fruit, of progress in spiritual knowledge, of philanthropic action and of pure affection, is not found in their life. They are trying to live with no other expenditure of resolution, and no other reliance on Divine assistance than is needful to preserve this external leafiness, and to have their foliage rustle in all winds. So it signifies nothing. Perhaps a habit of excellent morality, cheerfulness of temper, constitutional hopefulness and buoyancy of spirit, are their leaves; and still amid all this glad and green array, so rich and refreshing to the eye of taste, the golden fruit of Christian affection is utterly wanting. There is natural cheerfulness, but not Christian joy. There is pleasantness of demeanor, but not a personal love for Christ, that will transform, and conquer temptation and overcome Death! The fruits of the Spirit, as Paul enumerates them, are: "Love; Joy; Long suffering; Gentleness; Goodness; Faith; Temperance." Against such, he adds, as with a beautiful smile, "there is no law," of God or man. Except then we have and show these fruits of Christianity in the life, we have reason to fear that all our glowing dress of sentiment, of doctrinal conviction, of pious formalities, is simply foliage; not beautiful to Christ, who understands its real character, but only obnoxious and hateful to him, because hollow and insincere; a semblance, without substance.

The same rule of judgment applies as readily to institutions as to men; to churches, for example, that are full of worshippers, and solemn or splendid in their usages and forms, but within which is pride, ostentation, and not charity; ambition for popularity, not the beauty of self-denial. It applies to philanthropic and missionary association, whose machinery is ample, whose apparent operations are wide and imposing, but who still accomplish little of spiritual good to those for whom they act; who are more intent on the reputation of large action, than on the fruits of knowledge and well-being in the souls which they affect. Everywhere there is peril, lest the trial shall be made to substitute foliage as an equivalent for fruit; and everywhere it is certain that it cannot be made with success, or with safety, beneath God's administration. Christ is not deceived by it; and against precisely this his frown and his curse are most unsparingly revealed. It is a reason for cautious and frequent self-examination; a reason for prayer, for humility, and for activity, ever increasing, and ever renewed, in the service of the Master. And let him that thinketh that he standeth surely, take heed lest he fall before all others! [Independent.

Death of a Great Leveler.

As Alexander the Great was marching in pomp at the head of his mighty army, he passed where Diogenes, in his tub, was very intently engaged in examing, arranging, and re-arranging a heap of bones. The conqueror, causing his hosts to halt, thus spoke: "What doest thou there, Diogenes?" The cynic replied: "I have here the bones of thy father, Philip, from which I am trying to separate those of his lowest servant; but for the life of me I can not determine which is which!"

Cure for the Blues.

Luther says: "When I am assailed with heavy tribulations, I rush out among my pigs rather than remain alone by myself. The human heart is like a mill-stone in a mill: when you put wheat under it, it turns and grinds and bruises the wheat to flour; if you put no wheat in, it still grinds on, but then it is itself it grinds and wears away."

Cholera—Symptoms and Treatment.

The New York Sun, speaking of this fearful disease, says that in its incipient stages it may be ranked with ordinary diseases, and will then yield to proper medical treatment. Its first symptoms is generally looseness of the bowels, and to remove this we know of no remedy more efficient, certain in effect, and harmless in its nature, than the following cholera recipe. We deem it highly important that every family and workshop should be supplied with this mixture, or its equivalent, ready for use at all times. Any druggist will supply it. The following is the recipe: Take equal parts of tincture of laudanum, cayenne pepper, (treble strength) rhubarb, spirits of camphor, and essence of pepperment, (treble strength.) The dose is, from five to thirty, or even sixty drops, according to the age of the patient, and violence of the symptoms, and it should be repeated every five to thirty minutes until relief is obtained.

"THIS ONE THING I DO."

"Hero worship," as Carlyle calls admiration for great men, is a sentiment natural to man. It is akin to that nobler and higher admiration which leads us to contemplate God with adoring homage as the Infinite embodiment of all greatness. Great men are the noblest exhibitions of our nature; they are the glory of their age and country and kind—their names and deeds are the heritage of all after time.

It is deeply interesting to know the greatest purpose of great men, the grand object for which they lived and labored, and it is one principal aim and end of history to tell us. St. Paul was great—greatness we understand to be great ideas realized, either in action or composition. Hannibal and Napoleon were great men in action; Homer and Milton were great in composition. St. Paul has just claims to both forms of greatness. He was great in action. He was the greatest of all Missionaries. He visited more countries—from Spain to the Euphrates, and from Africa to Germany—than any of the illustrious and devoted men who have come after him. He founded more churches and was instrumental in the conversion of more souls than any of his inspired compeers, or any of the great preachers of succeeding ages.

When Hannibal and Napoleon marched to scale the frozen Alps and conquer on the plains of Italy, they were sustained by the valor and power of mighty nations. But St. Paul had only the promise of God, "Lo I am with you always," and yet without sympathy and contending against universal opposition, he founded instrumentally a wider and a more enduring empire than they. Paul's greatness was of the character that springs from lofty and God-like principle, that is not dependant upon the opinion of an age or a country, that needs to have its impulses roused by the eulogy of an orator, or the applause of millions, but nobly and unfalteringly seeks and maintains the right because it is right.

Paul was great in composition, simple and clear in narative, powerful in argument, and eloquent in appeal. It is true he wrote as he was moved by the Holy Ghost; but the Holy Ghost has been pleased to employ and develop in the Holy Scriptures the mental peculiarities of various orders of mind—as the poetical beauty and devotion of David, the profound and practical sense of Solomon, and the prophetic fire and splendor of Isaiah. So that while "all Scripture is given by inspiration," each writer is allowed to express the truth according to the bent of his peculiar mental character. Paul then we affirm was great—great in thought, great in action.

When we study history we are mournfully impressed with the selfishness of even the greatest men. Few, almost none of them have risen above it, and it is perhaps precisely on this point that our Washington was, of all uninspired men, the greatest and peerless on the rolls of time. Few among the great men of history have lived for their race, for immortality, for God; but rather for the most part have lived only for the praise of men. But St. Paul's greatness, like an Alp upon Appenine, towers immeasurably above all the noblest heirs of fame. For what did this great man live? What was the grand impulse that gave birth and activity to all the glorious doings of his history? The one thing for which he lived, laconically, yet comprehensibly expressed, was "Christ." He lived for God; in doing this he lived for his soul, for immortality, for all his race, for Jew and Gentile, and for all the unborn generations of on-coming time.

But how, it may be inquired, how did St Paul? How does the Christian live for and "do one thing!" and yet engage in various human labors, and take a part in the varied movements of society!" Let us answer by a few simple illustrations. The farmer clears, encloses, and ploughs; he plants, cultivates and gathers his harvest, and yet we see he does one thing. The sailor freights his ... procures supplies, attends to sails and he... and canvas, and yet he does one thing.

When Demosthenes spoke with pebbles in his mouth, when he declaimed to the roaring waves as they lashed the rock-bound shore, when he ran up steep ascents, speaking aloud as he ran, when he jesticulated with naked sword over his shoulder to correct an awkward movement, when, he shaved half his head and then hid three months in a cave to perfect the composition and delivery of an oration, he "did but one thing" in all this, he labored to make himself a successful orator.

So St. Paul, in all his distant journies, in all his able letters to the Churches, and in all his faithful and powerful preaching, did but one thing.

So the Christian in all he does recognizes God. In all his domestic relations and duties, in all his business transactions, the solemn and impressive truth, "thou God seest me, is felt to be a homo-coming reality that tells upon the moral character of every hour and act of his history. So that in whatever he does, he feels that he does one thing, he "presses for the mark of the prize."

The next aspect of the oneness of St. Paul's purposing and doing that strikes us, is the wisdom of it. Concentration and perseverance are the primary elements of success, and in all possible enterprizes they ensure success. It is a maxim of practical wisdom that he that plies all trades is good at none. Let any man attempt to give his individual attention to the carrying forward of several sorts of business at the same time, and unless he is a universal genius, it will require no spirit of prophecy to predict the result. In attempting all, he must neglect all, and never excel in any.

Great statesmen, great artists and great preachers have devoted themselves to one work, one work at a time, and further by perseverance, to one work for all time.

How noble an example have all, and especially Christian Ministers, in the great Apostle. Doubtless St. Paul felt that the work of the Christian Ministry was quite enough for him, surpassingly great as were his natural and supernatural endowments, and that in meeting the claims of his holy calling, he would nobly fulfill the highest aim of life. Let his example instruct and rebuke those whose manner of life but too plainly indicates that preaching Christ is incidental, and some other calling the great business of life.

St. Paul's wisdom is manifested in the unity and character of his choice. One thing, and that the noblest that could employ the high-born energies of his intelligent and immortal nature. Having chosen this lofty end, St. Paul held on to it with indomitable energy and zeal, held on to it through poverty, suffering and shame. Wherever he might be, on Mount Moriah, the Hill of Mars, or the Forum of Rome, unseduced by the smiles, unawed by the frowns of the world, he constantly proclaimed "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." What did it matter that mountains towered, or oceans rolled between, he pressed for the mark of the prize, saying, "none of those things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God." Thus he lived, keeping the faith, and when he came to die, he wrote "I am ready," and henceforth a crown awaits him.

A CASE, AND A QUESTION.

Mr. Editor—As your excellent paper is the medium through which information upon Church law, usage, polity, etc., is frequently conveyed to us, and as you live a little nearer the "East"—"the source of light"—than we do, we wish, with your permission, to present "a case, and a question:"

"A Case." Mr. H. transfere from the Tennessee Conference to Texas, and is placed in charge of a Circuit. His necessary expenses, traveling from Tennessee to Texas, to the seat of Conference, and to his work, are fifty dollars; his quarterage claim two hundred dollars; his table expenses, the current year, are put down one hundred dollars, making his entire claim against the Circuit three hundred and fifty dollars. The entire claim of the Presiding Elder, uguinst the same Circuit is fifty dollars. There is collected during the year, not particularly as "quarterage," nor "table expenses," nor "traveling expenses," but for the "support of the preachers who labor for us this year," three hundred dollars. Now, for the—

"Question." How should this amount be divided between the Presiding Elder and the Pastor of the Church!

Should the Board of Stewards in their final settlement with the preachers set down the entire claim of each $50—$350—$400? "If $400 give," etc., or should they first pay their "travelling expenses," then their "quarterage," according to their respective claims, and then their "table expenses," in proportion to what the Stewards have agreed to allow them, and the amount on hand? Is there a specific law of the Church settling these questions! If not, what is the usage of the Church generally?

We are not much accustomed to "pheing ideas on paper," but feel some interest in this matter, and therefore write.

By giving us an answer to the above, you will very much oblige

Equal Justice.

REPLY.

We are neither a judge or divider over the Preacher and the Presiding Elder. But if we can shed any light, from this direction, upon the very extraordinary case presented, it will afford us pleasure.

First. From the quarterage allowed, we infer the "Transfer" is a married man. There are two. He is a man of family, but just as small a family, as any family could be, to be a family. Now the item of travelling expenses—$50 from Tennessee to Texas, to the seat of Conference, and to his work—would bear scrutiny. Hope the Brother has receipts from all steamboat clerks, tavern keepers, ferrymen etc., to show how that much money went.

Second. The table expenses "are put down" $100. It should have been written "put up." Alas, for the extravagance of these latter days! It has got among the Methodist Preachers, too. No more of the old sort left. High living! It will be the death of us! Hence, there is so little spirituality among the membership. The Preachers do all the law-making, and fix their own salaries, and live so high! How can it take $100 to support a Preacher a single year, with a small family? Something must be going wrong. No wonder the Circuit sunk down under the burden. In the language of a functionary we wot of, "it was too intolerable to be borne!" Who can blame a small Circuit, with only three or four hundred members, for not coming up to such an extravagant figure? That a Preacher and his family should live, is admitted. But why should they fare sumptuously every day?

We have been wondering how that preacher's family could make way with $100 on the bare item of "table expenses." He must have bought up cheeses and pared off the rind, and eat that, and sold the inside at an advance upon cost price.

Third. Our correspondent states the case, and says: "Now, for the Question: How should this amount be divided," etc. Now, we are not ready for the question, and never expect to be. The case exceeds our arithmetic. Instead of going through the formula, "If $400 give, etc.," the calculations are running through our mind like these: How much money in bank must a man have before he can afford to be a Methodist traveling Preacher! How can the members and Stewards of the above Circuit, and all like them, pray to God to send forth more laborers, supporting those already sent as they do! We could propose twenty questions, of practical and great significance, growing out of such a case. But enough.

Fourth. As to "the specific law of the Church" involved, our correspondent has the Discipline, and can read it himself. We can neither cypher nor expound for him. As to "the usage of the Church, generally," we hope it is better than this; if not, that it will mend.

OLIO.

Some of the late issues of the secular papers announce the separation of Bishop Ives from the P. E. Church, and his union with the Romish. This event, perhaps, surprises no one conversant, of late years, with the Rev. gentlemen's history. He has sometime held to doctrines which were anti-Protestant in their spirit and tendency; and his own church, especially that portion of them called low-Church, have feared his influence, and have tried to check it. But now he has leaped beyond all restrictions, and declared that if he could not get his church to go over to Rome, that he would quit them and go without her. I suspect that the Romish Church exults no little at such an acquisition, and longe and looks for others from the same quarter of like ecclesiastical and doctrinal complexion with the Bishop.

I wonder what has become of those young men he tried to make priests by persuading them to take the vow of celibacy? No doubt he will attempt to carry all he can of these over to his adopted church, as an earnest of his future endeavor to advance her interests.

No small exchange has been going on between the Protestant and Romish Churches within the last few years: but I am inclined to think that the former has been the gainer both in numbers and piety. Some, however, imagine that Romanism is on the increase. It would appear so from statistics lately published in this country; but it should be borne in mind that they count, as belonging to them, those who compose their congregations without being formerly connected with their church. They also include in their membership the children baptized by their priests. If the Methodist Church were to reckon her host after the same manner she would no doubt approximate five millions.

Romanism is evidently on the decline in the world if their own papers can be relied on; for, if I mistake not, they make known a loss of two millions to the church. They may have increased in the United States, but in Europe they have diminished. The great tide of emigration which has been for some time setting in towards our shores has roiled thither a large number of Romanists, but not a few of these in leading refused to re-affiliate with that church, and indeed many of them have formed no church relations whatever, while others have declared in favor of Protestantism. I have taken pains to converse with foreigners upon the subject of religion in order to ascertain their church affinities, and I have found many who have been brought up in the Romish Church, but who express for it a feeling of indifference.

The world is no doubt growing impatient of the tyranny of that church. The South American Republic has resolved to make the Roman Catholic Church keep in its proper position. Among other things, it is said, it has decided that the vestries of the parishes shall have power to choose their priests, or those whom they would have as their pastoral and spiritual overseers and advisers. This is deemed an invasion of the rights of the bishops, who claim to appoint as well as consecrate priests. We are told that some of the bishops have proved refractory. The Bishop of Carthagena has been exiled for his contumacy. In the language of a late writer: "This is an astounding procedure, one would think, for a South American Government." This was done in New Grenada, which is in advance of all the Governments of the Spanish portion of South America. The Pope, while he grieves over such disaffections, appears, nevertheless, afraid to do as some of his precedecessors have done—lay under ban," or "excommunicate," a whole country at a dash.

From present appearances Rome will, ere long, have trouble enough in managing her affairs in Sardinia and Prussia. Italy, herself, will no doubt in time make her hoary head ache in devising measures to quiet her dissatisfactions. Indeed, the Pope is finding that he and his Cardinals, put together, can hardly hold the reins on their subjects. A gentleman remarked to me that not a great while ago he was in Rome, during high mass, where he saw the Pope in procession, in all his gorgeousness of apparel, surrounded by the dignitaries of the church: he says, while the Pope was passing, he happened to be standing near an Italian, who spoke pretty good English, and he inquired of him how he liked such performances, when he gave him to understand that he cared but little about them. He next asked him if he did not love the Pope, when he replied: "I love him well enough to kill him: there are many others in Italy who have the same feelings towards him." I doubt not but what there are thousands upon thousands, even in Catholic countries, who would rejoice to see the Papal Chair forever vacated.

A little incident occurs to my mind which I will here relate: A lady visited a minister of the M. E. Church, not long since, to obtain his aid in getting her daughter into a Protestant school. She remarked that she had been sending her to a Catholic school, but now desired to remove her. He asked her some questions concerning her daughter, when she proceeded to detail, in substance, the following: She remarked that her daughter had paid her a visit, and while with her she asked her, on a certain Sabbath, to accompany her to the Methodist Church, but she refused her consent, stating that she had no confidence in them; did not believe that they were Christians. The mother, however, prevailed on her to go. After she had attended, and the services were concluded, she remarked to her mother: "I can never be a Catholic." Some impression had been made upon her mind which, doubtless, convinced her that she was in error. Her mother, however, sent her back to the same school, but the conductors of that school had heard that she had attended a Protestant Church, and they were deeply incensed; they went so far as to make her do penance, by confining her in a room, and making her live on bread and water. They also attempted to compel her to unite with their church, and because of her refusing to do so, subjected her to persecution.

The above facts were related by the mother of the young lady who, herself she said, had been brought up a Catholic and educated at the same school alluded to. She observed at the same time, she had hardly ever attended the confessional, for she disapproved of it. She appeared deeply grieved because of her daughter's persecutions, and declared her determination to remove her as soon as she could procure her a place in some Protestant school. What she has done in reference to the matter I cannot learn, but I hope she will find no impediment to the carrying out her purposes. I might make some reflections here, but as I intended not to write a long article I will close.

"ALL THY WORKS PRAISE THEE."

BY MARY HOWITT.

The moon beams on the billowy deep,
The blue waves rippling on the strand,
The ocean in its peaceful sleep,
The shell that murmurs on the sand,
The cloud that dims the bending sky,
The bow that on its bosom glows,
The sun that lights the vault on high,
The stars at midnight's calm repose;
These praise the power that arched the sky,
And robed the earth in beauty's dye.

The melody of Nature's choir,
The deep-toned anthems of the sea,
The wind that tunes a viewless lyre,
The zephyr on its pinions free,
The thunder with thrilling notes,
The peal upon the mountain air,
The lay that through the foliage floats,
Or sinks in dying cadence there:
These all to thee their voices raise,
A fervent song of gushing praise.

The day-star, herald of the dawn,
As the dark shadows flit away,
The tint upon the cheek of morn,
The dew-drop gleaming on the spray—
From wild-birds in their wanderings,
From streamlets leaping to the sea,
From all earth's fair and lovely things,
Doth living praise ascend to Thee:
These with their silent tongues proclaim
The varied wonders of Thy name.

Father; thy hand hath form'd the flower,
And flung it on the verdant lea;
Thou badst it ope at summer's hour,
Its hues of beauty speak of Thee,
Thy works all praise Thee: shall not men
Alike attune the grateful hymn?
Shall he not join the lofter strain,
Echoed from heart of seraphim?
We tune to Thee our humble lays,
Thy mercy, goodness, love, we praise.

Worldly Expenditure.

The proportion in which worldly men contribute of their means to advance their ends or pleasures is in very striking contrast to the gifts of Christians for the spread of the Gospel. As an exemplification of this we take, merely as a specimen from a long list of similar contributions for a like purpose, a catalogue of articles given by the "friends" of a single military company, as prizes for target shooting: silver pitcher, silver goblet, two silver cups, set of silver spoons, silver table spoons, silver mounted musket, splendid rifle-revolver, twenty dollar gold piece, gold breast pin, gold brooch, two gold chains, three gold pencil cases, gold anchor pin, diamond ring, pair of gaitors. Besides all this a "sumptuous dinner," "superb wines," a full hand, the cost of equipments, lost time, and incidentals.

CALIFORNIA CORRESPONDENCE.

Sonora, December 17, 1

Dear Brother McTyeire:

It has been so long since I appeared in the columns of the Advocate, that I feel a little like a delinquent Methodist, who had neglected class until he feels that his attendance would be a matter of surprise, and call forth remarks from all present. Nevertheless, I feel inclined, though after long silence, to venture another letter for the N. O. Christian Advocate. And, permit me here to say, that my silence is attributable to other causes than any abatement of good wishes, and ardent desires, for the prosperity of my old favorite, sent out weekly from New Orleans, or the welfare of my friends in the sugar State.

To-day I have the privilege of remaining within doors: a privilege that I am prepared to appreciate, especially, when surrounding circumstances are considered. I am attending the third round of Quarterly Meetings for the San Francisco District, which is, however, my second round, one quarter having passed before I was put in charge. The District is very large, and is rendered very inconvenient to travel by its peculiar localities, being cut to pieces and divided asunder by bays, rivers and mountains. It embraces the principal vallies, or agricultural portions of the country, together with nearly all the Southern mines, with the privilege of indefinite extension South along the Pacific coast, even to Panama. My usual method of traveling it is on horseback, being the most certain and least expensive. But winter is now upon us with unusual severity, and our journeys are by stage, in wagons, or on foot as circumstances may dictate—on foot being the most pleasant and expeditious for short distances, because of the very bad state of the roads.

My first round, though tedious, was pleasant and prosperous: good and attentive congregations; quite a number necessions, and several conversions. The second, is likely to be more tedious than the first, with perhaps less immediate and visible good, owing to the weather. The almost incessant and very heavy rains, about the first of this month, prevented my reaching Mariposa, the most Southern of my appointments. Last Sabbath was a profitable and happy day, spent with the Columbia charge, five miles from this place. It was formerly in connection with Sonora, and served by the same pastor, but its rapidly increasing population, and growing interests, required a separate organization and pastoral services. One year ago it was an insignificant missionary place, with a few cloth tents and indifferent shanties, and a population of some two hundred. Now it has numerous hotels, and comfortable family dwellings, stores of provisions and drugs, a church and Masonic hall, a theater and weekly paper, with crowded streets, and bustling thousands; such is California. Sabbath morning at eleven o'clock, we dedicated our house of worship in Columbia. It is a neat and commodious building, in a convenient and beautifully elevated situation, erected by the Church, South, and the Masonic fraternity, and is an ornament to the place, as well as an honor to the thriving and industrious population in whose midst it stands. The congregations were large, and as is usual in the country very attentive, with a larger number of females in attendance than is often seen in the mountains. The "love-feast," in the afternoon, was one of the most melting and happy seasons I have ever witnessed. Six or seven joined our Church: one local preacher.

We have in charge, here, a man who was reared among the society of "Friends," in Pennsylvania, and was appointed at our Conference to a circuit, in the bounds of the Sacramento District, but was two months put in charge of Columbia, and is doing us active and efficient service. He styles himself the "Quaker Preacher," of the Pacific Annual Conference. He has the favor and confidence of the people he serves.

I am now with Brother Malone, of Sonora. Brother M. has been at this charge most of the time since he came to the country. Near twelve months since he erected and dedicated a commodious house of worship here, and has it paid for. In connection with it is a neat office, mostly the workmanship of Brother M's. own hands, which he occupies as a study and sleeping apartment. And although the occupant is still without a "better-half," the little office is kept neatly and in good taste. As families with children were constantly coming in, and the demands for a school increasing, Brother M., after trying in vain to get some one to engage in it, consented, at the request of his official members, to take charge of it himself until some one could be found to release him; he uses the chapel building for the purpose, and is doing well.

At Sonora, Columbia, and the surrounding country, the heaviest of the Devil's artillery has been brought to bear upon our Church and its operations. Among other agencies the "wolf in sheep's clothing" has been employed, while some honest, but misguided and fanatical men, have thought they did God service while opposing the progress of what they were pleased to style the pro slavery Church. For a time the storm raged, the strife was fierce, and enemies hoisted clamorously, but the men of God stood their ground, the mask was torn from the wolf, the storm abated, and the Church still lives, even here. Nay more, greater influence and stronger indications of life and healthy existence have never been by us presented to this community than at the present time. Thank God for His goodness to us in these Western ends of the Earth.

Thus much of the Church and our travels.

On Tuesday last, after more than a week of bright, clear weather, it clouded suddenly, and soon began snowing rapidly. Such a snow storm is rarely, if ever, witnessed by those of the South. And now these countless hills present their fleecy slopes, and rear their snow-clad summits all around us. But while this beautiful and romantic scenery is contemplated, there are sad thoughts of sickness, destitution and want, associated therewith. If the severity of the winter continues as begun, and as is anticipated, there must be suffering in the mountains of California. Many have but cloth tents, or uncomfortable shanties, and some not even these. Other families have just reached the country, after expending all their means in getting here, and will be unable to get any thing like a comfortable place for the winter. Think of a man landing here with a family of eight or ten in number, without means, and having to pay for a small house $100 per month rent, flour $80 per barrel, pickled pork $50 per barrel, and every thing else in proportion. All kinds of provisions are enormously high, the difficulty of transportation to the mines already great and increasing, and consequently a continued advance in the price of bread stuffs. Not but that the people here are liberal, and ready to aid the needy and destitute, so far as they may be able, but many hardships are to be endured that were not bargained for in the outset, many toils and privations berae that were not anticipated, many a lesson learned at a vast expense. But further remarks of this sort are, I apprehend, unnecessary.

Very soon now will your Conference convene, when I shall perhaps be handed over to the Pacific Conference, no longer to stand connected with you and be considered one of you, as heretofore. But will I have a place in the memory and affections of none of your members? I have been with the brethren of Louisiana since their first organization into a Conference, and took part in the deliberations of every session until the last. I was gratified to learn that then they remembered and prayed for me. May it ever be so when they meet. Many of them I love. God bless the brethren of the Louisiana Conference.

Thus, you see, Mr. Editor, I have dashed along from place to place, giving a hasty glance at matters and things as they occur to my mind. If I should be under the necessity of taking up winter quarters in the mountains you may hear from me again.

W. R. Gober.

"Rock of Ages."

The principles of Free Masonry are sublime. They have the stamp of Divinity. They are illustrated, and professed before the world in the many emblems referred to and appropriated; all taken from the highest of sources, the Book of the Old and New Testament, the word and work of the Supreme Architect of the Universe. The All Seeing Eye, with the name of the Great I Am, overlooking and over-ruling all his works. "His eyes behold, His eyelids try the children of men." "The eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him, upon them that hope in his mercy." The Holy Bible, open, and, placed upon it, the Square and Compass. Truly, an emblem of our most sacred duties, a lamp to our feet, a light to our path." "Search the Scriptures," said our Saviour, "they are they which testify of me." The Ark, the pattern of which the Great Master Builder exhibited to Noah and his sons, to be built by them for a refuge from the then coming deluge. Jesus Christ is the Christian's ark of refuge. Jacob's Ladder, shown him in a night vision; its top reaching to Heaven, the foot set upon the earth; angels of God descending and ascending upon it, and the Lord stood above it, speaking to the future patriarch words of comfort and encouragement, when he was entering on a perilous journey into a far country. The words spoken were a full renewal of God's gracious promise to Abraham, "In thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Thus intimating the promised Saviour. The Burning Bush, enveloped with flame, yet not consumed; God, appearing to Moses, at the Mount Horeb, to commission him, with his brother Aaron, to go and deliver their brethren from Egyptian bondage. A greater deliverance from an infinitely greater bondage, is here foreshadowed. Jesus Christ was in the bush. In the appointed time, in our nature, yet without sin, a voluntary substitute for sinners, He suffered himself to become enveloped with the flames of God's anger against a fallen race, expiated their guilt by the sacrifice of himself on the cross, and, ascending into Heaven, his humanity and divinity united, opened for all who truly believe in him, the door of infinite mercy. So, too, the tried, tempted, afflicted believer is often enveloped with flames, tribulations, which are not permitted to consume him. The Lamb Skin, or white leathern apron, an emblem of innocence, the badge of a Mason, "more ancient than the Golden Fleece, or Roman Eagle, more honorable than the Star and Garter," or any other of the insignia of royalty or royalty's favorites. Innocence, looking forward to the perfect righteousness of the one only Mediator and Redeemer. The Stone, "which the builders rejected, having become the head of the corner;" "a foundation stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation." To this the sacred scriptures often refer as to an emblem of the Lord Jesus Christ himself. So that christianity is an appropriate part of Free Masonry. Further, very briefly, the charges delivered to the officers and members, in the several degrees of the order, going up even to the solemn offices of the Holy Priesthood; setting forth principles of pure morality, christian benevolence, devotedness to God, fervent zeal in His service, and in the doing of good to our neighbor; "Holiness to the Lord; may it be engraven on all our thoughts, words and actions." See Monitor, by Z. A. Davis, Philadelphia edition, 1842.

Let it not, then, be deemed Utopian, that the entire body of Free Masons throughout our country, with their means of prompt communication with each other, should be induced to unite in bringing to effect many important reforms, much everywhere needed, especially a better observance of the christian Sabbath—to put a stop to its present open, public desecration—a desecration even by authority of Government, in regard to the Sunday mails—a stop also to the many other public violations of the Sabbath by the people generally: all sorts of business, and of vain and sinful amusement, going on as freely and openly on the Sabbath as on other days of the week. "Hallow my Sabbaths," saith the Lord, "and they shall be a sign between me and you, that ye may know that I am the Lord, your God."

If it be objected that there are two Sabbaths required to be kept holy, one announced at the creation of the world, and afterwards given in God's chosen people, on committing to them the book of the law by which He was to govern them; another, introduced, and, for all who then to come, ordained by the Great Author of our Redemption the "Lord Day," the Christian Sabbath. Be it so; let both be observed by their respective adherents, neither to be allowed to obstruct the other, "sic utere tuo, ut alienum laedas." But the Christian Sabbath is the true Sabbath, Christianity is part, and a part, of the law of our land. It is a part. All open, public violations of the positive commandments of God, moral precepts, such as tions involving infinite evil, are proper for the interpositions of the magistracy, to and suppress them. What are legislators magistrates to think of the oath they "support the Constitution"? How, under can they assume to themselves powers not expressly or impliedly—powers not given—powers which can not, from men, be ceived?

The principles of Free Masonry require exercise of the most enlarged philanthropy, Christian philanthropy. The Order therefore, concur with their fellow-citizens all good works and good endeavors. The law our nature imposes on every man the obligation to improve and perfect his moral capacities susceptibilities, and to aid his neighbor in the same, to aid all men in need of aid, within the sphere of his influence, and would be accomplished the public good, the of all mankind: and what only can teach enforce this obligation? Christianity. was that Christianity, and this alone, that one entire nations from the most deplorable dition, from ignorance of God, from Holy vice, cruelty, rapine, murders, and from wretchedness of all kinds, from utter degradation, withstanding that, in some nations graded, the arts and sciences, general literature, had been cultivated to a degree but surpassed at the present day.

Louisiana Legislature.

Baton Rouge, February 1, 185

Mr. Lacey has brought forward in the Senate the bing, having reference to the charity students the expense of the State. The bill provides for plete and most judicious course of education, which are to receive, and makes it obligatory upon them they enter the institution where they apply for admi to agree to devote a certain number of years in the public schools after graduating, and to declare they wish to be educated for teachers. This is right. Having received, at the hands of the State complete education, the least those who are thus could do would be to devote some of their time State. In return for the great benefit they have from its bounty. If this plan be adopted, it no effect upon the public schools just now; but in end it would prove greatly beneficial, for it would as far as possible, the services of competent take charge of the schools of the country—which thing much desired. In the city, where teachers fair compensation, and where there is plenty of tition, the want is not much felt; but in the where the pay is small, and where the real difficulty in being able to get a teacher, the want of properly pensions to take charge of the education of children who are entered at public schools is grievously felt. no uncommon thing to find teachers among them not even know how to spell and it not unfrequently pens that you come across one who can barely write name. It was in view of this state of things that Mr. introduced the bill referred to, and it is to be hoped will succeed in his plan, which has for its eventual the proper education of those children of the State are obliged to depend upon the public schools.

Mr. Lacey should have gone a step farther, and repealed the law regulating the expenses of the students, and endeavored to have them, what they are now provided for entirely by the State. Now, they already exempted from College dues. This is but a mere matter. The board of a student always amounts to a great deal more than the fees. To give one the privilege of listening to lectures, and attending at recitations, is to give him but little more than he could for himself. It is making him a charity scholar alone, imposing all the necessary unpleasantness of a position upon him, while, in reality, he is the recipient of but very little charity. Young men educated by State, should be entirely provided for by the State entirely if they are to give any of their time to the as Mr. Lacey proposes.

Mormonism.—Every arrival from Europe brings news of the strange spread of Mormonism. The seems certainly bent upon following out the injunction into all the world and preach the Gospel [of Smith's] every creature." The last number of the English Mormon organ is much gratified to hear of the faithful and zeal of Elder Matthew McCune and Teacher Adams in spreading the truth in Rangoon, by lectures, social conversation, and the circulation of the word.

Intemperance in Boston.—By the records kept at the Boston City Hall, it appears the one hundred and fifty persons were committed there during the week ending the 22d inst., of which number ninety-five were for drunkenness, and of the remaining fifty-six, it is probable that few were strictly temperate persons. On Monday morning in the Municipal Court, Judge Rogers presiding, forty-one intemperate persons were fined or sentenced to the House of Correction, now overflowing with prisoners, and quarters for intemperance.

The Roman Catholic Church in the United States comprises 6 archbishops, 26 bishops, 1471 priests, and 1345 churches, distributed among 34 dioceses and two apostolical vicariates. As to the fact of population, the Catholic Almanac says: "The figures were obtained from official, and, consequently, the most reliable sources. If we suppose the Catholic population of the diocese of St Louis to be 100,000, Boston 230,000, Galveston 30,000 and St Paul 2500, the total number of Catholics in the United States will be shown to be 2,926,300." The ecclesiastical institutions comprise 33 ecclesiastical seminaries, 6 literary institutions for young men, and 102 female academies. The entire number of clerical students is 1,1 The Catholic religious institutions number 45 for men and 96 for females. The charitable institutions amount to 108.

As Good as it is Week is Easy.—The Native Islander says the following story was lately told by a confirmed inebriate, as an apology for much of the folly drunkards: "A mouse, ranging about a brewery, happening to fall into a vat of beer, was in imminent danger of drowning, and appealed to a cat to help him out. The cat replied: 'It is a foolish request, for as soon as I get you out I shall eat you.' The mouse piteously replied that would be far better than to be drowned in beer. The cat filled him out, but the fume of the beer caused her success, and the mouse took refuge in a hole. The cat called upon the mouse to come out. 'Did you not promise that I should eat you?' 'Ah' replied the mouse, 'I did, but I was in liquor at the time.'"

Death of Mrs Jackson in 1828.—The sad bereavement in the family of the President elect, reported the other day, brings to recollection a similar painful incident which occurred, with almost equal suddenness, amidst the excitement which surrounded General Jackson as President elect in the winter of 1828.

Mrs Jackson was taken suddenly ill about the 22d of December, on the eve of her preparations for removing to Washington, and in a few days was numbered among the dead.

It was unquestionably the greatest and most heartstruck of the old General's life, eventful as it was with stirring private and public incident. His heart, for all that gave zest to social and domestic intercourse, was buried with the remains of one who had been for nearly thirty years the pride and joy of the Hermitage. To her tomb he directed, to be prepared for his own repose, when his earthly career in the dispensation of Providence should be ended, and the injunction was strictly carried out sixteen years afterwards. The Second Mantle Wanted in Paris.—Carl Benson, in his last Paris letter to the Spirit of the Times, notices the following and vouches for its correctness: "Some of the Mr Custers of New York was in Italy not long ago. He obtained admission into Naples with great difficulty, though his passport was perfectly according to rule, and during his stay was dogged by spies wherever he went. In one way this suspicion proved of service to him, for on submission to any place he wished to see was readily granted as if the authorities thought they might get rid of him sooner by that means. Some time afterwards he discovered the reason of this treatment. One of the Neapolitan officials had read (for it seems Neapolitan officials do read sometimes) that one Koster had helped to bring the printing a great many years ago, whereupon he sent off at the conclusion that our countryman must be one of his descendants, and consequently a dangerous and revolutionary character. Such occurrences make our sensations pleasant 'the benighted Government of Naples' sounds like no exaggeration, but a melancholy truth."

Animal Sagacity.—The custom of naming ships after squalls, such as "Black Squall," "White Squall," "Levanter Squall," etc., is to be further carried out by an old builder for ship builder down east, by naming a new clipper the "Nursery Squall." Instead of "hoping the ensuing one" he ought to have his ears boxed by all the pretty girls in his neighborhood. [Boston Times.

MARRIED—In Thibodeaux, Louisiana, on the 24th of November, 1852, by the Rev. Lewis A. Reed, J. W. Fenderson, of Virginia, to Mrs. HARRIET P. JARVIS, of Tennessee.

By the same, on the 20th of January, 1853, in the Parish Terrebonne, JOHN HOWLAND, of Ky., to MRS. MERANTE RODDY of the said Parish.

OBITUARY:

DIED—January 3, 1853, of scarlet fever after an illness of eight days, ROSINA P daughter of REV. LEWIS A and ELEANOR M REED, aged six years, nine months, and three days.

From the incipiency of the disease her thoughts were fixed more upon the subject of death, and the future, than upon her recovery and restoration to health.

She often spoke of dying without any emotions of terror, but rather of happiness, and on one occasion, sitting up in her bed, raised her little hands and bade all farewell. "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: blessed be the name of the Lord." But is the seperation eternal! No,

Blooming to fade no more

DIED—In the Parish of Carroll, La., 27th of December, 1852, in his 23d year, JOHN AUSTIN, the only son of William S. and Elizabeth Austin.

It was but as yesterday we saw our young friend in the prime of manhood, the idol of a young and affectionate wife—the hope, pride, and comfort of his parents. His manly features, whose noble outlines still image themselves upon the survivor's hearts, were then beautifully expressive of youth, virtue and intelligence: but suddenly he was hurried away to join that long and countless procession that moves silently, but continually, along the "dark valley," but not comfortless, or hopeless, did he pass through its gloom.

The deceased had been for some time previous to his death an exemplary member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. During his last illness his mind was much occupied with the subject of religion, and on the brink of dissolution, after a season of interrupted prayer and praise, his last words were breathed with his last breath in the hopeful exclamation: "Saviour, take me!"

The life of the Christian is beautiful, but his death is the climax of moral sublimity. Then, dear father and mother, wife and friends, let us look forward with cheerful hope—we who have met together often in this "vale" in prayer and thanksgiving, if we are faithful we will soon meet above, where those we love and cherish will not vanish, like shadows, from our vain embrace.

DIED—At Cooper's Well, Miss., on the 18th of October, 1852, in her seventeenth year, MARGARET ELIZABETH, daughter of Martha S. B. and the late Rev. John W. Childs, late of the Virginia Conference.

The subject of this obituary was one of the most interesting young ladies of my acquaintance. It was a sad sight to behold one so young and beautiful called away, just when life had opened to her enraptured view so many avenues of pleasure. Possessed of a joyous spirit, and a heart alive to every tender emotion; she reveled in the smiles of her friends, and dispensed the sunshine of joy and happiness wherever she moved. Early converted to God, she had brought her thoughts, words and actions, in subjection to his will. Yet, when the messenger of death came, it was to her so unexpected that for a moment, and a moment only, the thought of quitting this beautiful world, as she expressed—it, and dying so young, filled her mind with sadness. Her pious mother, seeing that the deep fountain of her soul was stirred with grief, that the time of her departure was so near at hand, whispered in her ear encouraging promises of a Savior's love to strengthen her in that trying hour.

I knelt by the bed of that dying child, for whom a thousand prayers had been offered, and watched that wasted form—for consumption had done its work—and her dark bright eyes beamed toward heaven as the struggle went on in her mind, when suddenly the shadow of the earth rolled back from her soul, and the glory of the Spirit land opened to her delighted view, and the first words that escaped her lips were—"Oh! mother, I am ready now; Jesus is come!" From that moment, until the one that closed her life, there was a continued scene of rejoicing; it was a feast of good things: the spirit of the living God pervaded her apartment: and all who entered her room felt its influence, as we listened to the sweet counsel and pointed admonitions of the dying Margaret. Feeling now that she could comprehend with all saints the length and breadth, height and depth, of the love of Christ, who had washed her in his own blood, she earnestly desired again to partake of the emblems of the broken body and shed blood, in remembrance of his passion. Having received this solemn sacrament, she folded her hands quietly upon her bosom, and in a few minutes breathed her last:

"Weep not for her, in her spring-time she flew.
To a land where the wings of the soul are unfurled.
And now like a star, beyond evening's cold dew,
Looks radiantly down on the tears of this world."

EAST INDIA AND PACIFIC TRADE OF THE UNITED STATES.—The Boston Traveler publishes a list of arrivals at and departures from ports in the United States of vessels engaged in the East India trade, during the year 1852. It shows an increase in the trade over any previous year. Out of fifty arrivals from Oriental, twenty-one sailed originally from California.

The whole number of arrivals in the United States was 101—of which, 84 were at Boston, 81 at New York 13 at Newbedford, 8 at Salem, and 5 at other ports.

The clearances numbered 140—of which, 73 were from Boston, 56 from New York, 8 from Salem, and 4 from Baltimore.

The whole number of arrivals from ports on the Pacific, including those from California, was 131—of which, 54 were at Baltimore, 29 at New York, 21 at Boston, 5 at Norfolk, 5 at New Orleans, 3 at Philadelphia, 4 at Alexandria, and 7 at other ports.

The clearances for ports on the Pacific, including those for California, numbered 206—of which, 109 were from New York, 105 from Boston, 11 from Philadelphia, 3 from Baltimore, 3 from Richmond, 3 from Salem and 4 from other ports.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF WISCONSIN.—Governor Farwell, of Wisconsin in his annual message, represents the finances of the State to be in a flourishing condition and, but for all the taxes ever been paid, there would be a surplus in the treasury. About two-thirds of the entire State, or about 20,000,000 acres, are still for sale at government prices. This immense tract, now awaiting the ingenuity of the industrious settler, is generally of excellent soil, and many portions of it are richly charged with silver, copper, lead, iron and other valuable minerals. Gov. F recommends that they should be granted in limited quantities to actual settlers, and urges that measures be taken to develop the rich mineral and agricultural resources of the State. He also urges the construction of railroads wherever practicable, and estimates the timber traded of the State at 5,000,000 feet.

MORE CALIFORNIA STEAMERS.—The Sierra Nevada, a fine steamship, has been added to the Nicaragua line in the Pacific. The company are in negotiation for two more first-class ships, and will soon establish a tri-monthly line between New York and San Francisco, taking the Daniel Webster from the New Orleans line and putting her on the line between N. York and San Juan. The increase in travel between California and the Atlantic coast renders these enlarged facilities necessary. It is stated that the company have realized a profit of about $50,000 on each trip of the steamships since they took possession. The Nicaragua Company is about to make up a mail by each of their steamers—we presume at the same rate of postage as Government receives by the other route. Mr. Vanderbilt will, it is understood, soon resume the Presidency of the company.

A Florence correspondent of the Boston Traveler says: "In seeing lately the immense blossoms cast at the feet of Miss Maywood, at the Perjula, such as large as flour barrels, I thought I had seen the climax of flower humbug. But at Leghorn they did them up of the size of wine casks, so large and heavy, that the Prima Donna, unable to lift them, drew them out of the stage by the ribbons with which they were tied up, bowing and smirking as she tugged away at the floral mountains, while the audience vociferously cheered her efforts.

THE PROJECTED DARIEN SHIP CANAL.—The London correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser in his letter of the 11th ult., says:

A scheme has been broached during the past week for cutting a ship canal, at a cost of $75,000,000, across the Isthmus of Darien, for which some parties in England have obtained a concession. It has been known to be concocted for a long time, chiefly with the view of promoting a speculation in New Granada bonds, which are held in this country to a nominal extent of $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, and which, until this movement was set on foot, were worth about eight or nine per cent. They have since touched about 14, but are now flat at about 12½, the prospects of the affair not appearing to have made much impression on the public. The promoters lay great stress on the concession of a tract of land for colonization purposes, and one of the principal of them, a Dr. Cullen, has put forth statements to disparage the Nicaragua line, which show singular ignorance on his part regarding that route. Of the proposed Darien route, there are about nine miles that have never been surveyed.

THE JAPAN EXPEDITION.—The Boston Post publishes the following extract from a letter, received from a gentleman who has just returned to this country from a trip to China, relative to the feelings of the Japanese towards the expedition expected from the United States:

"I was informed by a gentleman, a native of Japan, that the Emperor is ready for the American expedition. He exhibited a letter to me, which he had just received from one of his countrymen, then on the Island of Jeddo. The people kept a strict look-out all over the coast; and their fires were already burning on the mountains at night, in order to be prepared in case the squadron should appear at night. One million of soldiers are ready and at hand. The coast is all set with guns, while in the bay of Jeddo, where the fleet is expected, there are countless war junks, and the whole bay is surrounded with innumerable forts. The expedition will find the Japanese much better soldiers than they anticipate. The presents had better be left at home. A trade will not soon be opened with that country, except by force."

THE LAST DATES.—Nearly every vessel that arrives brings us accounts of disasters by the gale gales. The ship Havenswald, from New Orleans to this port, has been fifteen days north of Cape Hatteras. The bark St. Lawrence, from the west coast of Africa, was two weeks beating about Hatteras, and encountering gales from the Northwest. She was blown into the Gulf-stream. The brig Sutton, from Cuba, was in heavy Northeast gales during the entire passage, and the vessel strained so as to make her leak badly. The brig American, from Savannah, boarded the 12th inst. Marshall, on the 10th inst., and took from her and brought to this port, Capt. Roberts, Mr. Cook, (1st mate,) and three seamen of the brig Marshland, of Wadsboro, from Georgetown, S. C., for New York, which was capsized on the 4th inst., in lat. 35 45, long 71 30. The report is that Capt. Roberts and the crew had been on the wreck six days, when taken off by the brig Marshall. After the masts had been cut away the brig righted, carrying away the house, and washing stores and every thing overboard. The Captain's wife was in the cabin at the time the brig capsized, and was got out when the house broke adrift, but she died in four hours after words. The American was sixteen days north of Hatteras in the gale, and sustained considerable damage. [N. Y. Eve. Post, 25th ult.

HUMAN WOOLEN MANUFACTURES.—Duty on Oil.—Important Intelligence has been received in London from Naples which will, it is said, materially affect the interests connected with the woolen manufactures of Great Britain. The King, it appears, by a decree dated the 27th of December, has raised the export duty on olive oil in the kingdom of the Two Sicilies to about £7s 12s. per ton (and to about £13 per ton by foreign flag of those countries that have not treaties of reciprocity), being an increase of £5 12s per ton on the old rate. At the same time the import duty on this article is reduced one-half, namely, from £25 to £18 10s. per ton. The civic duty, or octroi, on oil, for the consumption of the city of Naples is reduced one ducat per centar, or about £2 2s. per ton—that is, from £20 ducats to £2 20 per centar. Some further clauses of the decree prohibit the export from the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, of beans, Indian corn, potatoes, French beans, vetches, lentils and chick peas, and olive tallow and hog's lard. The whole of these regulations were to come into force from the date of the decree, and the motives assigned for them are the scarcity of the crop of all kinds of pulse as well as oil, and the consequent pressure of high prices upon the home consumers of these products and their substitutes.

A correspondent of the London Observer states as a positive fact, that within the last few months Mr Heald the gentleman who acquired such notoriety by his marriage with Lola Montez and whose death by the boundering of his yacht off Fort St. Julian, at the mouth of the Tagus, has been reported in the daily papers, executed a will in which he has bequeathed to Lola Montez a life interest in £30,000 vested in the funds. Also his portfolio of water drawings and engravings, and the portrait of himself. He also bequeathed to the Consumption Hospital at Brompton the magnificent sum of £5,000, and after some trifling legacies to his servants, etc., he willed the remaining portion of his handsome fortune to his aunt the lady who manifested so natural a desire to separate the nephew after the discovery of his extraordinary and imprudent marriage.

THE PATRIOT AND THE ARTIST.—Washington Irving, while at Mount Vernon the other day, remarked that he remembered seeing then Washington in New York, when he was a child five years of age, and while the General was passing through the street, accompanied by a crowd young Irving was attended by his nurse, an honest Scotchwoman. The woman forced her way up to the General, leading her child by the hand, and approaching, addressed him: "Your honor, here is a bairn that is called after you." The General paused, and, placing his hand upon the boy's head, gave him the blessing. Mr. Irving states that he has a distinct recollection of the whole scene, which occurred in the year 178[illegible].

RAILROAD SPEED.—The Express train from Boston to New York, carrying the U. S. mails and the English mails brought by the Europa, made the trip in five hours and five minutes, actual running time. The distance is 236 miles, thus showing an average running speed of nearly forty-seven miles each hour, or forty-one miles an hour, including stops. This is probably the quickest railroad speed (for any considerable distance) ever made in this country.

GEN. WASHINGTON.—The statue of Washington, just completed by Mr. Crawford, and destined for the Washington Monument has already attained a height of some 120 feet of its destined 500 feet, containing about 40 millions of cubic feet of solid masonry, and, by means derived from continued individual contributions, the work is going on at a fast as would perhaps be prudent in such a structure.

SUNDAY MAIL TRAIN.—The petition to the Postmaster General, to dispatch the mails from New York every Sunday evening, so that they may be received in Boston Monday morning instead of Monday evening, now contains nearly two hundred signatures embracing some of the heaviest firms and business men in the city of Boston.

BOSTON DRY TRADE.—The Journal, of the 25th ult., says: The prospect of the dealers in this vicinity for a good crop of ice begins to brighten. We have had several days of freezing weather, which has covered the ponds, though the ice we believe, is as yet thin. It will require a continuance of steady cold weather for three or four weeks to enable the ice dealers to make up for lost time; and the prospect is that ice will not be suddenly dear summer as last.

RAILROAD BROKERAGE.—A Good Idea.—By an arrangement just completed, passengers before leaving Buffalo for New York, while purchasing their tickets at the office there, are handed a bill of fare, from which they select such articles as they desire. The orders are immediately forwarded by a telegraphic communication to the refreshment room at Warsaw, and numbered tickets are handed to the different passengers. Upon arriving at Warsaw, each finds upon the table whose number corresponds with the card, the breakfast he ordered in Buffalo, and the train waits twenty minutes for him to eat it.

ARRIVAL OF A VESSEL FROM THE HOLY LAND.—The bark Maria Ita, Captain Capurro, arrived in New York, a few days ago, from Malta. She belongs to Jerusalem, and is owned by one of the inhabitants of the Holy City. This is the only vessel that has ever entered New York harbor belonging to Jerusalem.

DISPUTES BETWEEN STATES.—A dispute has arisen between the States of South Carolina and Georgia, in regard to their respective boundaries. Georgia claims the exclusive jurisdiction of the Savannah River, which South Carolina denies.

The dispatch of a special messenger to Nicaragua with instructions to the Minister there, so near the expiration of the present Executive term, is an indication that some important negotiations are on foot affecting the relations between Central America and the United States.

The National Intelligencer states that the Washington Monument has already attained a height of some 120 feet of its destined 500 feet, containing about 40 millions of cubic feet of solid masonry, and, by means derived from continued individual contributions, the work is going on as fast as would perhaps be prudent in such a structure.

CHARLESTON AND NASHVILLE.—The Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad is now completed, and cars running on it within three miles of the Tennessee river. Passengers are landed in Charleston in less than three days from Nashville—the whole distance with the exception of the three miles above alluded to by railroad and steamboat.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.—The large number of vessels required for the Transcontinental Air train trade has given a great impetus to ship building. We see it stated that Mr Taylor, a merchant of Boston, has just sold his new ship now on the stocks at Chelsea, for $20 000 advance on her cost to a New York house.

Mr Wise, the American Aeronaut, has been applied to by the Navy Department in regard to the expedition going out by Mr Grinnell, of New York, in search of Sir John Franklin, and Mr. W proposes to accompany the expedition, should his professional services be required.

The funeral ceremonies of Madame Kossuth, mother of the orator, was conducted by a German Lutheran clergyman.

CATTLE TRADE.—A train of thirty-nine cars of live stock—cattle and sheep—passed through Binghamton, New York, on Friday night. The 2[illegible] train for New York, and was followed by an extra train of thirty cars—ten filled with live cattle, and twenty with merchandise.

Bishop Wm H Vaq Velsck died at his residence at Reddleburn, Pennsylvania, on the night of the 15th ult.

STARCH.—The largest starch factory in the world is situated at Oswego, in New York State. It is an immense iron structure, covering one and a-half acres of ground. It gives employment to 150 men, and consumes annually from 175,000 to 200,000 bushels of corn, and makes 10,000 pounds of starch daily.

Meeting of the American Colonization Society—Interesting Annual Report.

WASHINGTON, JAN. 18, 1853.

The American Colonization Society is now holding its thirty-sixth annual meeting in the House of Representatives (Hall of the Last Century). An ingenious and beautiful arrangement of evergreens and flowers has been made in the area of the circle. Over the chair of the President, Vice Presidents and secretaries, is the motto, "Let Ethiopia stretch out her hands unto God."

The meeting was opened with prayer by the Rev. R. R. Gurley, after which the following report was read by the Rev. W. McLain, Secretary:

Since our last anniversary the Hon. Henry Clay, president and the Hon. Daniel Webster, one of the first vice presidents of this Society, have departed this life. It is not for us to add any thing to the tribute of respect which the country and the world have paid to their memory. Matthew St. Clair Clarke, for sixty years a member of the executive committee of the Society, also has carefully laboured. The 6th of May greatly beloved and deeply lamented by us, and by a wide circle of friends.

A general review of our operations the past year is presented to produce the conviction that the Society is growing in usefulness with every passing year. Six vessels with emigrants have been sent to Liberia viz: Two from New Orleans, with 182 — two from Norfolk, with 207; one from New York, with 37, and one from Wilmington, N. C., with 118. In vessels from the United States, sent by the Maryland Colonization Society, we send 1 on emigrants, making in all 550, of whom but were born free. 25 were emancipated, and 38 purchased themselves, or were purchased by their friends. The whole number sent by this Society to Liberia in its organization to the present time, is 7,455, and the whole amount of money expended upon it by this society is $1,063,567 11, which no one will venture to call an extravagant price to pay for what has been actually accomplished.

A new thousand people have been taken from their deep depression here, wafted across the ocean, planted on the margin of an immense continent, organized into a well-ordered and free Republic, whose independence has been acknowledged by several of the leading nations of the earth. They have farms and houses—schools and churches—the arts of civilized life and the institutions of religion with full exchange.

This established, Liberia's cause has been onward. Advancement has been made the past year in all that is valuable in civilization, social life, and all that tends to benefit the nation. In proof of this is adduced the testimony of President Roberts—and of other citizens of Liberia; of Captain Foote, U. S. Navy, lately returned from the coast; of Rev. Eli Ball, who was sent to explore by the Board of the Southern Baptist Convention.

It is noted with fees of the increasing friendship of both England and France have been shown during the year, in the most satisfactory manner.

While Liberia is thus rising in importance, and receiving the favorable consideration of Governments abroad, it is gratifying to find that she is gaining friends in the land that gave her birth.

The great importance of colonization is forcing itself upon the State Legislatures. With peculiar pleasure we record the fact that New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Indiana among the free States, have made appropriations to aid in colonizing their coloured people; that Maryland has renewed her appropriation of $10,000 a year for six years, that Virginia is entertained that the Legislature of Virginia, at the present session, will remove the restrictions upon the large appropriations so as to make it available for the expense of all who emigrate from that State; that the Legislature of Louisiana has adopted a joint resolution instructing their senators in Congress, and requesting the Representatives to urge the General Government to make an appropriation of money to aid the Society; that the Legislature of Ohio have before them a similar resolution in favor of Liberia, and that the acknowledgement of the independence of Liberia by the Legislature of Connecticut has adopted by a strong report, and resolutions in favor of colonization; that the Legislature of New York are strongly urged to make liberal appropriations; that a State colonization society has been formed by leading men in Alabama; that in Georgia the wish is constantly expressed that her legislature would make appropriation; that in Tennessee very numerous petitioners have been praying the same thing of their Legislature; and that we have evidence to show that throughout the whole country. Stanley's bill is one of the most popular measures which has ever been before Congress; and its passage would be hailed every where and by all classes, as the discharge of high and sacred duty, alike essential to our national welfare—the extension of our commerce and the civilization of Africa.

It is our privilege to know (as will appear to every body here to-night,) referring to the Hon. Secretary of State as one of the orators of the occasion, that the Executive Department of our Government has the very highest sense of the value of our enterprise, and desires to extend to Liberia their countenance. As evidence of this, we may here quote with propriety a sentence from the last annual message of the President to Congress, when he says, "Incipient measures have been taken towards the reconnoisance of the continent of Africa east and west of Liberia."

We have long desired that this very work should be undertaken. It is a matter of great importance in the progress and enlargement of Liberia. All the interests of commerce and civilization are intimately associated with it. For centuries the interior of Africa has been an unknown region shut out and secluded from the rest of the world. Commerce, which has gone every where with a bold, adventurous spirit, has followed and fallen back here. Enterprising explorers who have dared so much and penetrated so far every where else, have gone but "as luch" inside the very shell of Africa".

The interior has never been penetrated in any manner calculated to throw open its treasures or reveal its wonders to the gaze of the world. Hence it is that we look with admiration upon this movement of our Government. Colonization has planted a footstep on the western coast, and opened a gateway through which the vast recesses of the interior may be reached and revealed. And our Government is the very agency to do this work, and Com. Lynch, to whom the details have been entrusted, and who is now doubtless in Liberia, is the very man to carry it forward. And our warmest thanks are due to the present accomplished Secretary of the Navy, through whose immediate agency these preliminary arrangements have been made.

The various auxiliary societies have been much prospered the present year.

The agents employed in collecting funds have been very active. They have done honor to themselves and greatly promoted the cause.

Some special measures have been taken to enlighten the coloured people. We highly commend the action of a large number of citizens of Mason county, Ky., who organized themselves into a committee to lay before the coloured people their true interest. If such measures were adopted and faithfully carried out, every where, it would produce the most happy results. Surrounded as they are, in many places, by counsellors hostile to Liberia, and agitated by the rough and stormy waves of adversity, they see not the star of hope that gleams out on the shores of Africa; they appreciate not the destiny of honor—the career of broad and lasting usefulness which is there in that far off land, opened to free them.

There is then is a work, too long neglected, in which all the friends of humanity may bear a hand. We must go to them in the true spirit of benevolence, and not give over until they become themselves and be men! The seed we thus sow may lay long in the earth, but it shall ultimately spring up and yield a plentiful harvest.

The first address was delivered by Hon Edward II. Everett, and the second by Rev. C. II. Read, of Virginia.

Mr Everett's oration elicited frequent and continued applause. Mr. Reed's was quite eloquent, and was well received.

Hon Mr Mercer followed in an address detailing the history of the society, which was very interesting.

Among those present were the President of the United States members of the cabinet and others, comprising a most intellectual audience.

The meeting was dismissed with prayer.

ARRIVAL OF THE BLACK WARRIER.

CONFLAGRATION AT CARDENAS.

MOBILE, February 2.

The steamer Black Warrior has arrived here from Havana after a passage of five days. She brings information of a great conflagration at Cardenas, by which several of the principal buildings of the place and a large amount of other property were destroyed. The fire broke out on the night of January 4, and spread rapidly to neighboring warehouses, and extending to the theatre and custom-house, both of which buildings were destroyed. The large warehouses of Passmore & Co. Patterell & Co. Tetley & Cuniva, J. J. Chrieux, Sandford & Co. J. M. Rodhan Quiroga & Arabil P. Perera were all destroyed with several other buildings containing large quantities of sugar, molasses and other goods. The losses, without counting the produce destroyed, are estimated at half a million of dollars.

The small pox had not yet appeared at Havana, and no new cases had been reported for two weeks.

THE LADIES OF THE CREATION;

OR, HOW I WAS CURED OF BEING A STRONG-MINDED WOMAN.

I am a young wife, and not an old woman. In fact, I can still venture to give my real age to the inquisitive gentlemen who come round with the census papers, and I have not been driven to seal up the fly-leaf of the family Bible, which records "Amelia Jane, born 1st May, 1830."

My husband, as all my friends assure me, is all a man ought to be. I think he might be a trifle less obstinate, and I confess he has a bad habit of bringing his old bachelor friends home to dinner without warning. When I remonstrate, he is very eloquent about the unimportance of what there may be for dinner, the chief thing being a hearty welcome, etc., etc., though I must say I've never found him exactly indifferent to what is served up.

Still I don't complain—qui la the reverse. I'm very happy now—I say now, because I was not always so. I propose to disclose, for the benefit of young women about to marry, the secret of our discomfort, and our present happiness. The fact is, I was brought up a strong-minded woman. I was educated on the Pestalozzian system—taught to ask questions about every thing and to insist upon answers. After I had pumped my governess dry in this way, nonplussed papa, and graveled every body in the house, no wonder I was found a nuisance. They tried to find food for my inquiring disposition, by employing my restless curiosity on all sorts of "courses," till my intellectual digestion became seriously impaired. Before eighteen I had taken to green spectacles, and Professor Faraday's Friday night lectures. One thing, however, I do owe to the royal Institutions—I met my husband there. He was charmingly ignorant. I explained things to him, and his first avowal took place after I had nearly blown him up by attempting to decompose oxygen, in which I only succeeded in discomposing myself. He attended three courses at the institution, and declared he had a turn for science, which I found out afterwards was only a penchant for me. During three seasons we sat on the same bench, inhaled the same gases, started at the same explosions. He put a great many questions to the lecturer, and one question to me, which I answered in the affirmative. After our marriage I found that his taste for science declined rapidly. He asked me no more questions about the chemical affinities, and seemed perfectly insensible to the curious discoveries daily taking place in the entozoic and palæontological field of investigation. The only questions he seemed inclined to entertain were questions of house expenses; and when one Friday I proposed that we should attend Professor Faraday's lecture on a candle, he declared he didn't care a snuff about such things, and that he wished, as I was married, I would not bother my head with such stuff! This was very painful so me, and we had our first dispute about this point. I quoted, Mrs. Somerville's example to prove that a woman may be deep in science, and make no worse wife for it. I told him about the Russian princess with whom Euler corresponded, and the professoress who used to lecture at Bologna, though she was so pretty she had to address her class from behind a curtain.

Nothing would convince him. He scoffed at the scientific pretensions of the sex, and when I carried the question still further, and enlarged on the odious tyranny by which men strove to cabin, crib, and confine our minds and bodies, he flew into a passion and went straight off to his club, where he dined and came in very late, smelling very strongly of cigars. I cried a good deal that night, but I am sorry to say that I soon after returned to the subject. And the more sure our argument was to end in his leaving me quite in a passion for that abominable harbor of refuge, the club, the more sure, somehow or other, was the conversation to come back to the same point. In fact, I became quite wretched, and I don't think he was a bit happier than I was.

Had I not been luckily cured of my notions about the equality of the sexes I am sure we should have separated—a miserable couple. And how do you think I was cured? I had been reading the report of that remarkable meeting at Syracuse, U. S., in which the rights and wrongs of women were so forcibly set forth by Miss Lucretia Mott and her friends. I had half a perfectly awful argument with Edward upon the report of the meeting in the Times, and he had gone to the club, as usual, denouncing strong-minded women, with no obvious allusion to me, and declaring that this continual discussion was enough to wear a man's life out.

I retired to bed with a deep sense of the wrongs of our sex, and of Edward's brutality, and thinking what a world this would be if women had their proper place in it on an equality with men. I tried to read myself to sleep with Tennyson's Princess, and thought Ida's arguments much more conclusive than the poet's conclusions. At last I fell asleep, and dreamed—such a dream, that it seemed as if I lived a whole life through it all!

And now for my dream.

I was living in a world where the relations of the sexes were turned topsy-turvy. The women filled the men's places, and the lords of the creation were its ladies. How we reveled in the change at first—particularly after dinner! It was so pleasant to be left round the dining-room table, to pass the decanters and discuss the vintages and trifle with the dessert, while one thought of the gentlemen yawning over the albums and annuals, and getting up dreary little bits of flat scandal over cups of lukewarm tea, and boring each other, and being bored, all alone in the drawing-room. I rather think we talked a good deal of nonsense about the wine, and old Mrs. Peabody (whose front had unaccountably disappeared, leaving a venerable bald head with a little fringe of gray hair round about it, which somehow she didn't care in the least about seeing,) entirely failed in her attempt to prevent me from nibbling at the liqueurs and bonbons, which she said spoiled our palates for the claret. I'm afraid, too, that some of us took more wine than we were used to, and I know I saw a great many more candles than there were on the table, and Edward complained bitterly of the way I chattered with young Sureingle, after we came up stairs in the drawing-room, which was not until we had been sent for three times. But to see how stupid the men looked! and how very glad they seemed when we came in, and how it afterwards appeared they had been comparing notes concerning their wives and their housekeeping expenses, until they had all but quarreled. I did not feel at all well for the rest of the evening, and felt asleep on a sofa, till it was time to take Edward home.

Next day I had such a headache! I vowed I'd never "pass the decanters" again as long as I lived, but go up stairs with the gentlemen. Edward wanted very much to go out shopping, but I was much too ill to escort him. So I sent Mary, our foot-maid, to take care of him and two of his friends who called. Mary tells me they were a good deal stared at in regent street, but that she thought her big stick and cocked hat frightened them.

I felt after this it was not safe for Edward to walk about without me, and, as he wanted me to go into the city, I threw off my headache and went with him; but, feeling tired, we mounted an omnibus. The cad was a smart girl, but her language was dreadfully "slang," and I was shocked at the style in which she "gave it" (as she said) to a poor old gentleman, who was put down somewhere he didn't want to go. The driver (whom she addressed as Sarah) encouraged her, and, altogether, I thought I had never seen two such odious creatures, and was painfully convinced that women had no place before or behind omnibuses.

We dined at Verrey's, and stayed until it was dusk. I decided to walk home, notwithstanding Edward's remarks about the impropriety of being "in the street at that time of night." I pointed out to him that he could always call on the police, but—alas!—I had forgotten that Mrs. Commissioner Mayne was in power, instead of her husband. Just as we passed a horrid gin-shop, out poured a rabble of drunken people, who insulted me dreadfully; and when I called the police, of course, the poor thugs were dreadfully alarmed by the behavior of these drunken wretches, one of whom actually put his arm round the sergeant's waist. If I hadn't been for the old private watchmen at the banking house close by, (who frightened the drunken men,) the consequences might have been awful—perhaps the watchmen might have been killed!

What then that, after all, street-keeping is a coarse and brutal employment, fit only for the other sex.

The next morning Emily Brown (not Jane, who was called to the bar last year) came in with her cousin, to whom she told me she had proposed only the day before, while they were out a fishing. Emily had gone into the navy, under Mrs. Admiral Napier, and seemed to me to have grown a sad, wild sort of a girl. She used nautical phrases, "shivered her timbers" frequently, and declared she wanted to "splice the main-brace," which I discovered was the sailor way of asking for a glass of spirits! Then she was full of stories about life on board ship—what larks they used to have in the cockpit—how she had been sent to the mast-head for being saucy to the captain's son, and how cold it was—and what they used to suffer in rough weather, and how they had to live for months together on salt beef and biscuit; and altogether I felt that it was a monstrous thing to condemn poor women to such hardships, which after all, men are better suited for.

After Emily and her cousin had left, Edward insisted on my taking him to hear the band play at St. James's. Really, I had never thought Edward so frivolous! However, it was not worth while to contradict him, so I took him. When we got to St James's, I saw at once what it was that made him so anxious to hear the band. Imagine my feelings when I found that it was composed of the nicest young ladies, in such very becoming uniforms, with a stout old drum-major*ess*. Instead of fifes and drums, the instruments used were guitars and pianos, and they played Jullien's polkas, and marched away to the tune of "The girls we've left behind us." Altogether, it struck me as being a style of music better suited to dance to than to march in battle upon, and I could not but admit to myself that the old fife and drum was more spirit-stirring of the two.

Edward wanted a new hat, so I went with him to buy one; but he was such a time about it, trying on upwards of a dozen hats, that I thought I never should have got him away. I never imagined before that shopping could be such a nuisance, and then I saw at once that it is a merciful arrangement which sends to us shop, and our husbands to wait for us.

I left Edward at Gunter's and walked home. When I reached our own door, I was stopped by two over-dressed, tawdry, fat women, of the Jewish persuasion, who, tapping me on the shoulder, produced a piece of paper, which they called a writ, and informed me that I was their prisoner, on a judgment for one of Edward's horrid cigar bills. I pointed out to them that the debt was incurred by him, and beggod them to take him; but they told me that the law now made the wife answerable for the husband's debts, than which nothing can be more unjust. I felt at once that this was not a change for the better, and that, after all, it was quite right that if some body must pay or go to prison, it should be the husband and not the wife.

I was so annoyed by this latter circumstance, that I went to call upon Mrs. Boroughby, (a recently elected member of Parliament,) an old schoolfellow of mama's, who had always proved my constant friend. Such a scene of confusion as I then witnessed I shall never forget! The stairs were littered all over with brooms and dust-pans; and the drawing-room, into which I had made my way as I could, was in as great confusion as a broker's shop. On an elegant ottoman were a dust-pan and a bundle of wood; the sofas were strewn with blue books, a pair of slippers, an opera cloak, and the housemaid's box of black lead and brushes.

An old gray parrot had got out of his cage and was busily employed in picking holes in a beautiful table-cover, whilst "Buttons," the page, was seated at the piano, endeavoring to pick out the notes of an Ethiopian melody, called (I believe,) "Sich a Gettin up Stairs."

When I succeeded in making the young gentleman aware of my presence, he coolly told me that "Missus was busy, and wouldn't be disturbed by nobody; and that Master had gone out in a huff, 'cos he'd been rowed for wanting to go to the play, as Missus was gettin' up her parliament speech for that evenin'!"

This explained to me the state of the "Home Department," and convinced me that the house in which woman should have a voice was not the House of Commons.

And so my dream went on. Every where I found that when women attempted men's work, they proved their own unfitness for it—discovered that our notions of the happiness, and freedom, and dignity of the other sex are founded on a mistake, and that it only depends on us to make them our slaves and adorers. It is true, we are not in the House of Commons; but what, after all, is public opinion? The opinion of men, if we do justice to ourselves, is the opinion of men's wives. Is there any field for political manœuvre or legislation like Home? What is a Chancellor of the Exchequer to a wife?—what the Budget to the weekly house-bills?—what the difficulty of wringing the supplies out of the House of Commons to that of extracting a cheque from a hard-up hubby? Depend upon it, there is employment for any amount of jockeyship and management without putting one's hand beyond the street door. And so I was cured of my notion of putting woman on an equality with man.

I saw that the question between the sexes was not one of superiority or inferiority; that our two spheres lay apart from each other, but that each exercised on the other a most blessed influence—man's sphere, the world; woman's sphere, the home; the former bracing the gentle influences of the latter by its rough, sharp lessons of effort, endurance, and antagonism; this latter tempering the hardening effects of the former by its self-denial, its sympathies, and its affections. And I felt that if we are to compare these two spheres, the woman's—while the narrower—is, in many respects, the nobler of the two, and her part in the battle of life not unfrequently the more important and dangerous one.

This was the lesson of my dream. I awoke just as Edward let himself in with his latch-key, and I begged his pardon for my silly forwardness.

I have never had another argument since; and I don't believe I have any—"missionary"—that can take me away from my own fireside.

DOMESTIC LIFE IN GERMANY.—The following letter originally appeared in the Boston Congregationalist. It is from Gen. P. Fisher, Esq., formerly clerk in the State Department, under John M. Clayton:

I have become pretty much accustomed to the German style of living, and like it. But the interest one feels in Germany is mainly a spiritual interest, and centres in the scientific, social and domestic circles; in a word, in the inner life of the people. One finds here in the family an intimacy between parents and children, and a devotion of a father to his home circle. The calm German, whose world is in his books, and his spiritual strength of the time, seeks his recreation, and his struggles, in the bosom of his home. And though he may not have much of the world's goods, he has treasures of knowledge often, and a refinement of culture which the rich cannot buy.

Their fondness for titles is droll. Think of addressing a man as "Herr Gerheim Rath Appellations Richter Rosenberben," and you must put on all the titles else you are impolite. So it is the universal custom for the wife to receive the titles of her husband, with the female terminations; and I believe the ladies are more sensitive about their omission than the men. For instance, if the husband is professor, the wife is "professorin." If the husband is "Consistorial Rath," the wife must be addressed as "Consistorial Rathinn," else she may be enraged.

The distinction of ranks and occupations is very nicely observed and preserved; and it is for this purpose, I conjecture, that the name of one's occupation is prefixed to his proper name. For example, you hear always a "merchant" such a one, and "cabinet-maker" so; and a man is reminded to the day of his death, not only of his own, but his father's occupation. The proclamation of the banns of marriage in the pulpit is on this style. One hears such notices every day in the Church as the following: Mr. bookseller Herman Frederick Gottlob Richter son of iron dealer (so and so) and Dorothea Maria Schmidt, daughter of bookkeeper (so and so) intend marriage.

When I have talked with intelligent Germans themselves about this title mania, they have laughed at it; but it was the custom, so all of them must conform. Foreigners, however, are allowed some liberties in these things; and where a man has six titles I generally put on three and sometimes four. However I find it best to conform to the manners of the people. I even attended a great festival in honor of the King's birth day, and joined in giving the health of the King, Queen and the royal family, while a friend by me drank to the "suns and thirty stars of the American Union."

Duels are of every day occurrence, and more comic than tragic being fought with swords, and seldom resulting in any material injuries, as the armor of the combatants is an effectual protection for every part of the body except the face, which is sometimes a little slashed. This custom of dueling is defended seriously by almost all the students, and is accompanied with the ceremonies which have come down from remote times. Of course, in the German Fatherrcitha there is always a teacher of fencing, who prepares the Jesuits and Dryllus in the noble art of self-defence."

Let me not forget to say that "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is exciting great attention in Germany. Three translations have already appeared; and the universal curiosity to get here to learn something respecting the "slaves." Indeed their interest seemed to be about equally divided between Negroes, Indians and Mormons. In hardly any subject have I been more questioned than concerning the Mormons. A people with whom I have very little acquaintance. If I had a case one to exhibit, I could make a small fortune among these speculative, philosophic, meditative Deutschen.

The rapid progress of the Americans indeed then hurry in every thing, is a marvel to the more quiet nations of the old world. The swiftness of our railroads and steamboats with all the accidents and explosions, are carefully recorded in the papers. When they tell us that these accidents are horrid, etc. we reply that we prefer to get along faster in the world even if we do now and then lose a leg or a hand. Here they move slower and surer. Accidents on railroads for example, are almost unheard of. The German takes no step until he has reached over it.

DEAR LODGINGS.—The Bridal Chamber of the St. Nicholas Hotel, at New York, was first occupied by a Californian and his wife, who took possession of it on Friday the 21st ult—time of occupation 24 hours—bill, $150. The name registered was D. O. King, and wife, New York.

The Treasury Report.

Mr. Guthrie's report shows that on the first of October there was in the Treasury an unappropriated surplus of eight millions and a half, and estimates that on the first of next July the surplus will exceed five millions, after paying all the appropriations of Congress, and the public debts. The receipts for the year ending July 1, 1853 is estimated at $51,000,000, and more than one million of stock is anticipated from premiums with the expenditures of that year will also be five millions less than this.

The public debt has been reduced $12,428,708 13, and it is recommended that the Department have larger powers to purchase it for further redemption, by buying it up before it falls due, at its current market value, above par.

The receipts from customs have fallen below the estimate for the year $1,078,241 30. This fluctuation is owing to the failure of the harvest on account of unfavorable, imperfect or late rains.

Upon the influence of our present commercial legislation upon the condition and prosperity of the country Mr Corwin speaks succinctly but with great point. The fluctuations in the iron trade, the destruction of our woolen masters by foreign competition, and the consequent rise in prices furnish an argument which ought to open the eyes of the country to the ruinous folly of British free trade.

The true relations of the foreign and the home trade are also exposed with masterly effect. It is shown, for instance, that the former is but trifling compared with the latter; that the State of Massachusetts alone produces in manufactures a greater value annually than all of our agricultural products sent to foreign countries. Probably, too, the same small State consumes more of the products of the western and middle States than are sent abroad. The annual production of the country, agricultural mineral and manufactured, is three thousand millions, while the additional labor employed in transporting and exchanging that part of it consumed at home largely increases its original value; on the other hand, the surplus export to foreign countries is only one hundred and forty millions. And yet the foreign trade is regarded the more important of the two! In the famine year of 1847, the export of breadstuffs was so large it was difficult to find shipping for it; and yet we then sent abroad but three per cent of the mining and two per cent of the wheat produced in the country. And at present we do not send half of that amount. How insignificant, then, is the foreign trade, compared with that carried on among ourselves! From all these considerations Mr. Corwin renews the declaration of his preference for a tariff with fixed and reliable, rather than with sliding rates of duty.

During the year ending June 30 1852, we imported of foreign merchandize.....$207,109,738
And exported of domestic merchandise.....154,130,447
And of foreign.....12,067,043

Making in all.....$166,197,490

At the same time we exported of specie over and above the import of the same, $37,170,594. This makes our total export about three millions less than the imports, for which amount we have gone in debt, of course. But as we have had to pay a very heavy interest on debts previously contracted abroad, it is evident that this difference between exports and imports is far from representing the real amount this year added to our foreign liabilities.

The export of tobacco has increased about three-quarters of a million; of rice, one quarter; of breadstuffs and provisions, four millions. The export of domestic merchandise has fallen off nearly twenty-four millions and a half. That of specie has increased thirteen millions and a quarter.

The Mint at Philadelphia has coined during the year fifty-one and a half millions of gold, $847,300 of silver, and $51,629 94 of copper. The Branch Mints have coined about $3,700,000.

A new issue of silver coin reduced in value to correspond with the reduced value of gold is recommended.

It is also recommended to issue certificates to those who deposit bullion at the mint for coinage, which certificates shall be received for all dues to the United States. This being done, the present bullion fund, kept to pay such depositors, could be dispensed with, and applied to the payment of the public debt. These certificates would also afford a convenient mode of transferring the public money from place to place without the expense and risk of sending specie, as at present. They should be redeemable at the mint at any time after twenty days from the assay of the bullion. To avoid interference with the exchanges of the country, and consequent inconvenience to the Department, they should only be received for public dues in the vicinity of their place of issue; as those issued at San Francisco on the Pacific coast; those issued at New Orleans at the ports of the Gulf of Mexico, etc. If, however, the present system is continued and the bullion fund maintained, it will be impossible to reduce the balance in the Treasury below twelve millions to carry on the independent treasury.

The Coast Survey on the eastern and western shores of the Republic is reported to be going forward satisfactorily.

Mr. Corwin advises that the Government build no more marine hospitals, but instead, make arrangements with local hospitals for the care of sick and disabled seamen.

Such are the leading points and recommendations of this important document. In point of style it is admirable, lucid, business-like, cogent and comprehensive. It is honorable to the distinguished statesman from whom it emanates. [N. Y. Tribune.

A BIG TRANSACTION.—A bill is before the Iowa Legislature, authorizing the Commissioners of the Des Moines improvements to contract with Page & Bacon, of St. Louis, for the completion of the works on the Des Moines river. By the terms of this contract the State conveys absolutely to Page & Bacon the remaining lands belonging to the Improvement, amounting to nearly 900,000 acres. Page & Bacon are to pay for this land $1,300,000, ($260,000 each year for five years,) in which time the entire work to Fort Des Moines is to be completed. They are to receive the tolls, water rents, etc., for twenty-five years, and the absolute right of the lands, to be granted and sold at their own prices. No railroad is to be built within ten miles of the Des Moines, and running parallel with it for forty miles. The contractors give a mortgage on the lands for security, and are to keep the works in perfect repair for the period of twenty-five years. [St. Louis Repub.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

In order to complete the publication of "MY NOVEL," by Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, without excluding any part of the "BLEAK HOUSE," by Mr. Dickens, or encroaching unduly upon the variety and general interest of the MAGAZINE, the Publishers add eight pages extra to the present Number, thus very considerably increasing the amount of its reading matter.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE has already reached a regular monthly issue of more than 100,000 Copies, and is still steadily and rapidly increasing. The Publishers have endeavored, by a well-directed use of the abundant resources at their command, to render it the most attractive and most useful Magazine for popular reading in the world; and the extent to which their efforts have been successful is indicated by the fact that it has attained a greater circulation than any similar periodical ever issued.

Special efforts will be made to render it still more interesting and valuable during the present year. In addition to the usual ample and choice selections of Foreign and Domestic Literature, an increased amount of Original Matter, by the ablest American Writers, will be hereafter furnished. The number of Pictorial Embellishment will be increased; still greater variety will be given to its Literary contents; its Editorial and Miscellaneous departments will be still further enlarged and strengthened; special care will be taken to preserve the accuracy, completeness, impartiality and usefulness of its Monthly Record of Current Events; and no labor or expense will be spared to render it in every way, and in all respects, still more worthy of the extraordinary favor with which it has been received.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE owes its success to the fact that it presents more reading matter, of a better quality, in a more elegant style, and at a cheaper rate, than any other publication.

Subscribers in any part of the United States may now receive the Magazine by mail, either from the Publishers, the Booksellers, or Periodical Agents, at THREE DOLLAR a year, or TWENTY-FIVE CENTS a number. The semi-annual volumes, as completed, neatly bound in cloth, at Two Dollars, or the muslin covers at Twenty-five Cents each, are furnished by the Agents or Publishers. Five volumes are now ready, bound.

Publishers will supply specimen numbers gratuitously to Agents and Postmasters, and will make liberal arrangements with them for circulating the Magazine. They will also supply Clubs, of two persons at Five Dollars a year, of five persons at Ten Dollars, and of a larger number at the same rates. Clergymen supplied at Two Dollars per year. Numbers from the commencement can be supplied at any time.

PICKENSVILLE FEMALE INSTITUTE.

INSTRUCTORS:

R. BRADSAW, A. M. PRINCIPAL....MRS. E. BRADSHAW, Superintendent of Domestic and Social Duties.

PROFESSOR C. F. YEAGLE, Instructor in Music: Piano, Guitar, Violin, Harp, etc.

Assistant Teachers: MISSES ANNIE E. RIACH, C. VIRGINIA SMITH, AGNESS B. RIACH, LIZZIE M. BRADSHAW.

The PICKENSVILLE FEMALE INSTITUTE is now, with a very full corps of experienced teachers, in successful operation. The Misses Riach, whose names appear with the other instructors, though native Americans, were both educated in England. These ladies are not only finished scholars but experienced teachers. The Board of Trustees would, with confidence, recommend this school as worthy the patronage of an enlightened public. In point of merit they consider it second to no other similar institution in the South.

They would also assure the public that there has not been a death, nor a case of protracted sickness, in the school for the past three years.

☞ The next regular session of five months will commence the 1st day of MARCH. Pupils, however, will be received at any time, and will be charged only from the time they enter.

☞ Catalogues containing every necessary information respecting TERMS, etc., can be had by applying to the Principal.

LAGRANGE COLLEGE,

SPRING SESSION.

The Spring Session of this Institution will open on FIRST MONDAY in January, 1853. The Faculty is full and will act promptly. The expenses per session of five months are:

For Board	$45 00
For Washing	5 00
For Tuition	25 00
For Room Rent and Servant's hire	3 00
Total of College charges	$78 00

The Students occupy rooms in the College building, and furnish their own candles, wood and other conveniences, the cost of which varies from ten to fifteen dollars during the year.

The Faculty of the College take this opportunity of informing its friends and the public, that in future all just and proper means will be used to promote the interests of the Institution.

The Grammar School connected with the College is admirably taught and supervised by Mr S. P. RACE, a Teacher of experience and superior skill.

By order of the Faculty.

MARION FEMALE SEMINARY,

MARION, PERRY COUNTY, ALABAMA.

Faculty.

REV. JAMES K. ARMSTRONG, A. M., Principal, and Professor of Moral, Mental and Natural Sciences.

MR. U. DAN DAVIS, Professor of Vocal Music, Piano and Harp.

MR. NICOLA MASSARI, Professor of Drawing and Painting, of the French and German Languages, and Instruction on Guitar.

MISS M. L. THOMPSON, English.
MISS M. J. BONDURANT, English.
MISS INDIANA BLAND, English.
Miss ——, Music.
MRS. REBECCA CLARKE, Matron and Nurse.

A commodious and splendid brick edifice has just been completed—ninety-seven by forty-seven feet, three stories—which for stability, convenience of arrangement, and for number, size and comfort of private and school rooms, is not surpassed by any similar one in the country. The Principal resides in the building, and with his lady and competent female assistance, superintends the Boarding Department. A lady will reside in the Seminary, who faithfully discharges the duties of Matron, Nurse and Governess, so that at all times, pupils will find the comforts, kindness and attentions of home. The Principal, with the aid of female teachers, who also live in the Seminary, diligently guard and form their morals, manners and habits of the pupils. Being under his charge at all times, they are constantly exercised in such a wholesome system of regulations, respecting neatness, order, punctuality, economy and regularity, calculated to give a safe and vigorous development to character. The appliances of home and family are not removed by this arrangement, but perpetuated and strengthened.

The ensuing scholastic year will commence on Thursday the 23d of September, 1852. Pupils can enter at any time during the year, chargeable from the time of entrance. No deduction will be made but by special arrangement with the Principal.

Boarders study at night under a teacher. They are required to retire 9 o'clock at night, and rise early in the morning at a given signal, and to take frequent and wholesome exercise.

Private rooms are large, conveniently and comfortably furnished. Pupils are required to keep their wardrobes and prints apart from each other, and in neatness and order. A proper officer weekly takes charge of their clothing, inspects its condition, and every Saturday morning instructs them in plain sewing and necessary repairs of clothing. Every article of clothing must be marked with the owner's name.

Bi-monthly reports are sent to patrons, which are a faithful showing of the scholarship and deportment of pupils.

Pupils are not allowed to attend parties, balls, dancing classes, or any amusement calculated to interfere with their studies.

Visitors are not received by pupils, except with suitable introduction to the Principal from patrons.

The Principal must have certain information respecting every correspondent. Pupils are required to attend Church and Sunday School on Sabbath.

No accounts will be opened in Marion but with the expressed permission of patrons. When articles are to be purchased, the lady of the Principal must approve the purchase (who superintends their trading), and thus expenditures will be controlled. Patrons should anticipate and supply the wants of pupils as far as is practicable.

Dental operations will not be performed but by special permission from patrons.

Patrons are earnestly requested to encourage economy in all the expenditures of pupils—clothing, pocket money and jewelry.

The institution has graduated forty-four young ladies since its organization, and arrangements are being made for furnishing, improving and increasing its Library, Apparatus, Cabinet and Literature.

The Professors of Music, Drawing, Painting and Modern Languages have been engaged in this institution for the last five years, with decided acceptability—are superior Musicians and splendid performers on Piano, Harp, Guitar, Organ, Melodeon, Violin, etc., and highly accomplished in other departments.

As to rates of Board and Tuition, $147 will pay the Board, Tuition and incidental fees of a Young Lady for the whole year in the collegiate course; $117 will embrace French and Latin; $227 the above, with Music on Guitar; $257 Music on the Piano, French, Latin and Board, regular course, etc. Books, Stationery, Music, etc., are furnished by the Principal at reduced rates.

Lights and towels for private rooms, to be furnished by pupils. The Principal can furnish lights very low.

One-half the Board and Tuition is due in advance.

For further particulars, or catalogues, apply to sept 18 5m J. K. ARMSTRONG, Principal.

MRS. READ'S SEMINARY,

BATON ROUGE, LA.

This Institution commenced its present session on the 27th of September, 1852, and by a liberal supply of talented teachers, is prepared to add pupils committed to its care, in acquiring a thorough and accomplished education.

Especial and kind care is bestowed on children in the preparatory Department. In the higher Departments, no effort is wanting which can advance the interests of the student.

Pupils admitted at any time and charged from the time of entrance to the close of the session.

No pupils are received except with the understanding that they are to remain until the session in which they enter is closed, which will be after the annual examination in July.

Expenses per session of ten months, for board, lodging, washing, and English tuition.....$200 00
Music, on Piano, with use of instrument.....70 00
French Language.....30 00

Latin, Spanish, Italian, with drawing, painting, etc., are extra charges.

For further particulars apply to

CENTENARY INSTITUTE.

SUMMERFIELD, DALLAS COUNTY, ALA.

THE Exercises of the Tenth Session of this Institute will commence on the First Monday of October next, under the control and direction of the following named gentlemen and ladies, who compose the Faculty:

REV. A. H. MITCHELL, D. D., President and Professor of Mental and Moral Science.

REV. ELI HUBBARD, A. M., Professor of Ancient Languages.

MR. THOS. C. BRAGG, Professor of Mathematics and Chemistry.

REV. T. V. RAMSEY, Professor of English Literature.

MISS JULIA G. TOWLES, Teacher of English Branches.

MISS MARY S. GARRETT, Teacher of the Preparatory Class.

MONS. JULES BRADY, member of the Royal Academy of Paris, Principal of the Musical Department, and Professor of French.

MRS. LUCINDA FERGUSON, Assistant.

Rates of Tuition for the Scholastic Year.

MALE DEPARTMENT.

Primary Class	$25 00
English Grammar, Geography, Arithmetic and History	30 00
Latin, Greek, Mathematics and Natural Sciences	40 00

FEMALE DEPARTMENT.

Preparatory Class	25 00
Collegiate Department	40 00

Extra Charges.

Music on the Piano	$45 00
Music on the Guitar	40 00
Use of Piano	5 00
Drawing, Painting and Embroidery	15 00
French Language	25 00

Each student will be charged two dollars per year for the purpose of furnishing wood and water and for other necessary attention to the school rooms.

One-half of the Tuition Fee is payable in advance, the other half at the close of the session.

BOARDING.

Board can be obtained in the village and its immediate vicinity, in the best of families, at from ten to twelve dollars a month, including washing, fuel, lights, etc.—half payable in advance, the other half at the end of the term. Should parents be unable to accompany their children to the Institute they need not hesitate about sending them on account of boarding, as the President of the Institute will carefully see to it that they are provided with good boarding houses.

Parents are requested to send their children in time for them to be ready to enter upon their studies the first day of the session. This is highly important as the pupils will experience, through the whole course, the benefit of beginning with their classes.

LIFE'S HARVEST.... By Wm. Edward Knowles.

Ho, reapers of Life's Harvest,
Why stand with rested blade,
Until the night draws round thee,
And day begins to fade?
Why stand ye idle, waiting
For reapers more to come?—
The golden morn is passing—
Why sit ye idle, dumb?
Thrust in your sharpen'd sickle,
And gather in the grain;
The night is fast approaching,
And soon will come again.

Thy Master calls for reapers,
And shall he call in vain?—
Shall sheaves lie there ungathered,
And waste upon the plain?
Come down from hill and mountain,
In morning's ruddy glow
Nor wait until the dint
Points to the noon below.
And come with the strong sinew,
Nor faint in heat or cold;
And pause not till the evening
Draws round its wealth of gold.

And mount the crumbling watch-towers,
And herald on the truth;
Preach out the golden precepts
To wild and wayward youth.
Mount up the heights of Wisdom,
And crush each error low:
Keep back no words of knowledge
That human hearts should know.
Be faithful to thy mission,
In service of thy Lord;
And then a golden chaplet
Shall be thy just reward.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

[Special Correspondence of the Advocate.]

LONDON, January 6, 1853.

On Thursday night, Dec. 16, or rather at half past three o'clock, on Friday morning, the debate on the Budget of the Derby Ministry, terminated by an adverse vote. And the Ministry, who had staked their existence on this vote, were conclusively defeated. The number of members who voted was full—being the fullest house which had been known for very many years, and the majority was nineteen. Though this vote extinguished the late Government, yet it showed the great strength of their party. Three hundred and five voted with them; a compact and united body. Opposed to them were many parties. It is remarkable, too, that of the English and Scotch members, a decided majority was with the late Ministry, the ultimate majority being considerably less in number than the corps of rampant ultramontane Irish Papists—the Pope's brass band, as it has been called—who, to a man, voted against the Government. And if the measures proposed by Mr. D'Israeli had not included one proposal, the, effect of which would have been partially, and only partially, to extend to Ireland the income-tax which is imposed on the rest of the Kingdom, it is possible that the Derby Ministry would have been still in office.

Yet, even if they had, for a while longer retained office, it is scarcely to be supposed that they could have carried through, unmodified, the proposals of their budget, universally and intensely odious as they were to all the lower section of the middle class, whether in town or country, and to the commercial and manufacturing interest. To double the house-tax in area and in amount, without any graduation of charges, and to extend still farther the range of the income-tax, these were intolerable propositions, and such as the second repeal of the malt-tax (intended as a bonus to the agricultural interest) and the removal of navigation-charges could not countervail. The budget must have been essentially modified in committee, even if the party support had carried it, in the first stage, through the Commons.

However, the Country-Party is out. They have had a brief, and not an unsuccessful tenure of office. But such were their antecedents, that it was quite impossible, under a free-trade system, and amid the present tendencies of the age, that they should retain office. They began their career with the election motto of "Protestanism and Protection." The latter they have disguisedly thrown overboard. The former they have everywhere betrayed. In Florence, at Vienna, and in Rome, they have alike degraded the Protestant and British name. They have suffered British gentlemen to be insulted and outraged, Christian Ministers to be mal-treated and causelessly and cruelly expelled, without adequate or without any redress, and even without a firm and dignified remonstrance, while they have stooped to court and cosset with the Popish Potentate, by the back-stairs entrance, at Rome itself. And of what sort is the government which succeeds them? Of its Protestantism much cannot be said. When the Earl of Aberdeen was last in office, he offended and disheartened all earnest Protestants by his tameness in the case of Tahiti. France inflicted the fearful wrong in the face of heaven and earth, but Britain seemed to connive at that wrong. Britain herself, too, was insulted, and for that insult only tardy reparation was obtained; nor do the names of Graham and Gladstone at all add to the public confidence in this point. Aberdeen, Graham and Gladstone, all three, opposed the "Ecclesiastical Titles Bill." They can hardly, however, be worse Protestants in public than the Earl of Malmesbury, the late Foreign Secretary, while, in private, Aberdeen and Gladstone, at any rate, have a reputation for sincere religiousness, such as was never, I believe, coupled with the name of Malmesbury.

In general, the present Ministry may be described as one of transcendent political and parliamentary experience and ability. Such a cabinet was never known before; yet the only one which in this respect could approach it, and which was known at the time, (the beginning of the present century) as the Ministry of all the talents, had but a brief and inglorious tenure of office; and, I confess, I cannot but think there is some reason to fear from the want of internal consistency and harmony a similar result for the present Ministry. Russell and Palmerston, will they so soon, after recent ruptures, work smoothly together, transposed as they are to each other's offices! Does not this very transposition imply a reflection on Palmerston's foreign management, when last in office? Can the conservative and High-Church Gladstone, a member of the Carlton Club, be brought to harmonize with Sir W. Molesworth, the editor of Hobbes's works, a free-thinking, latitudinarian, and a theoretic republican? Similar questions might be asked about other members of the ministry. No doubt, on all principal points, most of the great leaders, whether they have called themselves conservative whigs, or liberal conservatives, may agree, though Gladstone has certain strongly held crotches in which he differs from some others of the Cabinet: but it is evident that the Ministry includes more heterogeneous materials and personal oppositions than is at all desirable. So heterogeneous, however, is the majority by which the late Ministry were expelled, that a heterogeneous opposition Ministry is almost a necessity. No doubt the extreme radical section will give the Ministry a general support, but the Irish band can at any time by coalescing with the ousted party, secure the defeat of Government. Mr. Bernal Osborne, one of the most effective of the Radical debaters, is neutralized, so far as his satirical opposition or criticism is concerned, by his having accepted a post under Government.

From the present Government some extension of the suffrage may certainly be expected, while they announce, as one of their intended projects, a scheme of national education. But as to national education, how can Lord John Russell and Lord Lansdown, the friends of Nonconformists, and the particular supporters of Wesleyan Education, Lord Aberdeen, an elder of the Established Kirk of Scotland, Mr. Gladstone, the Puseyite Episcopalian, and Sir W. Molesworth, the anti-State-and-Church man, and the advocate of merely secular education, be brought to coalesce.

The late Ministry did not leave office in a dignified or conciliatory way. The reply of D'Israeli, on the Budget Debate, was most defiant and sarcastic; the farewell address of Lord Derby, in the House of Peers, was acrimonious and invidious in tone, and unjust in its imputations. The late Ministry did not fall through any conspiracy on the part of their opponents, but from the character of their own measures. From the opposition at large they experienced as favorable a hearing as has probably been accorded, in similar circumstances to any ministry. D'Israeli, however, has greatly advanced his former high reputation, and in his Chancellorship, so uncongenial as the office might have been and was deemed, has evinced an amazing power of application and versatility of genius. Sir J. Parkington, also, has proved himself to be far more than a mere active country member: he has discharged the important functions of Colonial Secretary with credit to himself and advantage to his country. Just let me add, in conclusion, on this head, that the present Ministry is a fusion of Peelites, Whigs, and a few able Radicals. Frederick Peel, the second son, as I believe, of the late great Minister, has accepted office as one of the Under Secretaries of State. The Government will enjoy an unexampled unanimity of press-support—the Times, Morning Chronicle, (Peelite,) Globe and Observer, (Whig,) being all in its favor.

The Kaffir war, it now seems tolerably certain, is at length virtually extinct. But what arrangements will be made with the native tribes, or how the defence of the frontiers will be provided for, remains yet to be seen.

The Birmese war languishes under the conduct of sexagenarian or septuagenarian generals and admirals. General Godwin, it is said, is, or is to be, recalled. High time, indeed, to recall him; especially if it is true, as alleged, that he ignores the advantages of steam in modern warfare, and insists upon managing every thing as he saw it done twenty-five years ago in the former Birmese war.

An enormous and unprecedented amount of gold is in the Bank of England: more than fabulous amounts are still arriving, week by week, in London. Emigrants, also, still pour across to Australia.

Trade here is very good; but the prodigious floods, and tropical tempests, have put a stop to agricultural labor in very many places, and destroyed an immense quantity of property, both by land and by water. But for free-trade, corn and bread-stuffs would be now very dead. Every river valley in South Britain, and in Ireland, would appear to have been inundated, and by the tempests immense cotton factories have even been thrown down, and a railway train blown over!

On the Continent matters remain very much in statu quo. The Austrian Emperor has visited Berlin, a memorable and unprecedented event. This is said to be only an index of the close union and settled concert which now subsists between the Rulers of Austria and Prussia in regard to Continental politics, and especially in respect to France. The concentration of the French Imperial Power, in the hands of Louis Napoleon, a fatalist, who believes himself destined to restore the fortunes of the French Empire, and who holds all the traditions and manners of his Uncle's imperial policy, creates, in most thoughtful minds, apprehensions in regard to the future peace of Europe. It is thought, too, by many that the necessities of Napoleon's position may compel him to undertake war in order to satisfy the Army, by which his power has been gained and must be maintained.

In Vienna an act of military oppression has been perpetrated, in the violent seizure and igneminious treatment, on mere, and as it has proved, unfounded suspicion of the correspondent of the Morning Chronicle—a pitch of tyranny to which Louis Napoleon has never been provoked even by all the lashings of the British press—which has created a great sensation in this country. Explanations and reparation will no doubt be required, and the affair must come before Parliament. The press as you may suppose, is up in arms at such an outrage. But it is reported (whether truly or not) that our Ambassador at Vienna, the Earl of Westmoreland, has shown in this matter the same unworthy tameness as in the disgraceful case of the expulsion from Pesth of the Free-Church Missionaries.

In Methodist affairs there is nothing special to report. The great financial meeting is to be held in February. I must try to send you a special letter in reference to it. My next will be too early for it.

POSTERIPT:

I really hardly know whether I am bound to take any notice of a contradiction to a statement I had made concerning the late editor of the Wesleyan Times, which was published in one of your numbers last to hand. Certainly, in this country, I should think it a degradation to be at the trouble of defending myself from any contradiction proceeding from the leaders and organs of that party. I have nothing to retract in regard to the unfortunate and guilty instrument to whom I have referred. I under-stated the report which has been everywhere current, among Reformers, as well as the adherents of the Conference, and which I never heard contradicted, or even doubted of, in any circle. I have only to ask: Why did the person in question give up the editorship of the anti-Wesleyan organ? Why, at the same time, did his name disappear, not only from the "Reform Secretariat," but from all public connection with the Reform movement? Why did he so absolutely, and so suddenly, disappear from everybody's knowledge, so that no trace of him could be heard of, and even the friends of his wife's family were as much in the dark, as to his habitat, as every one else? Why was the report allowed, soon afterwards, to become current, and never contradicted, that he had gone abroad? Will his late co-Secretaries say where he is now? and why his practical talents, if employed at all in the work of Reform, are working in the midst of an impenetrable secrecy? Why is his fluent oratory never heard at Reform Meetings? At any rate, if he has never left the country, he has never shown his face in open day. He may have left it for a time, and returned since. But since he so suddenly absconded, he has never been heard of here. His talents were, perhaps, of too useful and congenial a character to be lost to the Reform cause, and he may be doing his old work now in the dark, as it is fit it should be done, and in this way, possibly, he may have compounded for his dues to the Reform Fund. But I must have better authority than that of Mr. Harrison's late co-Secretaries, before I disbelieve a statement, so universally credited, reported to me on such safe authority, and so entirely uncontradicted at the time, as that the late editor of the Wesleyan Times, and co-Secretary of the Reform Committee, at the time he disappeared from all public cognizance, was discreditably involved in pecuniary liabilities, both to the Reform Fund, to Mr. Hay, the Reporter, and in other ways. Some day the particulars of this matter may become history, and I may be able, if it is needful, to give you evidence on the subject.

In conclusion let me refer you, Mr. Editor, for I will not weary your readers, nor degrade myself, by dwelling at length on such a matter of digression as this, to an article in the Wesleyan Times, for October 18, 1852, headed "Journalists Lying Abroad for the Clique," in evidence of the sort of party represented by the men who have contradicted my statement. That article abundantly proves that the present editor of the Wesleyan Times, the official colleague of the men who have addressed you, and the impersonation of the whole party, is capable of the most deliberate fabrication. Though he accuses me of "lying for the clique," yet, with glaring inconsistency, he charges me with "making a concealed attack on the most venerable member" of that very clique, meaning thereby Dr. Bunting; at the same time the very writer, who, only last Conference, in the most heartless and brutal manner mocked and caricatured the infirmities of that aged and truly "venerable" minister, and invented for his mouth a low and ill-phrased speech, which Doctor Bunting never uttered, and never could have uttered, interpolating, to pass current the lie, a sentence here and there from the true report of the Doctor's speech, as he, the editor of a journal which has been accustomed, in the foulest phrase, to impute to Dr. Bunting embezzlement, chicanery and tyranny, as his ordinary characteristics—has the audacity to say that "in us, that eminent individual must at any rate acknowledge a manly and open foe." In what style I have ever spoken of Dr. Bunting your readers know. Whilst I claim the right of criticising his public position with a respectful freedom, never have I penned one word inconsistent with that veneration of his character, and that high estimate of his services to Methodism, which I have ever felt. In the same article the voracious journalist represents me as saying of myself, what I expressly and restrictively said of "such men as our President of the year, as Dr. Beecham, and Mr. Bomas!" But you may judge of the truth and spirit of the whole, by the following extracts:

"The channels through which these false and malicious reports are set afloat, are selected with admirable discrimination. We do not find the weak inventions of the Clique abusing the patience of the men of Massachusetts, where liberty, both civil and religious, is something more than a theory. It is to the South, that the newest form of priestcraft, in Europe, looks for sympathetic audience. The readers of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" will well appreciate the motives which have induced the Conference Clique to choose the New Orleans Christian Advocate as a means of communication with their American brethren. Among the slave-owning ministers and churches, of Louisiana, they might reasonably expect to meet with indulgent consideration from congenial minds."

And, now, for the future, I decline to take any notice of whatever contradictions may issue from such a quarter. It is clear, however, that your correspondent's letters tell, even in England!

EXPERIMENTAL RELIGION.

Mr. Editor—I have been reading for a few days past the writings of Alexander Campbell, and Southey's Life of Wesley. I have been struck with the skepticism with which both these authors treat the matter of experimental religion; albeit the one is founding a religious sect, as he says, on primitive principles, and the other is writing the life of one whom he acknowledges a saint. May not the one be considered the exponent of a large portion of the religious sentiment in this country, and the other of the Episcopal Church in England—perhaps, to a large extent in American also?

These two, for the sake of convenience, may be assumed, then, as the representatives of two distorted extremes—formalism and good works—both meeting in opposition to the work of Grace in the human heart. Here is high Church on the one hand, and no Church on the other. How important the position, then, occupied by those Christians, who consider conviction and conversion as real facts, and not as mere illusions. Alas! I find even Coleridge and Isaac Taylor out of the way on this vital point.

Coleridge, in speaking of the powerful conversion, and clear account, of Thomas Walsh, complains of obscurity, [See Life of Wesley, Vol. 2, p. 130, Note.] and Isaac Taylor calls Mr. Wesley "a regenerate man," long before the period to which he assigned his own conversion, and says: "if he was not, then many, who adorn Church history for a full thousand years, were not Christians." [Wesley and Methodism, p. 36.] Is the conversion of the soul to God, then, something different from a mere change of opinion—however radical and correct this change of opinion may be—and from a change in the life of the subject, or is it not? We propose, for a few moments, to urge the affirmative of this question, and trust that the importance of the subject may give weight to what is said.

That the tendency of human nature has ever been to stop in this change of sentiment, or change of life at best, stands forth upon every page of religious history. But that all men, who have ever become remarkable for true piety, have not remained satisfied with this, simply, but have attained to a higher and deeper state of experience, is equally the truth of their history. Neither have these been confined to any age or sect. It is alike the testimony of St. Paul, Martin Luther, John Bunyan, John Wesley, and Jonathan Edwards, together with hosts of inferior names. These were all alive without the Law once, were all slain by sin taking occasion by the Law; and were all justified at last by Faith, and became new creatures in Christ Jesus. The opponents of this supernatural conversion, seem to consider it as the workings of a diseased mind.

But we ask are not the thoughts suggested to the mind by religion, and the influences which accompany them, sufficient to produce these extraordinary results? The shortness of life, the vastness of eternity; the depravity of man, the holiness of God; the rigors of the Law, the "mystery" of the Gospel; are not these sufficient to stir the soul to its inmost depths? They are not, indeed, as long as the soul continues in its natural state; and that is the reason why the worldly-wise have misunderstood it; but when the powerful influence of the Holy Spirit is brought to bear, and the mind of the sinner is made to realize these tremendous truths, no wonder there should be powerful emotion, and powerful action!

No wonder that the guilty sinner, suspended as he feels himself to be, over endless destruction, should cry out with heart-breaking emphasis: "Men and brethren what must I do to be saved!" And no wonder that when he lays hold upon Christ and finds not only safety in his wounds, but an actual new creation within his soul, he should "rejoice with joy, unspeakable, and full of glory." The only marvel is, that this is not more frequently the case in our day under the sound of the Gospel. If some part of the fault does not lie at the door of the Minister it is well for him.

The circumstance that has brought most discredit upon the kind of conversion which prevails in Revivals, is the suddenness of the approach, and the short continuance of those feelings. The first may be accounted for in the character of persons generally affected: those who have not, hitherto, been intimate with the doctrines of religion. The second results, partly, from the same cause, but principally from the negligence of the converts. We should maintain on the one hand, that conversion may be speedy or slow, in proportion to previous habits of the individual and surrounding circumstances; and on the other, that our experience of religion is not to cease from the hour of conversion, but to continue, to deepen, to brighten, till the whole of our character is made alive in the image of God. We contend not for the mode of transition, it may be long or short, easy or violent; but we earnestly insist for the thing itself—the change of heart, the change or translation from darkness to light; and for the continuance of this change, and for a growth in Grace, and an ever-increasing knowledge of the things of God.

REPORT

Of the Ladies Bible Society, of the First and Third Municipalities—now the Second and Third Districts.

The Executive Committee, of the "Ladies Bible Society, of the First and Third Municipalities," in accordance with the requirements of their Constitution, respectfully submit to the Society the report of their proceedings during the year 1852:

At a meeting of the Committee, held March 10, the field of our operations was, as far as practicable, marked off into districts, of which one was assigned to each member of the Committee, who was expected to call upon the various families resident therein for contributions to the funds of this Society. Some of those elected as managers at the last annual meeting, have declined to act in that capacity, and the districts assigned to them have thus remained unvisited. Other members of the Committee have, owing to various causes, but partially explored their portions of the field; and in those districts, which have been most faithfully visited, but few have been found disposed to contribute pecuniary aid to the furtherance of the objects of our Society. Only $82 95 have been received into the Treasury since the last annual meeting.

But whilst in the review at their own efforts, the Committee can only regret that no more efficient service has been rendered, and that no more important results have been produced, they discover a brighter side to the picture as they listen to the reports of those who have been engaged in the distribution of those invaluable treasures, which the funds of our Association have provided.

One colporteur informs us that he has supplied more than sixty families, in our midst, with Bibles during the past year. At one time he gave a Bible to a Spaniard, who was ignorant of its contents, and who, actuated by curiosity, desired to examine the revealed will of God. The perusal of the Scriptures awakened a desire to receive religious books, which was gratified. He was thus led to renounce the errors of Romanism, and to yield his belief to the doctrines of a pure Christianity, and we trust, that having given an intellectual assent to the truth, he may be led to possess that faith, without which "it is impossible to please God."

A German woman expressed a wish to receive a copy of the Bible in her own language. Her daughter, having obtained one of the English version at the Sabbath School, had related to her mother some of the interesting narratives contained in the Holy Book, and the parent desired to read, in her own tongue, the wonderful words which the child could but imperfectly translate to her.

Two German colporteurs have been employed in the work of distributing Bibles, within our limits, for some time past. One of them is conversant with the various languages of Northern Europe, and can thus accompany his proffer of the Book of Life, with words of counsel, and expressions of sympathy, which may reach the understanding and heart of the stranger from a distant land.

Through the efforts of these laborers three hundred and forty families have been supplied with the Word of God. More than forty persons in one neighborhood have, through their instrumentality, been led earnestly to search the Scriptures, and now assemble together for the purpose of learning the will, and imploring the guidance of Him of whom these Scriptures "testify."

The agent of the S. W. Bible Society says that the good work among the German Catholics, in the Second District, "still continues and spreads silently. Many seem willing to receive the truth; some attend prayer meetings; and we hope God by his Spirit is working a saving change in their hearts." He adds: "Some foreigners, from Roman Catholic countries, have received Bibles with great joy."

A small number of Bibles and Testaments have been distributed by members of our Committee.

One of our number reports that she was directed by one, to whom she had sold an English Bible, "to the chamber of a sick and dying mother." There, at the request of the invalid, she read the words of Inspiration to her, and to her sorrowing daughters, and gave them a Bible, "which they seemed to receive as a precious gift." From the same lady the proprietor of a coffee-house, who was unable to read, purchased both a Bible and a Testament for his daughter, that from her lips he might learn the truths which he was unable to study for himself.

While the Committee feel that their feeble efforts have not been without some encouraging results, they cannot but express the hope, that the history of the coming year may give evidence of greater zeal and more efficient action on the part of those who may be called to engage in this work.

The peculiar character of the field we occupy, furnishes a strong motive for activity and perseverance in the prosecution of the objects of this Society. We have among our population the representatives of all European countries. Led by various motives, there have come among us the hardy sons of the rough climes of the North, and those whose early years have been spent beneath the kinder skies of France and Italy, or among the "vine-clad hills" of Spain. Though born amidst such different scenes, and educated under such various influences, they are all fellow travelers to the grave and to eternity; all have sinned, and for all has one atoning sacrifice been made. But most of these have never listened to the story of Redemption, or if they have heard of Bethlehem and Calvary, the reality has been so blended with fable, that their minds have failed to discern the truth. Shall we not, then, be more diligent in our endeavors to furnish them with that volume, which will tell them of "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world?"

And may He, who can control all hearts, dispose many more of those who reside in these districts to contribute personal effort, and pecuniary aid, to this work.

PLEASE READ.

On looking over matters in Jackson, Miss., I find some things of startling import, to which I invite the particular attention of the ministers and members of the Mississippi Conference, in hope of producing a brighter shade in the picture, so far as Methodism is concerned.

Here there are institutions of learning—institutions of promise and merit, and far be the thought from the writer to speak otherwise—but the question is are our children to be sent to them, and compelled to attend the service of the Church?

Will Episcopalians send their children to our Colleges, and allow us to compel them to attend the service of the Methodist Church? They will not, for one moment, indulge in the thought: then, why should we violate, by undue charity, the best of rules—"Religious consistency?"

Nor is this all. There is not so much as a one-day school under the guidance of a Methodist teacher in the city. The children of our membership, in consequence of this, and other causes not necessary to mention, go with their teachers, and of course worship as they worship, and where they worship. Just think of it; the daughters or sons of Methodist Ministers are at these institutions, and according to custom hear, from Sabbath to Sabbath, doctrines preached which plainly declare that their fathers have no more authority to preach, or baptize, than a negro has to execute the functions of the Governor of the State! Self-respect, it would seem to me, apart from the appeal of abused profession, ought to influence all such to adopt a more excellent way. Add to these considerations the thought that the very ashes of the holy Wesley, and the records of revivals, are occasionally disrespectfully spoken of; and the Church of our choice may well blush at the conduct of her people! Is there one Episcopal Minister, or member, in the land, however lost to self-respect and regard for the Church, would permit his son or daughter to go to a Methodist school under such circumstances! Not one! If our members, and some of our Ministers, are determined to make Papists and Episcopalians of their sons and daughters, they ought to come out at once, and let our faithful Ministers know what they may look for, so that they may not run in vain, nor labor in vain, in certain quarters.

The Methodists in Jackson, and those who patronize the schools in Jackson, from a distance, are very much to blame in reference to these things. If our children were allowed to go to our Sabbath School, and to worship at our Church, we could afford to be silent in hope of a better prospect, but as they are not, language cannot present the feelings of the writer respecting the matter of complaint.

Do not our people see, unless they are under a delusion, that Papists and Episcopalians are determined on the education of our children? Why? That they may proselyte them. Does not the land abound with alarming results from this policy? It will be found any thing but pleasing to see a daughter embrace the doctrine of the Key of St. Peter, or the idea of the Church; for then she will look on her father and mother as occupying an unconvenanted relation to God, on account of being a Methodist heretic.

But why do I so talk? Does not the idea of a strict school, kept by a Papist or Puseyite, offer a king-cure for all the evil? "Verily," says the mother, "our daughter will be safe: the young men will neither be allowed to visit, nor write letters." Well, let us construct a Methodist school, according to the mother's view, and what then? Simply this: "No objection, says that the school is too strict; it creates a dislike to learning in the minds of the girls on this account." And so some of our people and Ministers move. Shame! shame!!

Now, if Democrats and Whigs were so to act, how long would they exist as distinct bodies? Just about as long as a galloping consumption would take to end life. Well did the Savior say, "that the children of this generation are wiser than the children of light."

Suffer me to ask all the people of the land a few questions: Do not Papists and Puseyites most positively affirm, that Ministers of dissenting Churches have no right—the law of the State to the contrary—to administer the sacraments of the household of Faith? Are they not, in view of this, in open conflict with the Constitution and law of every State in the Union? Provided they gain a majority in any State, will they allow that which they condemn? By no means. What then? Of course, shape the laws according to their judgments. See ye, then, to these things in time, or the curse under which other lands groan will, sooner or later, overtake us!

Would it not be well if some—yea, all of our editors—would press these questions on their attention, demanding an answer?

I beg leave to ask some of the young Ministers of the Conferences, where is the authority for saying, "I would as soon marry out of the Church as in it, provided, I could be pleased!" Need any be surprised that sons and daughters are sent to schools, as above stated, when this unscriptural sentiment prevails? Verily, the Church will soon, under such a state of things, need another Wesley to bring her back to the plain letter of the Word of God—leaving out of the question its spirit!

JUSTICE.

The New Hampshire Religious Test.—It is doubted whether a convention to remove the religious test in New Hampshire can be called before 1877, as the Constitution of that State provides that amendments shall be proposed to the people every seven years after holding a previous Convention. The last Convention was held in 1850, and many able lawyers contend there is no authority to call another till 1857. In view of this diversity of opinion the friends of reform are afraid to urge the call of the Convention at present.

REASONS

Why Protestants should not Send their Children to Roman Catholic Schools.

I have been much astonished, and not a little mortified to see a disposition, on the part of some Protestants, to build up Roman Catholic institutions, to the neglect of their own, by sending their children to them. Surely they have forgotten, or else never knew the faith for which Luther and the other Reformers contended. They have failed to instruct themselves in the history of Romanism, or to contemplate its influence upon those countries where it has held sway.

I was in company with a Protestant family a few days since, when the lady said, in speaking of a promising son, "I have asked Mr.——, alluding to her husband, to send L—— to the Jesuit College." Well, I replied, why do you send him there? "Because it is the best school I know of. Col. C—— says he has examined the various Institutions of the country, and he can find none equal to it, and Col. C—— is a learned man, and a very good judge." I asked her if Col. C—— had examined certain Institutions, calling them by name. She thought, perhaps, he had not. Thus, you discover, that this Protestant lady was ready to post off her son to a Jesuit School because, forsooth, a certain gentleman, not a religious man, and not the best judge in the world, happens to recommend it. I am confident that this gentleman has never given himself the trouble, even, to inquire after one of our Colleges, either in regard to the competency of the teachers, or the thoroughness of their course of instruction. He would likely feel himself insulted if called on to patronize one of them. Yet these are the individuals who influence Protestant parents to pass by and depreciate their own institutions, to encourage and foster Roman Catholic institutions. If the latter Institutions are so much superior, where are the evidences in the scholarship of those they have educated? I have known several who have been instructed in Jesuit Schools, but I have never been unable to discover in them any thing remarkable in point of accomplishment or learning. Really, it is difficult to find a superior scholar among such; I mean, especially, those who have of late years been under Jesuit instruction. It is said that many of the priests are educated men; so they may be: but it should be also added, that many of them are very ignorant men. The streets of Rome are to-day thronged with hundreds of priests of the poorest intelligence and sensitivntion. But they are not confined to Rome; they are scattered throughout our own country. Of course there are many who are classically learned, but these are, almost without exception, foreigners, and poorly suited for the education of American youths. The system of Jesuitism is a system of slavery. Loyola, its founder, from his military life learned implicit obedience to superior power, and he impressed it upon his society, making it a pure monarchy. The General of the Order is the despot; to him all are amenable, and he holds in his power the decisions of every case connected with the Order. He is omnipotent in the regulation of its affairs. Every member yields up the right of self-disposal, and becomes his tool—to work where and in any way he may direct.

Each member is bound to obey his Superior without question or complaint. Should he say to him: Go to the North Pole! he would have to try and find it! 'Tis said that so implicit is the obedience rendered, that should an order arrive while a brother was engaged in writing, he is to stop, though in the middle of a word, rather than delay for a moment obedience to the will of the Superior. No Government on earth has ever established such a complete system of espionage. They worm themselves into society and possess themselves of its secrets. They have peculiar skill in counterfeiting friendship for others, so as to get hold of all that is worth knowing about them. Those who unite with them have to lay bare their conscience to their Superior, making known their inmost thoughts—sins and inclinations. You must allow an entire dissection of soul. The espionage alluded to does not simply extend to those without, but is practiced within their own inclosures. They are set as spies upon each other, and are expected to make known whatever of importance they may discover, and this is transmitted to the General, who has it registered. By this means he is kept informed of every thing which may serve to aid him in the management of the Order. He knows the capabilities of each member; what they can do, and what they can suffer, in the furtherance of his designs. He is the grand depository of all the secrets, small and great, of the Order.

It is astonishing to see how untiringly they consult its interests. Doctor Alexander says: "There is not a Jesuit who may not say, like the wicked Spirit in Scripture, 'My name is Legion.' Never did Republican love his country, as every Jesuit loves his Society; the very lowest of its members interests himself in it—of which he thinks some rays reflect upon himself. They are all at once put in action by the single spring which one man directs at pleasure; and it is not without reason that they have been defined, 'a naked sword, the hilt of which is at Rome!'"

To carry forward their interests every thing must give way. No matter what the means, so the end is attained; for the latter sanctifies the former. Oaths and obligations must not be permitted to weigh a feather when the principles of Jesuitism are to be advanced. Yes, before these let human sufferings—the ties of relationship—solemn pledges—be as nothing!

Such is the system of Jesuitism; a system as corrupt as can well be conceived; yet Protestants, by sending their children to its schools, are upholding it and strengthening its influence. How many Protestants are led away from the Religion of parents, and learn to look upon it as contemptible and worthless! Some even imagine that there is no danger; children are too well Protestantized to be drawn away; but, alas! too many have learned, when there was no remedy, their want of foresight.

A certain gentleman, and a Protestant in faith, sent his daughter to one these institutions, under the belief that she would suffer no change in her religious views, but to his astonishment and mortification she renounced Protestanism and came out a confirmed, and it is to be feared, an incurable Romanist. She was devotedly attached to the services and doctrines of that Church, as though she had been raised in Rome itself. That gentleman has other children, and it is said that he is in dread lest they should adopt this same faith. So much for believing that there is no danger. Why, it is the object of those in the Romish Church to bring as many into it as possible; for this they build their institutions. They crave the youth of the land, that they may work upon their tender minds and mould them after their liking. Especially do they seek those children that are likely to have an influence in society, either from their possession of talents or wealth.

In conclusion let me say to Protestants, patronize your own institutions of learning, if you wish the happiness of your children and country.

Terms: $1 50 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, February 12.

☞ See the "Special Notice" of Doctor Stegeson.

The Louisiana Conference passed resolutions, of approbation and patronage, highly flattering to the Agent and his cause, which we should have published, but have not been able to lay hands on them.

☞ We learn that during the last month, the Publishers of Webster's Dictionary have filled an order for a case of the "Unabridged," from Hong Kong, in China, and another from Northern India. They frequently supply orders for the Work from the British Provinces, West Indies and California. We wish that every reader of this could own a copy of this valuable Dictionary.

CALIFORNIA ITEMS.

The mail of Thursday brings large files of California papers. Among them we have the Christian Advocate as late as 30th December; the Observer, of the 12th January. They tell of great suffering in the Mining districts; for a fuller account of which we refer to the department of secular news. The Observer says:

"The Rev. Jefferson C. Pendergrass, Missionary of the M. E. Church, South, arrived on the steamer Independence on Friday last. Brother P. and his lady have made the long and wearisome journey from Tennessee to California in fine time and good health."

CENTENERY COLLEGE.

Rev. A. T. M. Fly writes from Jackson, Louisiana, on the 4th inst., that the College is prospering beyond all precedent. There are at present two hundred and twenty-five students in attendance, of whom about fifty are members of the Church.

OUR FRIENDS ABROAD.

The POSTSCRIPT of "X. Y." gives the estimate in which Southern Methodists are held by the "Reform" party of the Wesleyan Church in England. It is well that sympathy and fellowship from that party are of so little consequence to us. In addition to the extract from their Organ, presented by X. Y., we give another—an additional testimonial of brotherly love, not only to the Editor of this paper, but his brethren in the ministry. No wonder that party, led on by such "spirits" as here speak out, accomplished nothing in their reform but disruption, secession and backsliding:

"The coward who wrote, and the knave who printed, the base slanders we allude to, know that they were safe in doing their dirty work in a country where such fiends in human shape as the Haleys, the Markses and the Legrees are to be found by scores, with 'Rev.' before and 'D. D.' after their names, and in no religious body in greater numbers, perhaps, than in the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Let the 'lewd fellow of the baser sort' who penned what he knew to be the reverse of truth, repeat his foul language in the Watchman, and we will have Her Majesty's Attorney General down upon him on the first day of term."

FEMALE EDUCATION.

It was a subject of remark, a few days ago, in a company of friends with whom we had the privilege of joining—Why are there more High Schools and Colleges for girls than boys under the patronage and direction of the Church? Several answers were drawn out: That the appliances of female education were cheaper; that the State often provided for the higher education of males—those that were to be its voters and officers—and thus left the females to be provided for by the Church; that the occupation of teaching girls was more pleasant; that the education of females was more important to the interests of religion and the Church; and one calculating head nicely put in this solution—because there were more girls than boys.

Ah! that penultimate reason strikes us as the true one. Boys are for the State; girls for the homes. The former exercise the political power; the latter the social, the religious, the domestic. These sanctify the firesides and the forming influences of our nature; those go forth to the battle of life to do and to be very much as their mothers and sisters and wives have secretly but potentially shaped them.

It is a significant fact that the shrewd Papal policy, which seeks to get control of mankind, is this: To educate the daughters. Where they have one literary institution for young men they have two female seminaries. More than this; the last census of Romanists in the United States shows forty-five literary institutions for males and one hundred and two for females.

Entertaining these views, it is with no ordinary satisfaction that we witness the springing up of female seminaries and colleges, under the patronage of the Church. The preachers, the conferences, and all concerned, cannot neglect to foster them, without neglecting an interest we may almost say vital to the Church. Georgia Conference abounds with these institutions; they flourish there; the Committees visit them and report on them, and there is a close interest and communion kept up between the Seminaries and the Conference. We expect to hear good news of progress in Georgia Methodism, under this state of things. Alabama Conference abounds more than they all in female seminaries, and this we regard as a large element of the vigor and liberality of the Church there. They may be counted up as towers of strength and beauty to Zion. They stretch along from the extreme East to the extreme West of that Conference.

Florida has a strong hold of this sort in her Fletcher Institute, which we are happy to hear is prospering.

Mississippi Conference is taking well-considered measures in her schemes for education. The basis is a very sound one that is being laid; and we hope soon to see large results. At present the female colleges at Sharon and Jackson stand forth fairly for the cause of the sex. May they have many sister institutions, and that before long.

Texas and Arkansas are both devising liberal things in this way.

And what shall we say for Louisiana? The excellent schools of Mrs. Read at Baton Rouge, of Rev. C. A. Frazee at Opelousas, are all we can point to within the bounds of the Conference, entering into its Educational Reports. These do a good work, but they are not enough. There is also a flourishing school in DeSoto Parish. But the Conference can take but little credit for any success that the cause of female education has had in its bounds. As yet it has done nothing. The fair and promising offer made to it for establishing a female college at Minden—one of the very best points in the State—has not yet been turned to account. Will somebody say why that matter delays? On what point does it catch and hang? The offer, we understand, was most freely made, and unqualified, and the Conference was unanimous in the appreciation of its high value and eligibility. What hinders? Will the Methodists of that region, often called the "Garden Spot," put the enterprise through? We invite to it the attention of the preachers in that portion of the Conference.

NEWS FOR THE SICK.

By the polite attention of Dr. Austin we had an agreeable visit one day last week to the Mineral Springs on the Eastern shore of Biloxi Bay. That there should be springs, and mineral springs, any where on the coast between this and Mobile was so improbable, we had to see and taste before fully believing. We have seen, tasted, and do now believe.

The proprietors would do well to select a more taking name than Lynchburg Springs. But that is their name now, and of the post-office just established there. They are equidistant from New Orleans and Mobile, situated in a lovely pine and live oak country, fronting the bay, and reached directly by steamboats. Doubtless a town, as by the magic of these times, will soon rise up there. The location is sufficiently inviting as a summer retreat, to say nothing of the springs. Their medicinal virtue is to be looked for particularly in the oxide of iron and sulphureted hydrogen, which, according to Prof. Smith's analysis, they possess in notable qualities. There is also a strong trace of iodine.

Striking cures have been wrought by them in certain chronic diseases. A lad of twelve years old was shown us, said to have been taken from the Asylum here, almost a hopeless victim of scrofula. He looked sound and well, the deep scars and holes filled up with healthy flesh, testifying to a once sad condition. He had resided on the spot and drank the water about four months. Other instances were made known to us, which in time will probably be certified to the public.

Two hotels are being built near the Springs, and the coming season they will hardly lack guests; the sick resorting thither to get well, and the well to get better.

After an agreeable day spent in surveying the laid out town, sipping at this spring and at that, (for there are two,) and imagining ourself better, and partaking of the hospitality of our friend, Rev. E. R. Porter, (who is here, we are happy to say, with recruiting health,) we left "Ocean Springs" (let that be their name) for the city. The boat had left us, and we must needs go by sail-boat twenty-five miles to strike the mail line at Pass Christian, or delay. Delay was not to be thought of. The wind was fair; so hoisting sail we "let her drive." Rev. Mr. Ferguson, of Nashville, and Cols. Rayburn and Kendall, beguiled the time well. Col. K. built the Pacific road, and all gave in that it was one of the things that must be. Waxing eloquent at the march of mind and improvement in these latter days, he emphatically spoke it—"Fact is, gentlemen, this is going to be a very interesting world, from now out."

And while we talked above, the "finny tribes" below were taking things their way in the quiet and beautiful waters of the Gulf. It was rather hard, however, to imagine them devotionally engaged according to the spirit of those lively quaint old lines that run something so:

> "Ye monsters of the sea,
> Your Maker's praises spout—
> Up from the deep,
> Ye codlings peep,
> And wag your tails about."

Speaking of railroads—just about this time (10 P. M.) all hands began to wish our craft was hitched on to a locomotive; for the winds lulled, and it seemed we should not reach the Pass as soon as the Oregon. But "Jose" whistled, and the breeze sprung up (whether a consequence or coincidence, we do not say,) and brought us to the wharf—barely in time. In all the yacht races that have been witnessed from that wharf no water craft ever came in under a greater press of sail or anxiety.

Before the dog-star shines we indulge the pleasing expectation of another visit to the "Ocean Springs."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Somebody has sent us a pamphlet of twenty-two pages: "REASONS WHY I COULD NOT BE AN EPISCOPALIAN. By an Episcopos, of Alabama." The imprint is "Richmond, Virginia, 1852."

Heartily do we agree with the writer when he regrets, in view of all the great interests involved, that the different companies of laborers, in the Vineyard of Christ, cannot agree to co-operate harmoniously—vying with each other only in the amount of good accomplished.

But while one portion shall attempt to "lord it over" others, and deny them a place in the great field, this never can be. The arrogant and insufferable assumption of High Churchmen, in claiming to be "the only true Church," and alone authorized to preach the gospel, or administer its ordinances, and the consequent extraordinary and meddlesome efforts made by them to proselyte persons from other Churches, naturally and justly subject their pretensions to examination and criticism. If that Church would keep its proper place, and to its proper work, claiming only to be a branch of the visible Church of Christ, and the privilege of being recognized by other Churches, as a co-laborer in evangelizing the world, its claims would be conceded. But when her Ministry come forward and inform us that the rest of the religious world are without the pale of Christ's Church—are "mere Societies," unauthorized and in a state of schism, and consequently a state of sin—and that they, alone, are the only "authorized" agents acting upon the Divine plan for the conversion of the world; men will pause over such alarming announcements, and subject the history, character and labors of their authors to a searching analysis. If, therefore, our Episcopal friends find their pretensions exposed they may thank themselves for it.

It is a work of self-defense they have imposed upon the "sects," as other branches of the Church are sneeringly called.

The writer, in common with many others, has not been without cause of complaint. He states that for the last two years there has been no time when one or more of the members of his Church was not the object of special attention, or open and undisguised efforts at proselyting, by an Episcopal Minister, laboring in the same community. And at one time as many as half a dozen of his members were the objects of these attentions, being visited frequently—urged to join "the Church," and furnished with books calculated to alienate them from the Church of their choice.

REASONS are given, which number nine, why the writer, and his members, and brethren, could not expect to be benefitted by the change of Church relations which is attempted to be brought about by such annoying and systematic efforts:

The first is, that the Ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church possess no scriptural prerogative, or authority, not possessed by our own Church. There is no intrinsic virtue in Episcopacy—no real benefit—no advantage—which the Methodist Episcopal Church does not enjoy equally with it. The boast of superiority on this basis is excluded. The "succession" doctrine is dispatched by the writer with few words—but enough; and there can be no better authority adduced, in this controversy, than he adduces to prove that "Bishops and Priests (presbyters) were an two orders—but both one in the beginning of Christ's Religion." The placing of Bishops over Presbyters was a prudential arrangement for the peace, unity, and efficiency of the Church. No "divine right" about it, or mysterious grace communicated through it.

On one point the writer is not as guarded as we could wish him: He speaks of our own branch of the Church, with some others, as "non-Episcopal." We do not accept the word "non-Episcapal" in its application to us. We write in full, and like it well—Methodist Episcopal Church. We prefer the Episcopal form of Church government to the Presbyterian or any other. We contend for Episcopacy—such as we have. Our Bishops are Bishops. They do a good work, and fill the office more nearly in accordance with the primitive intent of it than any others. But this idle boast of ordination from the Apostles—and the grace imparted by Episcopal manipulations—and building the Church upon the Episcopacy, so that where there is no Bishop, "of the direct line," there can be no Church—these pretensions and abuses of the Episcopacy, cannot be too severely censured as sin-breeding, and Romish-tending, and formality-inducing; and none can expose them with better grace and fairness than a Methodist—holding to the Episcopacy as it was and as it ought to be.

Nearly a year ago there was a short controversy between two Methodist journals, North and South, about the Episcopacy, on the occasion of Bishop Hamline's resignation. The two doctors (editors) took ground extreme enough for one to stand between them. He of the North claimed so little for Episcopacy it could not maintain itself; and he of the South claimed more for Episcopacy than could be maintained for it. If the writer of this pamphlet had expressed himself on the merits of that controversy, we think, from what is seen of his opinions here, that we should entirely agree with him.

But enough of this: only we hope, that wherever this pungent pamphlet finds its way, Methodists may be convinced and settled in the conviction, that theirs is a valid Episcopacy. And when they hear great swelling words about the Bishop—the Bishop's coming—the Bishop laid his hands, etc.—they will remember that they, too, have Bishops—nothing inferior in quality, and fully equal in authority and prerogative.

And if any claim more than Methodist Bishops, their claim is a fiction—a fiction close akin to the Pope's claim. A Protestant Episcopalian can make nothing of a Methodist Episcopalian on the merits of the Episcopal argument. There may be more lawn and silk about the former, but not more validity. So, then, Methodists can have no inducement to change on this point. And "Episcopos" having shown this, proceeds to show more—that the Protestant Episcopal Church is sadly lacking in many things. He says:

"This Church lacks proper unity upon Christian doctrine and practice."

And under this head remarks:

"Almost every form of doctrine is taught. And this not upon minor points the Church herself being judge but upon vital questions of Christianity—upon the conditions of a sinner's acceptance with God—the grounds of his pardon, and upon the elements and constituents of Christian character. Everybody acquainted with the current history of the times is aware of the fierce and exciting warfare that has been carried on in England, for years past, by the Bishops of Exeter and Hereford, and other dignitaries and clergy of the English Church, in which they have resorted to civil law. Have these learned men been contending about trifles or non-essentials, or about doctrines vital to Christianity? They say the latter; so we believe. What unity is here? But come to our own country, and is the condition of things any better? All conversant with them know that it is not. In going to hear an Episcopalian Minister you have no assurance, unless you know the man, whether you will hear Christianity or Churchianity; * * * you may hear the gospel; you may hear a moral essay, or you may hear Popery slightly disguised. You may hear Arminianism; you may hear Calvinism, or you may hear Nothing. You may hear wordly amusements slightly censured, or you may hear it intimated that such strictness and rigidness are puritanical. You may hear that a sensible religious experience is to be sought, or that such notions belong to the 'sects,' and are not to be insisted upon by 'Churchmen.'"

His fourth reason is thus given:

"I cannot be an Episcopalian, for the standards of Christian experience, in this Church, are far too low and indefinite.

"This may always be expected until a higher estimate is placed upon piety, and the attention of the Church and its writers is turned to this subject. The press of the Church abounds with works whose professed object is to lead the dark and doubting in the way of life. Here is 'The Lost Church Found,'—'The Church Identified,'—'The Double Witness of the Church,' etc.,—promising titles, truly; for where 'the Church' is there is the way of salvation. One of these works is now before me. It is one, as I am informed, that an Episcopal Minister, in Mobile, is circulating among Methodists, to aid them to heaven. I open it to learn if I am a child of God, and to learn the way to heaven—and read the following marks of a state of grace, and directions how to be saved: 'Episcopacy proved from Scripture,' 'Antiquity of forms of Prayer,'—'History of our Liturgy,'—'The Church in all Ages the keeper of the Truth,' etc. I looked for bread, for an egg, for a fish, and what do I get? This book was written, as the author boasts in the preface, for the laudable and praiseworthy object of counteracting revivals of religion, and to furnish a substitute for the change of heart found in them; and is therefore to be regarded as inculcating the elements of Christian character as held by 'the Church.' And what are they? More ecclesiastical petrifactions—the fossil remains of Religion, put to death by the bandages of the Church, according to the Fathers. On these things your Churchman is always eloquent—always at home. * * * *

"In what book, under whose ministry, of all who fill the pulpits of the Episcopal Church in this State, will you learn, definitely, what is the evidence that you are a child of God and meet for heaven? Ask this question, and you get the same answer that a Romanist would give you: 'Find the Church.' You can learn the importance of the succession, and how desirable it is that all men should be in our Church, etc., from the veriest tyro; but from whom do you learn the evidences of regeneration? 'Examine yourself,' says St. Paul. 'Look for the Church,' says the High Churchman. * * *

"How frequent, universal, has been the observation, that in recommending their Church, or in conversing upon religion, members of the Episcopal Church dwell upon—'the Church,'—'our beautiful service,'—'the Bishop,'—'confirmation,' etc. etc.;—but seldom can they be induced to converse upon experimental, personal piety."

We cannot give the whole of "Episcopos." The reader must get for himself the pamphlet we are clipping into by way of sampling. The last objection is that—

IX. The Episcopal Church and its teaching, unlike those of Christ and His Apostles, are not the Church and teaching for the poor.

Christianity was designed for the world—for all classes, especially the poor and the ignorant. "Prophets foretold this." Christ dwelt up it. But to these, it must be admitted, that the teachings and forms of this Church have little or no adaptation. Yet the poor and uncultivated make an immense majority in all communities. On this point "Episcopos" does not disguise his sentiments:

"But what has or can this system accomplish among the plain and uneducated people that make up the masses of our country population? What can it do for the millions of our servants? Literally nothing. And its advocates are discreet enough not to expose their weakness by attempting to do much among such a population. And yet we are to believe that this unfortunately appointed, inefficient system, is the only Church! What I charge here is seen and felt by thinking men of their own communion. 'What would the negroes, and poor illiterate whites do, but for the Methodist Church?' said a member of that Church. We repeat what would they do if left to the dry-nursing of the 'true Church?' Need it be said that the Church that has the doctrine, and adaptation, and can do the work of Paul and Peter, is the Church of Paul and Peter? We believe we state what observation and reflection will convince any man is true, when we say that the Episcopal Church is singularly unfortunate and powerless in its position and appliances. Refusing to admit and teach distinctly with the Catholics that there is salvation in mere rites and ceremonies, and dropping out of their system first those genuflexions, manipulations, and solemn nothings, that would captivate the imagination and lead votaries blind, it undertakes, with Protestanism, to inculcate spiritual religion, but retains and burdens it with so many of the appendages of Popery as to displease and repel the great majority from it, especially among plain matter-of-fact people. Its friends see its want of success and power, but, unwilling the see the cause, put it upon the opposition of the 'sects,' or their pre-occupancy of the ground, etc. Whatever their private convictions and fears may be, one thing is certain, that Church seldom or never ventures forward to attack society and sin in their rugged and unsubdued state; but when Methodists and others have gone forward as pioneers—converted almost the wild woodman—corrected and purified their social and domestic relations, and elevated and refined them—when the forest is felled, towns founded, schools opened, and banks established, these heralds come on, tell the people how much they love them, praise the work of others, and request the sheep to—enter their fold! They are a little late—meant to be here sooner—the Methodists have done a fine work—glad they took care of the people—and now they will just trouble them to turn their work over to them, and come into the Church."

Does the reader ask—"Where is this pamphlet to be had?" Don't know. "Who wrote it?" Can't say.

GATHERED TREASURES FROM THE MINES OF LITERATURE: Cincinnati, 1852. Appleton & Co. 8vo. pp. 544.

On turning about and looking into this neatly bound and printed volume the impression made is—"good family book." Every reading member of the family, from the oldest to the youngest, has his share of "treat" in it. It contains sketches, anecdotes, and gems of thought, literary and moral, pleasing and instructive. Those who take snatches of time to read will find something here to fill up every leisure, from two minutes to an hour. The esoteric qualities of the volume will cultivate a taste of reading, and the exoteric will not be unbecoming the parlor table. ☞ For sale by D. J. Allen, at Memphis Book Concern.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

For February, has come, and is true to the rich promise of the advertised CONTENTS.

OUR WIVES AND DAUGHTERS.—In childhood and youth, girls are as healthy, hardy and capable of enduring fatigue as boys, for the very good reason that nature, regarding it equally as necessary to give them good constitutions, has kindly done so; and because they run and romp in the open air, and thus obey the promptings of unsophisticated nature. Yet our men are much more healthy than women, or even young ladies. Take the families of merchants and business men—not the purse proud nabob on the one hand, nor the hardy delver on the other—and how stands the matter? The men are active, industrious, accustomed to a great degree of bodily exertion; they are busy with bales and boxes among draymen and porters; they are driving about the wharves and streets all day, their minds and bodies fully employed, and go home with a keen and well-earned appetite; while their wives and daughters, standing, of course, on the same platform of respectability as themselves, have dragged through the wearisome hours of the day in listless idleness or sedentary pursuits, and approach the table with an appetite that almost spurns the repast which other hands have prepared, and fill their anxious husbands' or fathers' ears with complaints of a thousand ills, which, perhaps, nothing but a summer at the springs or watering-places can assuage. Poor creatures, they have not been properly educated. Fashion would point its contemptuous lips, and toss its brainless head at the idea of useful toil for the wife and daughters of a wealthy merchant? But that same fickle goddess has no objection to the father and son going into the store and laboring all day, rolling barrels, packing and unpacking goods, which, for them, is all very well; but she denies to the daughter any part in household affairs, because it is vulgar and disreputable, and consigns her to the practice of music, drawing, worsted and lace-work. What matters it if the son's hand be hard, his chest and muscles brawny, his face bronzed by the sun and wind, and, with these, firm health; but the daughters must be slim, fragile, pale and delicate, with soft, white hands, to be worthy to rank with the sons of merchants, who are every day employed, just like her brother, with like results. [Parlor Annual.

Economy is a good thing, and should be practiced by all but it should show itself in denying ourselves—not in opposing others. We see persons spending dollar after dollar foolishly one hour, and in the next trying to save a penny piece off a wood sawyer, coal heaver, or market woman. Such things are disgraceful if not dishonest.

Robert Burns, the Ayrshire poet and ploughman, who died neglected and unfriended, is likely in his descendants to mingle with the aristocracy of Britain, we see by our late English files. Major Burns—or Colonel—at present holding a high situation in India, has his patent of nobility made out, and will shortly be gazetted as Baron Ellisland, the name of Burns's farm.

FLORIDA CONFERENCE.

DEAR BROTHER MCTYEIRE:

Our Conference commenced its ninth session, in the beautiful village of Quincy, Fla., on Wednesday, the 26th ult. Bishop Capers was with us in fine health and spirits. Although he is advanced in years, and in labors has been abundant, yet he looks fresh and fair, and manifests a noble example of industry and diligence in business to the younger tribe of itinerants. The preachers were for the most part present, and although they have suffered afflictions in common with the people, not one of our number has fallen during the year.

P. P. Smith was appointed Secretary, and the usual Committees appointed, and entered at once upon their work. The business of our little Conference has increased, at least 100 per cent. since its organization. Would that we could say there had been such an increase in souls converted and added to the Church. Our field of labor is an interesting one. We need more preachers. O that the Lord of the Harvest would send forth more laborers into the vineyard.

John F. Rivers and F. Ellis were admitted on trial, and E. G. Asay, from Philadelphia Conference, re-admitted.

S. A. M'Cook, P. B. Bedford and W. K. Turner, continued on trial.

William Edwards and J. W. Carlton admitted into full connection.

O. B. Standley, J. H. M. Gardner and J. M. Hendry, were elected to Elder's orders.

Ira L. Potter, J. Carraway, F. A. Johnson, Jesse M. Valentine and A. W. Harris, located.

We report members in Society, 5,670 whites; 3,674 colored. Total preachers, 83. Total membership, 9,344. Increase this year, 840. While it is no better in this respect, we rejoice that it is no worse. We report about 50 Sunday Schools, 1123 scholars, 4,750 volumes in libraries, 330 copies Visitor taken, and 206 dollars collected for Sunday Schools. Some resolutions were adopted pledging ourselves to increased efforts in behalf of Sunday Schools. O that these resolutions may be remembered and reduced to practice.

Our educational interests were duly presented and provided for. Fletcher Institute has been in operation four years, and is now well manned for another campaign. It is doing much for this country.

The "East Florida Seminary," located at Micanopy, in East Florida, reports progress in the way of buildings and a suitable outfit, and will be ready for service by October next. We are doing something for the cause of education in the Florida Conference.

A proposition was submitted by the Trustees of these institutions to the preachers of the Conference, to educate their children free of tuition, provided the preachers would subscribe what they could for the support of the Schools, and upon the spot was subscribed, by the preachers, $2,000, to be paid in two equal annual instalments.

Our Missionary Anniversary was held on Saturday evening. Quite a turnout of speakers and hearers—President Myers, from Macon, Ga., our old Florida friend, made us the right sort of a speech, a Florida speech. He remembered when a boy, the Missionaries that traversed Florida, some of whom, with their gray locks, were present. He remembered a sainted mother, who was among the first Methodists in Florida, but now sleeps in the city of Tallahassee. E. G. Asay, of our own Conference, followed with a stirring appeal. Then came Dr. T. O. Summers, with his "Tow Line," (do you know the history of that "Tow Line?") beckoning his partners in Florida to come on. Well, the Doctor is a good hand, any where in the field, or on the water, and our collection was respectable—a little over four hundred dollars was raised. Our collection in the Conference during the year will amount to near $2,400, not what it should be by any means, but we are trying to improve. Storms and sickness in our country have had their effect on all our charitable institutions.

On Sabbath morning Bishop Capers preached us one of his best sermons, followed by the Ordination of two Deacons and four Elders. In the afternoon, President Myers preached. The spirit from above was present, and all felt it "was good to be here." At night Dr. Summers was to preach, but hoarseness prevented, and Bishop Capers preached again—followed by the Administration of the Holy Sacrament. It was a time of power and Great Grace.

On Tuesday, the 1st inst., at 12 o'clock, M., the Conference closed, and the following are the appointments of preachers for this year:

MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE M. E. CHURCH, NORTH.

Our readers are aware that our Northern Brethren not on the plan, and a very good one it is, of itinerating with the anniversary meetings of the Parent Missionary Society. This holding, one year in one place, and another year in another place, disseminates a general and profound feeling and interest on the subject, and gives to various sections an opportunity of vying with each other in liberality. The late anniversary meeting was held in Buffalo, New York.

Preliminary exercises commenced on Sunday, the 24th January. In the morning Rev. Doctor Durbin preached in the Church in Niagara street, and in the afternoon Rev. Bishop Janes preached. In the Seventh Street Church, the Rev. Abel Stevens in the morning, and Doctor Durbin in the evening. On Monday night the anniversary was held, Bishop Janes in the Chair. Addresses were delivered by by Bishop Janes, and Messrs. Stevens and Durbin. The collections during the Sabbath and at the anniversary amounted to $1200. The annual reports exhibit a prosperous condition of the Association in a prosperous state.

The past year $152,000 have been expended. This was the largest sum raised since the disruption of 1844. The Board has determined this year on raising $210,000. The largest sum of this amount was to be appropriated to domestic Missions, while the foreign work had been considerably extended. The Society sustains 120 German Missionaries at home, having charge of 10,000 communicants. Besides this it sustains Missions among the Swedes, Norwegians and Danes, while it expends large sums in sustaining the cause in destitute portions of our own country and among our own people. The foreign work extends to Africa, India, the Chinese Empire, Germany, Oregon, California, South America.

The report states that besides the Missions already established, there have been three new ones projected—one in South France, one in Turkey, and one in India.

State of Contributions.

The Treasurer announces that the Missionary Society is twenty-six thousand dollars in debt. The late United States census shows that the Methodist Church, as a whole, is the wealthiest religious body in the Republic. Instead of a quarter of a million of dollars for Missions at home and abroad, the contributions ought to be double. The following table shows the amounts raised in the several Annual Conferences of the North.

Conferences.	Members.	Probationers.	Amount.
Baltimore	62,371	8,010	$16,3[illegible]

Total	638,530	90,170	152,[illegible]

It will be seen that there are great differences in the comparative contributions of the Conferences; and that the average of the whole Church is only twenty and nine-tenths cents per member.

COLORED PERSONS IN OHIO.—A bill was lately introduced into the Senate of Ohio, which provides that after the 1st of January, 1854, no free negro or mulatto shall be permitted to become a resident of that State. The bill provides severe penalties for any infringement of this prohibition, and, should it become a law, will effectually exclude all colored people who are not domiciled there when it takes effect. This bill further provides that no non-resident colored persons shall be permitted to hold real estate in Ohio.

GERMAN EMIGRATION.—During 1852, there left the ports of Bremen 339 vessels, with 58,551 passengers for the United States; of which number 10,077 came to Baltimore, 29,630 to New York; 18,116 to New Orleans; 1,628 to Philadelphia, and the balance to various other ports.

TESTIMONY OF AN INFIDEL RULED OUT.—The trial of Loring Prince, of Douglass, charged with the manslaughter of John L. Howard, was suddenly terminated at Worcester, Massachusetts, a few days ago, by the ruling out of the dying declaration of the deceased, on the ground that he was an infidel.

MARRIED—On Tuesday evening, 8th inst., by the Rev. S. Lee, Mr. JAMES MACKISON, and Miss EMELINE GOFF.

OBITUARY.

DIED—At Cedar Bluff, Ala., December 9, Mrs. ELIZABETH EARLY, relict of Doctor Joseph J. Early.

She professed religion and joined the M. E. Church in Rome, Ga., about 1839 or '40, and ever after adorned her profession by a walking blameless in all the commandments of the Lord." Yet she was not a bright, bold Christian, but a quiet, timid, unobtrusive disciple, of a doubtful cast of mind. She never seemed, for any length of time, to exult in the assurance of faith, and was at the farthest remove from Pharisaism, always referring to herself in the most humiliating terms.

She expressed a strong desire to live, if it had been the will of God, on account of her children, who were (as she had been) to be left orphans. But as death approached grace was given, and she resigned herself and her children into the hands of God.

We heard her take her final adieu of her weeping children, and give them her dying charge; speak of past experience and present prospects, and whisper her devout and dying prayer into the ear of our gracious Lord.

May He, who is the Father of the fatherless, bless her much loved children and bring them, after lives of usefulness in the world, to reunite with their sainted parents in the abodes of eternal blessedness.

MR. EDITOR: The following extracts are from one of the most judicious and best conducted religious papers in the country, and from different pens. They relate to a subject full of interest in every point of light, regarded as evidence that there is a dissatisfaction with, and a departure from, the frigid and unavailable theology that furnished the staple of pulpit addresses, in New England and adjacent regions, in time past, it may be [illegible] whether this State will prove an onion for good or evil. If in its transition from the [illegible] of the past, the New England mind be brought to substitute a warm evangelism in its place, the change would be glorious indeed. But if, as seems rather to be [illegible] the mere fashionable pulpit amusements and follies of the day are to be issued in a new and ornamented edition, the Church and the world have little to hope. In the meantime these descriptions of the Northern [illegible] in its chrysalis state, may not be [illegible] to other latitudes: A. P. H.

"We have for some time past been inclined to think that there is a tendency among the [illegible]

FRENCH STEAMSHIP PROJECT.—It is stated in commercial circles that the Government had concluded a contract with the Messagries Nationales, in conjunction with M. Levasseur, the great ship owner, for the establishment of a line of steamers to ply between Cherbourg and the ports in North and South America. The company, it is added, have undertaken to supply fifty-three screw-steamers of one thousand horse power each. The different services will, according to the tender of this company, be organized as follows: From Cherbourg to New York, five vessels of one thousand horse power each, the fifth to remain in reserve; departures, twice a month; speed, eleven knots an hour; length of passage, eleven days. From Cherbourg to the Antilles and Mexico, five vessels of five hundred horse power each; departures twice a month; run from Cherbourg to Martinique, fourteen days. From Martinique, branch lines of communications by steamers of two hundred and fifty horse power, to run to Guadaloupe, Vera Cruz, New Orleans, Cuba, St. Domingo, Trinidad, Cayenne, etc. From Cherbourg to the Brazils, three vessels of eight hundred horse power each; departures once a month; run from twenty to twenty-one days. Thence to Gorée on the coast of Africa, and from this station additional vessels of two hundred and fifty horse power to run to Monte-video and Buenos Ayres. In all, seventy-one vessels, giving a total of 14,500 horse power. The company solicits an annual subvention of 10,000 francs per voyage for the New York line, and 12,000 for those of the Antilles and the Brazil, a difference which is necessary from the increased wear and tear of the latter vessels, which would be at sea one hundred and seventy-five days every year, while the former would only be, on an average, one hundred and forty days. The total subvention would therefore be from 16,000,000 f. to 17,000,000 f. a year for twenty years.

FOREIGN SATURDAY REVIEW.—A volume has just been published in London, which attracts considerable attention. It is entitled "Notes and Emendations to the Text of Shakspeare's Plays." Its history is rather curious. Not long since Mr. J. Payne Collier, the editor, purchased for thirty shillings a copy of the third edition of the second folio, 1632. On examination he found it to be full of MS. notes or emendations. These had all the appearance of having been made by a prompter or some person intimately connected with theatres. The greater portion of the emendations touch the text. They vary from the correction of a comma to the insertion of whole lines. They are counted by thousands, and show that this unknown annotator possessed great industry and a striking degree of critical talent. Excellent literrary authority pronounces these emendations and corrections to be the best yet made; they confirm the happiest made by the commentators and elucidate by very simple alterations passages whose obscurity had so far defied the most diligent researches and profound learning to make them plain.

The fire companies of the city and county of Philadelphia, who have towers to their engine houses, have made arrangements to have men stationed in them at all hours of the night, and in case of a fire breaking out in any section of the city or county, they are to give notice by letting off a fire rocket.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

A compound solar microscope has recently been constructed in the city of New York, by Prof. J. Hinds, formerly of Salem, New York, capable of magnifying objects 57,450,000 times.

LYNCHBURG.—On the 15th ult. a negro man named Harry died a few miles west of Martinsville, Texas, at the advanced age of 130 years. Also in the vicinity of the same place, a negro woman aged 113.

A vessel is now loading at Richmond, Va., with coal for Australia. This is the first shipment of the black diamonds of Pennsylvania to that far-off land of golden promise.

OCEANIC ENGINES.—The New York Express says that Captain Ericsson has received orders for about three hundred caloric engines, but it is not aware that he has consented to supply any large number at present.

A TREATY OF PEACE.—It is stated that the violent feud, which has existed since 1822 between the two families of the Hills and Evans, in Kentucky, has been settled the parties having sig ned a treaty of peace. It is stated that by the various last Mas, assassinations, sieges, etc., among them, eight men and boys have been killed, several crippled and maimed for life, and forty-eight children left fatherless.

Massachusetts has provided by law for a regular registration of births, deaths and marriages, and the results, embodying a mass of useful and interesting information, are published annually. An authentic record of this character is very important in a legal point of view, says the Baltimore American, furnishing, as it does, evidence of facts that are sometimes not easily established without it.

A FREIGHT OF WATER.—An immense emigrant ship called the "Caroline Chisholm" is about to sail from Southampton, England, for Australia, with nine hundred young women of good character as emigrants. Mrs. Chisholm, who has taken great interest in the emigration movement, will accompany them. The expectation is, that all these "gentle creatures" will be eagerly sought for in marriage, by industrious and hardy miners, farmers and shopkeepers.

INTERCOURSE TO MEXICO AS A TRADING WITH CUBA.—The Spanish Government, in consideration of the calamities which have recently befallen St. Jago de Cuba, in the shape of earthquake and pestilence, has ordered that articles of food or prime necessity shall be admitted into the port of Santiago free of duty for the period of six months, and that building materials, such as boards, lumber, etc., shall also be admitted free of duty for the period of twelve months.

PITTSBURGH IRON TRADE.—Accounts from Pittsburgh represent the iron trade as highly flourishing and a further enhancement of prices anticipated. The Pittsburgh Gazette says that the stock of Allegheny metal brought down by the late rise is nearly disposed of, the balance on hand being held at an advance, and firm, and that 300 tons St. Charles sold in the early part of the week at $44 per ton, six months. Manufacturers have all advanced the prices on bar iron, and if the present price of pig metal is maintained they will have to make a still further advance on the manufactured article.

TREATY WITH PARAGUAY.—A letter from Buenos Ayres, dated November 22, says the United States corvette Jamestown was still in port, and adds: "The English Minister Extraordinary, Sir Chas. Hotham leaves to-morrow in H. B. M.'s steamer Locust, for Paraguay. The Hon. Mr. Pendleton, American Minister to this confederation, also goes in the same steamer. Senor St. Georges, Minister Extraordinary from the French Government, also leaves at the same time in the French steamer of war Flambart, for the same purpose. They go to make a treaty with the new Republic of Paraguay."

FRAUDS ON THE GOVERNMENT.—The frauds upon the Government in pension claims must be very numerous, for we see it stated in an Illinois paper that Mr. Macon, an agent of the pension office, has recently been investigating certain pension cases, where the bounty of the Government was suspected of having been obtained through fraudulent representations, and that out of ninety pensioners examined by him, some sixty-eight were found not to be entitled to the benefits of the law. The stoppage of those pensions unjustly obtained will be a saving to the Government of near one hundred thousand dollars in the aggregate.

AN EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF WASHINGTON.—A letter from Washington states that Mr. Mills will immediately engage in his preparations for the colossal statue to Washington. He has procured the large open space necessary near the present national monument and is laying out the grounds on an extensive scale. He will have his own foundry, workshops and structures of all kinds. In the progress of his great enterprise, he proposes to connect with it an American school of art, in which he will teach young artists the principles he has himself acquired, for such compensation as they may be able to render him by their services. The head of the horse, in the statue, is to measure twelve feet in length, from the tip of his nose to the tip of his ear.

IMPORTANT DECISION RELATIVE TO BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.—The Cayuga Lodge case, I. O. O. F., some time pending in the Supreme Court of New York, on demurrer, has been decided in favor of the plaintiffs, on all the points involved in the issue. The principal point was, whether the courts will enforce the trust created by the constitutions of the order. The decision of the court sustained the position assumed by Cayuga Lodge, and overrules the demurrers interposed in behalf of the members who withhold the funds contributed for the objects of benevolence and charity. It is therefore an important decision not only to the Order of Odd Fellows, but to the Order of Sons of Temperance, Free Masons, Martha Washington and other charitable societies which are not incorporated. It recognizes their constitutions, and maintains that the courts will enforce the trusts which they create.

PROFITS OF THE AUSTRALIAN GOLD MINES.—We see it stated that the Adelaide (Australia) Mining Company has declared a dividend of 4,150 per cent. The latest advices from London state that speculation continues active in the shares of the Australian Land and Mining Companies. A London letter in the New York Commercial, says: "The price of the Australian Agricultural, on which £25 are paid, is maintained at about £200. The number of these shares is 10,000, and therefore the recent rise in price has been equal to a nominal addition of about two millions and a half sterling to the property of the public. The fact of the company being possessed of 1,000,000 acres of land, of which at least one-third has been ascertained to be more or less auriferous, causes the recent advance to assume a less speculative aspect than would otherwise be the case. Another concern, called the Great Nugent Vein Company, recently started at Sydney, and of which one-third of the shares have been distributed in the London market, has experienced a remarkable reception. The shares are for £2 each, and the portion sent to London were issued at £1 5s. premium, that being the sole condition on which they were to be offered. They were all eagerly applied for, the first by whom they were introduced being a very respectable one, and they are now quoted at £5 premium, which is equal to 250 per cent. The object of the company is to work a vein, of which they have procured a lease from which, at the time of its discovery, a solid lump of upwards of a hundred weight of gold was obtained.

HUNGARY.—Letters from Hungary complain of the insecurity of the country, caused by the numerous bands of men compelled by their outlawed condition—having taken a national part in the late civil war—to live in the forests and mountains and lead a Robin Hood life, at the expense of their neighbors. Courts martial and executions are powerless against this evil, the gendarmes are harassed to despair, and never encounter the outlaws without having to enter upon a combat of life and death. The Austrians imagine that the object of these poor men is to get together merely for a new insurrection, and never seem to think that an honest amnesty, such as would permit the men to quit their wild way of life, might restore them to quiet homes. On the last day of the old year, one of these men was hunged at Pesth. Previous to the execution, he was taken about in a procession for two hours, during which he sang patriotic songs, and displayed a supreme contempt for death. At the foot of the gallows, an officer read a prolix statement of his crimes and sentence. The name of Kossuth occurred in this document, and he no sooner escaped the lips of the officer than the prisoner took off his hat and reverently inclined his head. As the fatal rope was slipped over his head, he gathered up his strength and cried, "Magyars, keep up, we will give it them yet!" and died.

The editors of the New York Post appear to have a great fancy for the new Ericsson caloric engine, spite of the doubting hesitancy of the Scientific American and some others, and in its issue of the 30th ult., puts forth the following test of faith:

Ericsson's Engine.—A Test of Faith.—A friend, from Ohio, who has seen the articles in the Evening Post upon the subject of Ericsson's caloric engine, alludes to the subject as follows, in the course of a recent letter:

"Is it possible that you have been humbugged into the belief that heat can be used twice, or that Ericsson can ever bring his patent to any practical result?"

We answer that we have not been humbugged into the belief that heat can be used twice; nor does Ericsson pretend to use any heat twice, but simply to use all but about thirty per cent. of what he makes once, instead of throwing away three-fifths of it, as is done by the steam engine. In the next place, we have the most implicit confidence in his ability to bring his patent to a practical result, because we have already seen it in successful operation.

The strength of our faith may be judged from the fact that we have contracted with Capt Ericsson to furnish us with a caloric engine, as soon as it can be made, for the use of the Evening Post, and it is already in a state of considerable forwardness. The patterns are prepared by Capt. Ericsson, and the machinery is making by Messrs. Hogg & Delamater. It is to have sufficient power to drive one of Hoe's rotary presses at the rate of 10,000 impressions an hour, and four job-office presses, with a reserve force of two or three horse-power, and yet is to occupy only the space enclosed in a cast iron box six feet square and between five and six feet high. It is to be finished and in operation by the middle of April. If it succeeds, of which of course we have no doubt, we shall feel proud of the distinction which will properly belong to the journal that first avails itself of so important an improvement. If it fails, we mean the world shall know it and the reasons why, if we can ascertain them.

TWO WEEKS LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

Arrival of the Philadelphia.

The United States mail steamship Philadelphia Captain J. S. McKinstry U. S. N. commanding, arrived at our wharves on the 9th, having left Aspinwall on the 2d inst. She brings the Government mails and California dates to the 15th ult., $15,000 in gold dust on freight and one hundred and eighty passengers. The Pacific mail steamship Golden Gate sailed from San Francisco on the 15th ult. with 700 passengers and $1,700,000 in gold dust. The steamships Independence and Whitehall Sailed for San Francisco on the 15th January. The steamships Ohio and Uncle Sam from New York, arrived at Aspinwall on the 30th ult. The health of the Isthmus was considered good. The valleys of the Sacramento and San Joaquin were still flooded; much damage and inconvenience had been sustained by the high water. Flour was very high, being from $34 to $36 per bbl. There was much suffering in the mines, the roads being in places impassable. It is said that $1 per pound had been paid for flour in the mines. Amongst the old residents of California that left, San Francisco on the 15th ult. are Edward F. Beale, Superintendent of Indian Affairs Col. Jack Hays, Wm H. McAllister, John Perroll, Gov. McDougal, H. R. Post and James Hair. It was estimated that the Ohio, Philadelphia and Uncle Sam landed sixteen hundred passengers at Aspinwall for California. The passenger by the Philadelphia reached Panama by the 30th ult. There was no intelligence of the Winfield Scott when the Philadelphia left.

We received only one paper, the Alta California of the 15th, and from it we take the following summary of news.

Since the sailing of the steamers of the 1st inst. the State has furnished but few topics of discussion or interest, aside from the weather in the interior and the consequent suspension of business of all kinds, the scarcity of provisions, the sufferings and embarrassment.

The Legislature met on the 3d inst., but up to the present time have done nothing of moment. The Executive Message and accompanying documents have been referred to committees. But whether the important questions brought before the two Houses will receive further consideration or be adjourned to sleep out the session in committee rooms, remains to be seen. It is probable, however, that after the final settlement of the Capital controversy, they will go to work and do something.

The old project of calling a constitutional convention is once more on the tools. The ostensible object set forth be the Executive in his message is to abolish certain offices created by the constitution; but the real end is the abrogation of the anti-slavery clause and the division of the State. The first, if it came of the accomplishment of any definite object, contemplates the establishment of slavery here—a scheme which all men whose intellects are not clouded by prejudice know to be the wildest and most chimerical that was ever entertained by intelligent men. As for the division of the State, after more than six years' legislation, we can discover no plausible reason for it. The advocates of the measure have never yet shown what was to be gained by it in political or financial point of view. But the business of the session will turn upon the Constitutional Convention which will most probably be called. The intended changes, however, will not be directed when it is called.

The proposed Miners' Convention is engaging the earnest consideration of the people throughout the State, and discussion is bringing about a degree of definite ness and tangibility, in its purposes. It will be a very important body when it comes together, and will leave a permanent impress upon every interest of the commonwealth.

We have dates from Oregon to the 7th inst., but no news of consequence. The affairs of the Territory remain in a quiescent state. The winter there, as here, has been very severe.

The long immunity enjoyed from disasters by steam on this coast, was broken in upon on the 6th, by a Collision between the J. Brigham and Umatilla, in which the latter was sunk and three lives lost.

In our columns will be found a great variety of intelligence from our own coast, from the Islands, the East, etc.

FURTHER NEWS FROM SHASTA AND YREKA.—CONTINUATION OF THAT PREVIOUSLY RECEIVED.—Mr. Tracy, the express messenger of Adams & Co. between Shasta and Sacramento, arrived from the upper country on Thursday evening.

The citizens of Yreka were destitute of nearly all kinds of provisions; and the party which arrived at Shasta from that place were obliged to desert three of their animals in Scott's Valley, having been eighteen days in accomplishing the journey to Shasta. Three of their number were left at Martin's ranch, so badly frozen in the feet and ankles that they could not proceed further. At Verry's they purchased one hundred dollars' worth of provisions, and sent them back to the sufferers, who, like themselves, had subsisted for days on parched barley. Martin's house was deserted, as the roof had fallen in from the immense pressure of snow.

Mr. Tracy reports that a trail had been opened, from Shasta to Weaverville, and that the snow has almost entirely disappeared.

AN INDIAN'S EXPERIENCE.—We have been informed by a gentleman from the second story of a submerged house in Yolo county, that, having recently held communication with one of the aborigines of the country on old chief, he was informed by that worthy that, in a period of seventeen years, there had not been so much snow on the mountains of the water on the plains as at the present time.

From the encampments about Nevada, from Angel's and Murphy's, a number of miners, necessitated by sheer hunger, have crowded into more favored localities, abandoning the modicum of provision left them for the sustenance of the females and the sick; some in attempting to flee the appaling presence of famine, have perished by the way, sinking exhausted from exposition and fatigue into snowy sepulchres; others, more perverse, securing to the lonely shelter of some ranch an escape from impending death. Where it was impossible for the ordinary means to transport food, bands of energetic miners carried upon their backs packages. In some instances of a hundred pounds, of four, distances of sixty and seventy miles. A squad of Chilnamen was observed tramping, in single file, freighted with rice in mats suspended from long bamboos borne upon their shoulders. It is worthy of note, as affording a magnificent refutation of the alleged insubordination of our people, that, notwithstanding these strong incentives, no authenticated disregard for the right of property has come to our knowledge.

Small pox, has prevailed in Calaveras county, on the Consumnes, and in other sections, with some fatality. Mesmporary hospitals have been established, and the sick cared for as well as circumstances permitted.

The propriety of holding a Miners' Convention is being extensively discussed, but the period and place thereof have not been decided upon. The object, discussion of various questions connected with the mineral lands.

Extensive works in the shape of flumes, etc., involving a large outlay of capital, are projected, and will be commenced during the spring.

Further from California, the Sandwich Islands and South America.

The mail, and Wells, Fargo & Co's California Express, have brought us copious files of papers and we find a mass of interesting news. A want of space, however, prevents us giving place to but little of it.

All accounts confirm the reported melancholy state of affairs in most of the mining districts. A letter to the San Francisco Journal says:

There is no doubt about it, if the weather does not clear up the miners will die by the hundred—die of starvation. They have no decent food now, and even the acorns and barley will soon be exhausted. Those who have the means are leaving the mountain regions in detachments of twenty, fifty or one hundred, and shortly they will fill our cities. Three hundred Chinese are expected to-morrow, but the great body of the miners who are dispersed to large the Sierra region is to be expected for fourteen days.

There never was a time since California was first discovered that so much misery has been and is likely to be as this winter of 1852 and 1853. It is a dark picture, and "the end is not yet."

Southwestern gales have prevailed along the coast and at San Francisco, and several boats have been driven out of the bay at the latter place, and lives lost. Three persons were lost in one boat. The pilot boat Sea Witch was lost in the bay, but her crew were saved.

The rains are still doing immense damage throughout the State.

There is nothing new from Monterey. A passenger by the Sea Bird says that the reason they have not experienced another rain-storm in that locality, is because the old storm has not yet abated. People are anxiously waiting for it to "dry up."

The committee appointed at the mass meeting held on the 1st of December, at San Diego to report on the subject of an Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, presented their report on the 14th of the same month. It advocates strongly the route from Red River to San Diego.

Mrs. Dudley has been fully committed, at San Francisco, for trial on the charge of murdering a Mr. Kennedy. She admitted that she inflicted the death wound. She is the mother of ten children—five of them small, and one an infant at the breast.

Mr. Borland and party arrived at Sacramento on the 6th, with the Salt Lake mail. The party experienced great suffering. Six days precious to their arrival at Carson Valley, they were entirely out of provisions, and subsisted on strong coffee, of which they had plenty. At the Valley they stopped a fortnight to recruit themselves and stock. They met a party of about 150 Indians, who fired at them with guns and arrows, but happily without effect.

From the Sandwich Islands.

Dates to the 11th of December from Honolulu had been received at San Francisco. The news, however, is not important.

The American whale ship A. H. Howland was driven on the reef a little eastward of the entrance of Honolulu harbor, on the 7th of December. She was fifteen months out, and had fifty-five barrels sperm on board, and 1000 whale, but had previously shipped her home, amounting to 25,000 pounds. A very large number of whalers were in port and business was brisk.

The American merchant ship Alexander got aground and was sunk in the channel. She was freighted with oil and home and was ready for home.

The Polynesian publishes a list of vessels engaged in the whaling service of the North Pacific, together with an estimate of their success for the past season, the number of men employed and other statistics, useful and interesting, which have been made up from the Custom-house books, by H. M. Whitney. We have only room to glance at the report, and its summings up.

It is shown by the list, that 260 ships have visited the port of Honolulu; 101 the port of Lahaina, and 58 the port of Hilo—300 at all the ports; but as many of these ships touched at all three of the ports, we find that but 275 different ships have touched at the Islands this fall.

Estimating these ships with their outfits at $400,000 each, it is shown that the value of the fleet would be.....$11,000,000 00

543,280 gallons sperm oil, at 80c. p.....434,624 00
13,270,867 gallons whale oil, at 50c. p.....6,640,948 50
5,257,737 lbs. bone at 25c. p.....1,339,434 25

Total value of vessels and cargoes.....$19,414,010 81

In estimating the value of these cargoes, says the Polynesian, it will be seen that we have used figures at least one third less than the actual value of the various products in the home market, which will allow a wide margin for freight and other charges home, losses, commissions, etc.

The number of seamen attached to these 275 ships is probably 12,000, besides masters and mates.

The average value of the past season's catch, to each of the 275 right whalers is $23,636 75.

The national character of these ships is as follows—American 208; French 10; Russian 4; English, Chilean and Hawaiian each 1.

From the facts above brought to view, we are warranted in the conclusion that a more successful whaling season has never crowned that branch of business since the "inexhaustible shores" of Dundee and New Bedford, Nantucket, Fairhaven, New London, etc., commenced operations in bearing for the stealth of the ocean.

From Peru.

The British mail steamer Lima, at Panama brought dates from Callao to the 11th of January.

The guano taken from the Chincha and Lobos Islands during the year 1852, amounted to 225,630 tons; of this quantity England took 67,435 tons; United States 30,640; France 12,188, and Rome 807.

The markets were steady. On the 3d of January two fatal cases of yellow fever were reported.

Later from Chili.

The relations between Chili and Peru are said to be most amicable.

Mr Campbell, the chief engineer on the railroad projected from Valparaiso to Santiago had withdrawn, and the Government had written to the United States for engineers.

The bark Victoria, from Hamburg, landed one hundred German emigrants at Valdivia.

The port of Maroco in the Province of Coquimbo had been opened to foreign commerce.

Letter from San Juan del Norte.

SAN JUAN DEL NORTE, OR GREYTOWN,
February 3, 1853.

The ambiguous position occupied by this would-be Hanseatic town compels those who address their correspondents to place the disjunctive conjunction between a Spanish and English name. The town was first known as "San Juan de Nicaragua," but when the English took possession of it (from the Nicaraguenese) in the name and as the property of Mosquitia, the compliment of Greytown was conferred upon it, in honor of Sir Charles Grey, former Governor of Jamaica. When the travel to California, by this route, commenced, the town began to increase in population and importance and soon became sprinkled with progressive Americans, with whom it soon grew a vexed question whether the town, which they had built up, should, by its appellative, recognize Nicaragua or Mosquitia or, discarding both, assume a name of its own; the result, as far as regards the name, was "San Juan del Norte, or Greytown"—so with the Constitution, by which, at present the local government exists. Many here, as elsewhere, think that much is in a name; others contend it not emphatically that a certain flower well known in history "by any other name would smell as sweet."

We hope that when another great speech is made on Central America Monroe doctrine, etc., something may be said about a spot where our countrymen are living without knowing whether they are fish, flesh or fowl, and are anxiously waiting to hear what Congress intends doing about the Webster and Crampton treaty. In that treaty the town of San Juan was ceded to Nicaragua, on certain conditions, which conditions, because of their implying a right in Mosquitia, Nicaragua kicked at, and contending that her Minister, or Representative, Mr. Marcoleta, had not been allowed a voice in the proceedings refused the treaty en toto.

The English Commissioner, who carried one end of the treaty, took the thing very mildly; the American Commissioner, (et Hayti nobilibity,) who carried Dother end, became quite wrathy, and talked in the "54:40 or fight" strain; the Englishman said that he had no instructions to whip Nicaragua. In the event of her kicking, and so the matter ended. Since then, we've heard nothing, except Mr. Everett's polite intimation to Mr. Marcoleta that his company was not desired.

The election in Nicaragua has resulted in favor of Don Fruto Chamorro for President—his opponent was Castillon, the present Secretary of Foreign Relations; the votes are to be counted in the latter part of February, but the result is already known. Chamorro is of the Government party; Castillon, though for some time in the Cabinet, is of the Liberal party—his party declined voting, so that it was a one-sided affair, out of which, however, it is said by the knowing ones, his party intend to make capital for the supposed approaching revolution.

In March next, the new President will be installed, and then, it is thought, the ball will open. A vessel arrived here a short time since, from New York with a large quantity of powder "for the interior." This looks ominous, and you may expect to hear of the "big wars that make ambition virtue." The result will be as usual:

Wounded	00,000
Killed	0,000
Slightly frightened	1450
Badly scared	1,400

COFFEE....By Miss Mary L. Lawson.

All hail the praise of ruby wine,
Through crystal goblets flowing,
And nectar of the purple vine
'Mid endless summer glowing;
How well it charms, the heart it warms,
The soul in ruralize steeping,
As beauty, mirth, and hope's bright birth
Lay chained within its keeping.

But wherefore gild the tempting draught,
Which stains the lip that praises?
A nectar far more pure and sweet
The wearied spirit raises:
'Twill linger with you right cheerily the truest night,
Like some divine libation;
Joy fills the eyes, and hearts beat high
Beneath its inspiration.

It ripples through the silver spoon,
In clear, transparent china,
Brought freshly from the sparkling hearth
By Phillis or by Dinah.
How rich the scent when softly blent
With cream, rich, thick and yellow,
Whose currents glide in mingled tide
Its pungent strength to mellow!

It stirs the flash of soul and sense,
Till wit and converse mingle;
For mind's best rays, like sorrow's waves,
We're rash to meet in single;
Bright flashes strike on minds alike,
That fade not with the fleeting,
For words that thrill grow deeper still
When glances with glance is meeting.

It wakes within the melting soul
Time's lost or buried pleasures,
Old friends, old books, old songs, old joys,
And all life's garnered treasures;
Spell of pain, 'twill softly gain
Old memory's haunted places,
While o'er us rise in angel guise,
Soft smiles on vanished faces.

As one by one our guests depart,
Left with remembrance only,
We scarcely sigh that time flits by,
And leaves us sad and lonely;
Hope's morning breaks and joy awakes,
Life's gloomy page to brighten,
As on our quiet, silent hearth
The dying embers lighten.

Then on the pillow softly sinks
The head with visions teeming,
And many an Eastern pageant floats
Before our gorgeous dreaming;
To see life pass in fancy's glass,
With moon-light radiance beaming,
It seeks the breast divinely blest
Through misty Mocha gleaming.

ANNIE GREEN'S WISH.

A SHORT STORY FOR THE LADIES.

I wish I was thin," said Annie Green, with a sigh, as she gazed upon the bright fire which blazed in the cheerful grate before her, a few nights after New Year's day. She had just returned from a private party which had been given at the house of a female friend, and was turning over in her mind what she had heard and seen, previous to retiring for the night. She was a fine, healthy looking girl, about twenty years of age, and possessed a physical organization with which one would suppose she should have felt perfectly contented. She was about the middle height, well built, and carried about with her no more flesh than was actually necessary to good looks, while the bright hue of health enlivened her countenance when she was disposed to feel merry, and all sensible men admitted that she was really a pretty girl. But, although nature had dealt very fairly by her in a physical point of view, she possessed, mentally, one very serious fault, which was a disposition not only to take exceptions to the form which God, in his infinite wisdom, had given her, but to wish for things that it was morally certain she could never obtain. This rendered her very unhappy, and although she had every reason to consider herself blessed, she felt at times utterly miserable. "I do wish I was thin!" she exclaimed, as she regarded her white, well moulded arms, discontentedly. "If I could only be like Nancy Verisopht now! What a crowd of admirers she had around her to-night, to be sure! And no wonder at it! she's so tall, and delicate, and thin! Why, I can span around her waist, and she looks as though a strong gust of wind would blow her away! How I did envy her when that tall gentleman with the black moustache, Mr. Znesickly, who they say is the son of a Russian Count, sealed himself beside her, and declared that she was the most interesting creature he had ever seen in his life! But he wasn't the only one—there was scarcely a gentleman in the room who was not crazy to get near her! That plain, matter-of-fact, common-sense old curmudgeon, Mr. Blunt, remarked in my hearing, that Mr. Znesioky and all the rest of them would have thought her quite as interesting had she been as fat as a market-woman and homely as a stone fence, so long as her father was worth a fortune, but I don't believe a word of it. I haven't the slightest doubt they would all think just as much of her if she hadn't a penny! How happy she ought to be in the possession of so many admirers! She can do just as she pleases with them! She flirts with this one, smiles that one, and looks cross at the other one with the most perfect impunity, and I'm sure that many of her adorers would get tired of trying to get into her good graces, if it was not that she is so very, very interesting. There's that tall, good-looking fellow, Mr. Hawk, now—I don't see how he can endure the many absolute affronts and pointed repulses he meets with at her hands! Why, she actually had the hardihood to-night to intimate to him that his absence was better than his company, and he didn't seem to mind it any more than though the remark had been a complimentary instead of an insulting one! But I suppose the secret is to be found in his great love for her!"

"Such men as Mr. Hawk will endure a great deal for money," said a voice which seemed to proceed from the grate in front of her; "Miss Verisopht has the game in her own hands now, and can do as she chooses, but it won't always be so!"

At the unexpected equad of another voice than her own Annie was startled, and for a moment she did not know but she was about to become a medium for spiritual manifestations. She soon recovered her self-possession, however, and looking steadily into the fire, she at length perceived a most singular looking little individual seated upon the top of a piece of coke which had not yet ignited. He was not larger than a man's thumb, he had an immense pair of bushy whiskers around his comical little phiz, his eyes seemed like two rubies, his nose was acquiline, his hair looked like threads of gold, as it glistened in the fire-light, his mouth was stretched from ear to ear in a broad grin, and as he sat there swinging his legs and looking merrily at her, she thought he was one of the funniest characters she had ever looked upon. Her fears vanished instantly, and gazing in the intruder's face, she said, good humoredly,

"Why, what do you know about Miss Verisopht or Mr. Hawk either?"

"I know all about them," was the answer. "The first has money but no brains, while the latter has neither the one nor the other, and is a hollow-hearted fop."

"Hey-dey," exclaimed Annie, lifting up her hands in surprise. "Be careful what you say, or you will be called upon to answer a charge of defamation of character. Who are you, any how?"

"My name is Common Sense," answered the little man, "and I am one of the guardian spirits of the old curmudgeon, Mr. Blunt, to whom you are short time since allnded."

"And do you intend to say," questioned Annie, "that Miss Verisopht is not interesting?"

"Not quite so interesting as her money," was the laconic answer.

"And do you doubt for a moment," again asked Annie, "that Mr. Znesickly and Mr. Hawk are desperately in love with her?"

"Yes," answered the little man, "for I know that they are not capable of loving anybody or anything but themselves."

"Well, I don't believe it," answered Annie, "and I wish I was as thin as she is, at all events."

"That's a wicked wish," said the little man, with a frown, "and you had best recall it."

"Indeed, I shall do no such thing," answered Annie; "and what's more, I shall take to starving myself, and eating chalk, and drinking vinegar, to see if I can't reduce myself."

"Self-destruction is a horrible crime," said the little man; kicking, in his anger, a piece of the coke upon which he was sitting, "and I command you to drive such thoughts from your mind."

"And I tell you I shall do just as I please," said Annie, with some asperity. "Do you suppose I am to be ruled by you?"

"Listen to me, Annie, said the monitor, with a serious look. "You are now in the enjoyment of good health, loved by your parents, respected by your acquaintances, and better looking than the great majority of womankind. Can you not rest satisfied then?"

"No," answered the young girl, pettishly. "I am determined to be thinner."

"Is that your settled determination?" asked the monitor.

"It is," was the laconic and decisive reply.

"Would you like to exchange persons and destinies in life with Miss Verisopht?" was the next question.

"Of all things in the world!" cried Annie, joyfully.

"Then you shall have your wish," said the monitor. "But I would advise you to think of the matter again, for the exchange must hold good forever."

"That's just what I want," said Annie. "I should not wish, after revelling in all the delights which she enjoys, to be brought back to the cold realities of my present state."

"Shut your eyes," said the monitor.

Annie did so.

"The change is effected!" cried the little man, and on opening her eyes she found herself in a brilliantly lighted room, surrounded by a number of gaudily dressed ladies and gentlemen, among whom shone conspicuously the Russian Count's son and Mr. Hawk, the latter of whom approached her, and timidly asked permission to dance with her the next quadrille. She was about to answer, when Mr. Znesickly, looking daggers at his rival, came up and said that the lady was already engaged for the next set. Annie felt mightily tickled at the idea of having two such distinguished personages quarreling about her, and chuckling to herself, she observed—

"We shall see whether I shall not enjoy myself better than I did before."

As she said this, a short, dry cough broke from her, and at the same time she noticed that an annoying, dull pain had settled in her left side, extending to the shoulder blade. She did not mind this much at first, for she felt compensated when she caught sight of her fragile form in one of her brilliant mirrors; but as the night wore on the cough became worse. She experienced a choking sensation, great difficulty in breathing, and at length she became so ill that she was obliged to request the Russian's Count's son to have her carriage called, when she took her way home.

She was soon in bed, indulging, as well as the pain which she suffered would permit, in the collection of the many extravagant speeches which had been whispered in her ear by Messrs. Hawk and Znesickly, who had both sworn eternal fidelity to her, and had assured her that she was made up of every thing but thomaterial that compose a real woman—they had told her that her eyes were twin stars; her hair, threads of gold; her neck, alabaster; her teeth, pearls; her gums, coral; her breath, perfume from Arabia; her form, a sylph's; her step, a fawn's; and her whole being, an angels's; either one of them would have died for her on the spot: they didn't entertain the slightest selfish feeling in the matter—each was ready to kill the other, and both seemed willing to eat her up bodily, in the extacy of their love. So far, so good—but Annie began to feel such severe pains shoot through her frame, that when she attempted to close her eyes in sleep she found it impossible to do so, and she lay tossing from side to side till morning, when she was so unwell that her father was obliged to send for a physician. By the time the man of medicines arrived, Miss Green, from coughing severely, had bursted a blood vessel, and the crimson tide was fast flowing from her mouth and nostrils. She heard the doctor tell her father that she could not live an hour—she listened to her parent's sobs of agony as he bent over her form, and she shuddered as her ear caught the sound of his retreating footsteps, as he left the appartment to seek for other aid, for she feared that she should never see him again. Now the sound of familiar voices fell upon her ear, and looking up she sees Hawk and Znesickly at her bed-side. They seem to be in quite a merry mood and not at all angry at each other.

"The game is up!" remarks Znesickly, "she's going to die, and we can't either of us get her!"

"Well, it isn't much of a loss after all," returns Hawk, for she wasn't more than half a woman, at best—a mere human machine—a toy—a doll-baby—and I don't know but what she would have been dear with all the old gentleman's money thrown in!"

"I agree with you," Znesickly, "I would have married her, but I should'n't have thought I had much of a bargain. Such a girl as that Miss Green, now, would be a prize, even though she had no money, if a fellow was looking for a wife alone, without regard to fortune."

The poor girl found her strength fast giving way—cold drops of perspiration stood upon her forehead—her respiration became difficult—remorse was knawing at her heart—the folly of the part she had acted came vividly to her mind—and when she felt that she was indeed dying, she admitted in the bitterness of spirit that the little monitor was right, and she prayed—O, how fervently!—that, as she could not live, she might be allowed to die as Annie Green and not as Miss Verisopht. "Let me but be myself again," she exclaimed, "if only for a moment; let me recall this wicked, wicked wish I made, and then I can die happy!"

"Why, Annie! why are you making such terrible faces and each a horrid noise?" exclaimed her sister, at the same time shaking her, "do wake up and come to bed."

"Thank God!" exclaimed Annie, as she bounded from her chair, "dear, dear, what a horrid, horrid dream!"

LADY VS. WIFE.—The editor of the Providence Journal, who is considerable of an arbiter elegantiarum, which means a man of taste, says thie:

"We wish the democratic papers would call Mrs. Pierce the wife of the President elect, instead of his lady. They are legally married, and she is entitled to the name of wife. Besides, it shocks all our ideas of morality to hear it said that the President elect of the United States is traveling around so much with any other woman than his wife. If any of the democratic papers labor under the impression that the title of wife is not grand enough, we can assure them that Blackwood's Magazine, which is high aristocratic authority, has fully endorsed it in a long and excellent article, the text of which was taken from a paragraph in this paper.

"An anecdote is told of a Scotch shopkeeper who declined some request made by a customer. 'Do you know,' said the customer, 'that I am the Bishop's lady?' 'Hoot, woman,' was the answer, 'I would not do it if ye was his wife, much less his leddy.' Lady is a beautiful word in its place, and female is a proper word in its place, but either of them employed for wife or woman is in shocking taste."

This is all very well, except the charging of a vulgarism, which is common to our whole society, upon the democratic papers, which are no more guilty in the premises than the whig papers, and every record of arrivals at the hotels in the nation. Names are always entered thus: "Mr. Smith and lady," or "Mr. Peter Popkins and ledy," when, if any body should say "Jones and woman," or "Mr. Peter Popkins and woman," Jones and Popkins would be turned incontinently out of doors. The practice, however, is convenient for young gentlemen who travel with ladies that are not wives. [NewYork Post.

HAVE WE A BOURBON AMONGST US?—There is an article in the last number of Putnam's Magazine, written by Rev John H. Hanson, a clergyman of worth, and transmitted to Mr. Putnam by Rev. Dr. Hawks, going to show that we have a Bourbon of the royal line of France living unknown amongst us. Dr. H. bears testimony to the high character of the author, and also to the reputation for truth and piety maintained by the person who is the main subject of the article. The object of this strange article is to furnish evidence that Louis XVII., son of Louis XVI., King of France, and of Marie Antoinette, of Austria, did not die in prison in 1795, as was reported to the French Convention, but is still alive and in the State of New York, in the person of Rev Mr Williams, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who has labored chiefly as a missionary among the Indians, and been generally regarded as a half-breed, in no other than Louis XVII. A mass of strong circumstantial evidence is furnished—evidence so connected, and simply consistent, that it seems conclusive to show the fate of Louis the Seventeenth, and that the Dauphin was secretly conveyed from prison to this country, and placed among the Indians in the northern part of New York.

"A French gentleman died at New Orleans in 1846, named Boulanger, who confessed on his death-bed that he was the person who brought the Dauphin to this country. When the Prince de Joinville visited this country in 1841, he sought out Mr. Williams, and after demanding a conditional pledge of secrecy from him, told him he was Louis XVII, and asked him to sign a resignation of his title to the Crown of France in favor of Louis Philippe. This statement Mr. Williams asserts to be true; and, also, that not only did the Prince de Joinville afterwards correspond with him through his secretaries, but that Louis Philippe wrote to him (Mr. Williams) with his own hand, after the Prince's return. Louis Philippe knew the Dauphin was alive, and the name of the Dauphin was omitted from the solemnities for the departed Dourbons during Louis Philippe's reign. Another piece of strong evidence is a statement that the French Embassador Genet, while in this country in 1848, acknowledged in the presence of Dr. Francis, and other gentlemen of this city, that the Dauphin was not dead, but was brought to America. As the Prince de Joinville, and other parties referred to in the article, are still alive, there can be no suspicion of an attempt at deception, unless it be on the part of Mr Williams; and Dr Hawks says all the precedents of his character are antagonistic to this idea. Mr Williams has not been the active agent in bringing the facts before the public."

A young man in Boston has brought suit against the proprietor of a gambling house in that city, to recover $2500, which he lost at various times in play at his establishment.

Congressional.

WASHINGTON, January 22.

SENATE.—On motion of Mr. Mangum, it was ordered that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn till Monday next—it being stated that Mr. Pearce, who was to have spoken on Saturday on the Texas debt bill, was too indisposed to come to the Senate for several days.

The chair laid before the Senate a message from the President declining to transmit certain correspondence relative to treaties with Nicaragua, as negotiations on the subject have not yet terminated.

Mr. Rusk, from the Select Committee to whom was referred various projects for railroads to the Pacific, reported a substitute for them all, which was ordered to be printed.

The private calendar, to which there were no objections, was taken up. The following bills passed: For the relief of Rutiff Van Brunt; for the relief of the captors of the frigate Philadelphia; House bill for the relief of M. K. Simons; bill for the relief of Jacob Sidenr; bill for the relief of Boynton & Seymour; bill for the relief of heirs of Jeremiah Wingate.

The Senate then adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—It was proposed to take up the Senate bill abolishing imprisonment for debt in the District of Columbia, but it was objected to; and Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, gave notice that he should move, on Monday, to consider the bill, as there exists the greatest instance of hardship under the present law which can be imagined.

It being private bill day, the House went into Committee of the Whole on private claims, to which there was no objections; several of which were disposed of.

The committee rose, and the bills which were recommended were read a third time and passed. Repeated motions were made to adjourn and failed.

The House twice refused to adjourn over till Monday.

Considerable time was occupied with a motion to lay on the table the report of a Committee of Conference, on a bill extending the time for receiving half-pay and pensions; pending which a motion prevailed that the House adjourn. Adjourned till to-morrow.

WASHINGTON, Monday, January 29, 1853.

SENATE.—The Senate was not in session to-day.

HOUSE.—A bill was read a third time and passed, to enable Brigadier General Riley to settle his accounts.

The motion to lay on the table the report of the Committee on Pensions, which came up from yesterday, was negatived—yeas 29, nays 129 and the report was received.

A discussion which occupied nearly an hour followed, on the motion of Mr. McNair, of Pennsylvania, that the Speaker reappoint the select committee on the foundation of the capitol, to enable the committee of last session to report, which they had not then an opportunity of doing; which was laid on the table.

The House then went again into committee on private claims, and were occupied for some time with two bills, of no public importance; one of which was carried, and the other retaining duties paid on the importation of a machine for generating gas, by the Philadelphia Gas Company, which was recommended to be laid on the table.

The committee then rose and the House adjourned.

WASHINGTON ITEMS.—Washington, January 28.—It is understood that Mr. Houston, Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in the House, is about to report an important bill regulating the coinage.

The testimony before the Commissioner of Patents on the application for an extension of the India Rubber and Sulphur patents, establishes the fact that they were in common use by the trade, ten years before the patents were granted.

Dr. Kane, U. S. N., lectured upon his proposed Arctic expedition to-night, at the Smithsonian Institution, before a crowded and intelligent audience.

At a meeting of democratic citizens, members of Congress and others, held at the United States Hotel this morning, B. B. French presiding, it was decided not to hold the customary Inauguration ball, 4th March, in consequence of the domestic affliction of the President, and the continued illness of the Vice President. Arrangements will, however, be made by the citizens to give President Pierce a becoming reception.

Wm. B. Lesser, recently indicted for murder, was dismissed from his clerkship in the Sixth Auditor's office, shortly afterward.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.—Monday, January 31, 1853.—Sidney G. Fisher, Esq., of Pennsylvania, and Joseph J. Merrick, Esq., of Maryland, were admitted attorneys and counsellors in this court.

No. 5. Exparte; In re, Thomas Kane, an alleged fugitive from justice from Great Britain. Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of himself and three of the other Judges, and Mr. Justice Curtis delivered his own opinion, denying the writs of habeas corpus et certiorari, and dismissing the petition.

No. 50. John F. Smith, administrator, et al, plaintiffs in error, vs. J. B. H. Smith, administrator, etc. The argument of this cause was concluded by Mr. Beverdy Johnson for the plaintiffs in error.

Adjourned until to-morrow at 11 o'clock A. M.

From Texas.

By the arrival of the steamship Louisiana, Capt. Smith, we have dates from Galveston to the 4th instant, and our exchanges from the interior.

MORE KILLING.—The Galveston News, of the 4th inst., says: We regret to learn that another of those disgraceful occurrences that have become of late quite too common, not only in Texas, but in other and older States, took place on the 1st of February, on the Washington road, two miles from Houston. Mr Butler, a peaceable and worthy young man, recently married, was shot dead in open daylight by a man of the name of Hyde.

It appears that there was previously some slight misunderstanding between the parties, and that Mr. Butler was engaged in repairing a fence, when one of the Hydes approached and addressed him in insulting language, of which Mr. Butler took but little notice; proceeding with his work, a brother of Hyde's approached with a pistol, and discharged the fatal shot, causing the death of Mr. Butler before medical aid could be procured.

We learn that Mr. Butler was a young man in humble life, but possessed an excellent reputation for amiability and moral worth. Hyde immediately escaped, and had not, at last accounts, been taken, though vigilantly pursued by the civil authorities.

The frequency of occurrences of a character similar to the above, in our State, is a matter of serious regret to every patriot and philanthropist. The practice, which is quite too common, of carrying deadly weapons, is one which cannot be too strongly reprobated.

Would it not be well for the Legislature to pass stringent laws prohibitory of the practice?

ACCIDENT.—A son of Mr. David Trainer, of Cibolo creek, Bexar county, was lately shot while hunting with his brother. The ball passed through the right chest, but he is doing well and will doubtless recover.

ACCIDENTALLY KILLED.—The Marshall Republican regrets to learn that Mr. David Fisher, of Harrison county, fell from his wagon near Shreveport, and striking his breast upon some part of the wagon terminated his existence. He leaves a large family to mourn his death.

The following synopsis of the proceedings of the Texas Legislature we find in the News:

By several gentlemen direct from Austin, having left that city on Sunday, we have news as late as to Saturday night last. The apportionment bill has passed both Houses, and was sent to the Governor for his approval or his veto. We understand it does not differ materially from the bill of last session.

A joint resolution had passed both Houses, fixing the adjournment of the Legislature on Monday next.

The bill for the payment of the Rangers called out by Governor Bell, had either passed, or was expected to pass, without much opposition.

Whether the bill will pass referring to the people the question for the amendment of the constitution is a matter of much doubt.

A bill for the repeal of the previous laws in relation to Peter's colony, had passed the Senate by the casting vote of the President; but it is said it could not pass the lower House.

Another bill was before the lower House, intended to secure the rights of the settlers in Peter's colony.

It is thought that a bill in relation to the public school system would pass. We cannot learn definitely its provisions.

Most of the railroad companies previously chartered are represented in Austin by agents applying for additional donations of land or loans of money or State credit. Their success is very questionable. Col. R. H. Payne, in behalf of the Opelousas Railroad Company, made a very eloquent and able speech in the Legislative Hall. We understand that he named several Southern members to Congress, including one or two from Texas, who had supported the Mortgage railroad to the Pacific from St. Louis. He urged that the South should make common cause in constructing a Southern Pacific railroad, as a measure of vital importance to our future prosperity. He represented that the Opelousas railroad was the commencement of this great enterprise, which would certainly be pushed forward to the shores of the Pacific, provided this State would give adequate encouragement. But he stated expressly that he was not instructed by the company to say that the road could never be extended into Texas with anything less than twenty sections of land to the mile donated by the State. This amount, we are informed, is also asked for by other companies.

We learn that the Harrisburg railroad company has been placed on an equal footing with other companies, as regards the donation of land by the State.

NEWS BY TELEGRAPH.

WASHINGTON AFFAIRS.—Washington, Jan. 31.—The consideration of the Texas Debt Bill is postponed in consequence of the illness of Senator Pearce, but will be taken up as soon as he is able to attend, on account of its importance, as involving the public faith of the State. It is also desirable to dispose of it before the next Administration comes in. Mr. Pearce has prepared a legal argument, which is said to be irrefragible, in favor of the eight million proposition.

Mr. Badger's confirmation is understood to depend on two unsettled votes.

The remaining eighty-four bricklayers and laborers were dismissed from the Capitol extension to-day, leaving no workmen employed except the marble cutters.

THE KANE EXPEDITION CASE.—Washington, Jan. 31.—The Judges of the Supreme bench to-day were equally divided as to the jurisdiction of the court in the case of Kaine, and the prisoner must remain in duress until action be taken de novo on the merits, or until the writ be altered on a tuture motion of the prisoner; so that the case must again come before the New York Court.

Justice Nelson's opinion was a very able and important one, and fully endorsed the arguments of Kaine's counsel. It occupied an hour in delivery. Justice Catron held directly opposite, and in a very elaborate opinion pronounced the arguments of Kaine's counsel untenable.

ARRIVAL OF THE CITY OF GLASGOW.—Vessel Sunk, etc.—Philadelphia, Jan. 31.—The steamer City of Glasgow arrived this morning, with Liverpool dates of the 7th inst.

The brig H. C. Pratt, which arrived from Bordeaux on Thursday, sprung a leak last night, from damage by ice, and sunk at Almond street wharf.

Levin Williams has been committed for the murder of Christopher Loobar.

DISCHARGE OF NEAL.—Philadelphia, Jan. 31.—Richard Neal, the negro man charged with enticing slaves from Anne Arundel county, Md., was this morning discharged from custody by the Supreme Court, the agent of Maryland not being in attendance.

[The agent for the State of Maryland, Mr. John Lamb, was so badly beaten by the negroes at Chester that he could not attend, having gone home by the advice of his physicians.—Reporter.]

The fire companies of the city and county of Philadelphia, who have towers to their engine houses, have made arrangements to have men stationed in them at all hours of the night, and in case of a fire breaking out in any section of the city or county, they are to give notice by letting off a fire rocket.

A grand temperance demonstration took place in Trenton, N. J., on the 27th ult. A procession numbering seven hundred persons marched to the State Capitol, and presented a petition for a prohibitory liquor law, containing fifty thousand signers, which was fourteen hundred feet long.

THE MYSTERIOUS GRAIN OPERATIONS.—During the past season much astonishment was created in the corn market by the purchase on the continent of many cargoes of grain, which were imported and sold at a price less than the cost. It was immediately surmised that such transactions could only be carried on for political objects.

At one time it was rumored that they had been undertaken by the protectionist party, with a view of depressing the wheat market at the time of the elections, so as to increase the dislike of the agriculturist to free trade; but this met with little credence, and another equally unlikely surmise was offered, to the effect that they had been conducted by the French Government, to lessen the English demand for French flour, and thus to keep prices in that country down to a point that would insure popular contentment during the arrangement for bringing about a declaration of the Empire. The general calculations were that the sum lost by the operation was not less than £100,000. It now transpires that a grain merchant named Preds, had been engaged in forgery to an incredible extent, and it is expected that the investigation into his affairs will show that these cargoes were purchased by him, and forced into the market at any sacrifice, to meet his forged engagements as they fell due. Being discovered at last, he fled, but was retaken and is now in custody. By Preis' forgeries the respectable house of Collmann & Stolterfoht, of Liverpool, have been obliged to declare themselves bankrupt, with liabilities amounting to £300,000. Two other houses suffered to the extent respectively of £9,000 and £18,000. Messrs. Collmann & Stolterfoht transacted a large commission business with Germany and the United States, and it is feared their fall may prove serious to parties they were connected with, both in London and Liverpool, as well as abroad.

FREEDOM IN RUSSIA.—Two new ukases from St. Petersburg exhibit the Czar stooping to particularize and apply his system of repressing intelligence, of whatever kind, in whatever shape. According to one of these none but natives can be preachers or school-masters in Poland. Music-masters, teachers of languages, tutors, governesses, where they are permitted at all, will be so under the title of domestics. The second decree orders that, besides the censorship, to which every literary work intended for publication in Russia is subjected before printing, a second examination by the censors shall take place between the printing and the publication.

On the 22d ult., Randous Krotinus, the smuggler, condemned to receive nine thousand blows with a rod, and three other delinquents, condemned to six thousand each, suffered their punishment on the plain of Tauroffen. A large military force was called up to witness the execution. The arrangement was that the punishment should be distributed to each in three thousand strokes a day. Krotinus having received his three thousand, died; two of the others expired before that number of blows had been inflicted; and the fourth sank on the morrow. The punishment of death is abolished in Russia.

LONDON POST OFFICE.—It seems that in two years £18,870 10s. 3d., including bank notes, was found in letters returned to the dead letter office, and £1,226,282 18s. 1d. in bills, checks, money orders, etc., nearly the whole of which, including the money, was delivered to the writers of the letters. It is stated that no letters are forfeited. If all methods taken to effect the delivery of letters fail, they are brought back opened, and returned to the writers. Letters refused by the writers, and those for which no owner can be found, are destroyed, for the want of space to preserve them. Letters containing cash are never destroyed, but the amount, when the writer cannot be found, is paid into the revenue at the expiration of three years. A registry and index are kept of the letters and their contents, which are restored to any claimants proving themselves to be entitled to them. Dead letters containing bills and property other than money are kept three years. At the expiration of that period they are destroyed, and the property is sent to an auctioneer and sold by public auction. The proceeds are paid to the account of the revenue.

HOW THE APPROACH OF AN EARTHQUAKE MAY BE KNOWN. The recent and frequent occurrences of earthquakes have thrown around these terrific natural phenomena an immediate and personal interest. Hitherto no means have been pointed out for indicating the approach of an earthquake, as we, by means of a barometer, derive indication of the approach of a storm. This desideratum, says the New York Commercial Advertiser, would, however, now appear to have been supplied. M. Ratt-Menton, a gentleman connected with the French diplomatic corps in the Argentine Republic, has recently communicated to the Paris Academy of Sciences, by letter, addressed to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, a sure means of learning the approach of an earthquake. According to this gentlemen, the earthquake indicator is nothing more than a magnet, to which is suspended by magnetic attraction a little fragment of iron. Shortly before the occurrence of an earthquake, the magnet temporarily loses its power, and hence the iron falls. According to M. Ratt-Menton, the accuracy of this indicative sign has been thoroughly tested by a highly educated Argentine officer, Col. Espinosa, during a residence of many years at Ariquipa—a region where earthquakes are very frequent. Independently of the authority of the communicator, and from its being published in the transactions of the French Academy of Sciences, the result is nothing more than might have been suspected, from the theoretical considerations of the alliance between electricity and magnetism. A disturbance of electric power has long been known to be associated with earthquakes.

A NEW KIND OF MANURE.—In the Island of St. Vincent a new kind of earth has been discovered, of very peculiar properties, and, withal, so valuable that it is likely to become, at no distant day, an important and regular article of exportation. Little less than two thousand tons have been taken to Deronda, to assist in the formation of a breakwater that is being erected by the Government there. They claim that it is an excellent cement for use under water. Besides, it is said that English chemists have analyzed it, and pronounce it to be more valuable than guano even, as a manure.

LIBERIA EMIGRATION.—In the House of Representatives, on Thursday week, Mr. Stanly, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit with the several States, the fourth instalment of the surplus revenue, directed by the act of June, 1836. This bill proposes, also, to distribute $9,367,214, to be applied to the transportation of the free blacks in several States to Liberal, education, etc. The committee directed it to be reported with a recommendation that it do not pass; and the House laid it upon the table—yeas 105; nays 60.

ITS EFFECT.—The effect of the Ericsson hot-air ship must and will lead to some singular revolutions. It will annihilate explosions, injure the business of coroners, drive wooden legs out of the market, and give a buoyancy to ship building such as it has not felt since Alexander crossed the Hellespont in a one-horse wagon.

Hot-air engines will give an immense impetus to cylinder building, but will knock boiler shops into a cocked hat. Steam gauges will be at a discount, while engineers will be relieved from men of the first consequence to mere greasers. [Baltimore Clipper.

A WEALTHY EMBASSADOR.—Veli-Pacha, the new Turkish ambassador in Paris, is only thirty years of age, and is so immensely rich as to be called the Mussulman Rothschild. It is said he spent fifty million francs on his journey from the Sublime Porte to the Barrier de l'Etoile. All his attendants wore, during the whole trip, the Turkish costume. He gave away twenty thousand dollars in gratuities to servants, posillions and chambermaids, from Marseilles to Paris.

STATISTICS OF PHILADELPHIA.—There are in Philadelphia 102 places of public worship, of which 47 are Presbyterian, 33 Episcopalian, 25 Baptist, 19 Methodist Episcopal, 13 Catholic 8 Friends' meeting houses, 12 colored, 4 Protestant Methodist, 2 German Reformed, 4 Hebrew Synagogues and 2 Unitarian. There are also 120 public institutions, including 21 public schools; 9 English and 2 German daily papers, 28 weekly papers and 21 periodicals.

THE STRAW BONNET BUSINESS.—A new establishment for the manufacture of straw bonnets has been organized on an extensive scale in Foxborough, Massachusetts. It is calculated to turn out ten thousand straw bonnets a year. It employs two thousand females and one hundred and fifty men, but not more than one-fourth of them work in the factory, they being paid by the piece.

The stock of cotton in Europe, instead of being smaller than in former years, is largely in excess of any of the previous six years. It is 37 per cent. higher than at the end of 1851, and almost double the average of the past thirty years, as will be seen by reference to returns made in Great Britain.

The American Bible House, in Nassau street, NewYork, was sold at the Merchants' Exchange on the 27th ult. for $105,000. N. C. Platt was the purchaser. The Society Library building was also sold. It brought $121,500, and John Lafarge was the purchaser. Mr. Howard, a short time ago, purchased it for $110,000.

SICKNESS AND DEATH AT SEA.—The British ship Anne, 64 days from Cork, arrived at New York on Saturday, the 30th ult., and landed sick passengers at the Quarantine. She sailed with three hundred and sixty-four souls on board, eleven of whom died during the passage.

PUBLIC PARKS IN ST. LOUIS.—The Board of Aldermen of St Louis have resolved to issue $500,000 in bonds to purchase ground for several public parks in that city, provided the majority of the voters confirm the ordinance authorizing the bonds.

Antonio Lopez, the Spanish sailor who some time since was sentenced to death, in NewYork City, for the murder of policeman Foster, but who was pardoned, it is stated killed a sailor, at Matanzas a few weeks ago, and then made his escape.

The net amount on the 24th ult., to the draft of the Treasurer of the United States, was $12,955,956 20, of which $15,723 13 was in the hands of the Assistant Treasurer in this city.

THE SCARLET FEVER IN BOSTON.—For the past three or four months Scarlet Fever has been quite fatal to children in Boston. During the past week there were nine deaths from it. The same disease is very fatal in Philadelphia, causing twenty deaths last week.

It is a fact worthy of note that when cotton is well handled before it passes through the gin, it pays the planter a much better price than when raising an overgrown crop half matured and picked full of trash.

The milkmen of Boston have held a convention, and resolved to adopt the wine measure. The milkmen of New York have determined to do likewise. This is equivalent to raising the price of milk.

VOLUME III. NUMBER 3. NEW ORLEANS, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1853. WHOLE NUMBER 107

[For the N. O. Christian Advocate.]

Lines suggested by a sermon preached by the Rev. Bishop Andrew, in the Methodist church, Carondelet street, New Orleans, February 13, 1853:

"THE LORD HE IS THE GOD."

"How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow Him: but if Baal, then follow him."
1 Kings, 18, 21.

Whom shall I follow? Say, my soul,
Whom own'st thou for thy God?
To whom do I for succor lean,
My help at home—abroad?

In early childhood's fragile bud,
When drooping worn and weak,
To whom did fond parental love,
Their darling's safety seek?

Then, 'mid youth's delirious joys,
With eager haste I sped,
Nor strong right hand restrained my steps,
And upward gently led!

And oh, when fierce temptation's power
My wayward heart assailed!
Who sent the thunderbolt 'neath which
My wakened conscience quailed?

Then, in dark affliction's night,
When sorrow bowed my head,
What promises around my path
Their soothing halo shed?

And when I to the Throne of Grace
A weeping suppliant came,
Who planted in my trembling breast
Sweet peace, through Jesus' name?

And oh, my soul! when I had brought
My heart's besetting sin—
The world's keen eye had never found,
So close it dwelt within"—

And laid it on the altar stone,
A sacrifice divine,
And all the weak, earth-born desires,
That ever had been mine,

Then cried aloud, "Now, Lord, declare
If thy servant am I"—
Whence came the fire—no quivering spark,
But a resplendent flame?

It flashed on my astonished sight—
My sacrifice consumed,
And the dark trenches of my soul
With sacred warmth illumed!

Then falling prostrate on my face,
My ransomed tongue exclaimed:
"The God that answereth by fire,
Let Him be loud proclaimed!"

Henceforth let Baal, his pomp and pride,
Beneath my feet be trod;
The Lord—the Lord—the living Lord!
My Lord! He is the God!

THE EVIL OF PREACHING CHANGING FOR THE WORSE.

Mr. Editor: The following extracts are from one of the most judicious and best conducted religious papers in the country, and from different pens. They relate to a subject full of interest in every point of light. regarded as evidence that there is a dissatisfaction with, and a departure from, the frigid and unprofitable theology that furnished the staple of pulpit addresses, in New England and adjacent regions, in time past, it may be doubtful whether this State will prove an omen of good or evil. If in its transition from the sterility of the past, the New England mind should be brought to substitute a warm evangelism in its place, the change would be glorious indeed. But if, as seems rather to be implied, the mere fashionable pulpit amusements and follies of the day are to be issued in a new and ornamented edition, the Church and the world have little to hope. In the mean time these descriptions of the Northern pulpit, in its chrysalis state, may not be unsuited to other latitudes: A. P. H.

"We have for some time past been inclined to fear that there is a tendency among the junior preachers in the orthodox pulpit to ignore the system embraced in the 'Doctrines of Grace,' to substitute an intellectual, sentimental, and humanitarian divinity, in the place of repentance, faith and the great atonement. As Daniel Webster said, they take a text in the Bible and preach out of the newspapers, instead of addressing the heart and conscience of men with those gospel truths which are essential to salvation as air to animal life.

"Theology is getting out of date—at least with the people. It is dry—it is dull. It interests—it attracts—nobody. It is for the Ministry at most; and for them is its learning and its literature, and not for them in the administrations of the pulpit. The pulpit is this place for flower and flourish, not to say for the clouds and nebulosity of transcendentalism. The people must be made to wonder, and gaze, and so be attracted; and if truth wont do it, presented in its naked simplicity and power, it must be hyperbolized into falsehood or monstrosities."

"The more popular preachers — distinguished for supposed rhetorical excellence—are the models. The solicitude of the younger men is directed to this kind of excellence—to making fine sermons—elegant discourses, etc. That kind of preaching which is fitted to the people, and which is alone effective with the people—preaching so simple, so plain, so direct, that it cannot but be understood and felt by the people—preaching which, like a screw on the conscience, turns a harder and harder pressure, till there is no living under it, is not duly appreciated."

Another correspondent says:

"For myself, I must say that I have encountered a sickening amount of 'flower and flourish, not to say the clouds and nebulosity of transcendentalism,' in the pulpit; while, too often, the soul is left to pine under a famine of the word of God. The deterioration is in the 'fulness and force of doctrine,' the plainness, boldness, skill, power, with which these evangelical truths, which are the foundation of experimental religion, are sent home upon the consciences and heart. The complaint is, that however these may be adverted to or implied more or less, they do not form the great staple of preaching. They are kept too much in the background. They are deemed too stale, dry, and common place. They must give way to something more novel and interesting—to themes secular, political, philosophical, transcendental. Or if gospel truths are handled, they must be seasoned with condiments of this sort to make them agreeable, till they are disguised and neutralized. In such respects the evidence is as mournful as it is overwhelming, that preaching has changed, and is changing, for the worse. This is not the complaint of captious, fastidious, hyper-critical hearers. It is the grief of the most serious, prayerful, godly Christians—of the most intelligent and devoted Ministers. It must be well founded. What then is the origin of this tendency? To what is it owing?"

Doctor Wood says:

"Another enfeebling device is to mix truth with something else. The object of this is to make the truth more palatable. The intellect insists upon showing itself in some curious feats. There must be display. There is an effort to make literary sermons—intellectual sermons—great sermons. There is a tendency of this sort in the Evangelical Churches of the present day. The hearers feel it—the most pious and discerning mourn over it. * * * There is something ambitious—something away from the ordinary track—something splendid and high-wrought in this. There is a sad missing of the great object of preaching, namely—to meet men's souls with God's truth."

A PRESCRIPTION

For the Cure of Lukewarm and Pleasure-Loving Christians.

Let the pastor or preacher in charge begin to deal familiarly and plainly with their faults; let his preaching be close, practical, and searching; let him bear down upon the sins of the day, and the follies of many in the Church, as a man of God ought to do; let him dare to imitate the prophet of old, and a degree of personality appear in his matter and manner of preaching, that seems to say, "Thou art the man"—then they begin to move, and the voice of complaint is heard, "Too severe—too severe—it will do no good," etc. Let him assail their favorite amusements, whether it be a "floating palace," or a moving den of loathsome spirits, that traverses the length and breadth of the land, producing corruption by contact, and leaving behind it an influence like a moral plague: or let him dare to take exceptions to the fashionable frivolities of those who seek amusement in the cultivation of the heels, and not the head, and then you have a stir. Not unlike that raised by Paul at Ephesus, when the maddened and idolatrous populace, at the instigation of Demetrius, whose craft was in danger, rent the air with shouts of "great is Diana of the Ephesians." Or let him, if he finds it necessary, make an application of the discipline, and then you will see a move in several parts of the body, not only in the member diseased, but all those who are similarly affected and sympathise with the sufferer. I do not pretend to say that in every case reaction in favor of health will be seen, but signs of life will appear, and though it may be spasmodic and painful, it is even better and more hopeful than moral stupor; which in most cases is the presage of spiritual death.

NOTE.—In the application of this last particular, let the administrator be careful, as the patient in his struggle is always more or less belligerent, and you may be hurt, but never seriously; there is no need of alarm from this quarter, though a little caution is always safe. Persist in this course of treatment, and you will cure the case, or rid the hospital of a dangerous and infectious incumbent. EXPERIENCE.

SATURDAY EVENING.

Reader, do not let this season pass without some profitable reflections. Carefully review the week; sum up the blessings you have received from a Father whose provident care has kept you in life, in health, in comfort, while others every way your equals, and, perhaps, superiors, have been prematurely cut off, or spared to live in misery. Think of this—think of it with gratitude. Calmly and carefully review the transactions of the week. Have you been industrious and frugal? Have you habitually controlled your temper and your tongue? Have you thought of the poor and infirm, and to the extent of your ability relieved them? Have you labored to make your home pleasant and attractive? Have you acquired or imparted any useful knowledge? Have you answered any of the great important ends of your existence? Look these questions in the face; answer them honestly and without evasion, and your sleep to-night will be more quiet, and your future life better than the past.

DIFFICULTY OF THE TRINITY.

Rev. Mr. Kirk cites the following remark of Mr. Webster, which he says he heard from his own lips:

"Mr. Webster being asked by a Unitarian gentleman, in Boston, whether he believed that three and one are the same thing, replied in a manner perfectly characteristic: 'Sir, I believe you and I do not understand the arithmetic of heaven.'"

PASTORAL VISITING.

There is no relation which men sustain to each other which gives origin to more important duties, and puts an individual in a position of greater influence, than that of a pastor. The people will be disposed to believe what the pastor tells them, and will be influenced by his example. His chief duty is to watch over the flock, and keep them from errors in doctrine and practice. The only method by which this can be accomplished, is instruction in the doctrines and obligations of religion. This must be given in discourses from the pulpit, and in conversation in private. The object of preaching is to instruct; hence the discourses should be of an instructive nature, in which the truths of our religion ought to be made so plain that all attentive hearers will understand them, and urged so earnestly, that all may feel the necessity of believing in them. This process of instruction must be kept up in visiting from house to house, and the fruit which this form of labor produces, is usually more certain and more abundant than that produced by any other. The influence of the pulpit is much increased by pastoral visiting. People will fill the church of the preacher who visits them, and converses with them in such a way becomes his office and profession. We have many in the Church who can preach eloquently, and from whose sermons much information can be gotten, but there is a great deficiency in good pastors. This deficiency is not a necessary evil. It has its origin in negligence on the part of some of our preachers in cultivating habits of visiting, and in the love of ease. There is real labor in visiting from house to house, and instructing and praying with the people. Social visiting is pleasant to social men, but pastoral visiting is trying to the flesh, and a heavy cross.

Many preachers have the disposition to be good pastors, but they imagine that their efforts in this department of labor are failures, and thus they become discouraged. Many have difficulty in introducing a suitable subject for conversation, and in keeping the minds of the company on the subject. Frequently embarrassment is produced by the perception that the visitor must be the chief and only speaker, and a modest man shrinks from putting himself in such a position. These are obstacles which have to be removed, or crosses which have to be borne patiently.

A very simple method, and a very successful one, in this labor, is to seek the earliest suitable opportunity, after the pastor enters the house, to say to the family: "I have called to have prayers with you." This prepares the way for the exercise of instruction and worship. A portion of Scripture can be read, and explained in a few words, and all join in prayer. Thus a preacher will get the first insight into many passages of Scripture, which will prove to be foundations of able sermons, and thus he will leave the savor of his divine Master behind him. The best definition of Christianity is in these words: "Pure religion, and undefiled before God the Father, is this, to visit the fatherless and widow in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

THE HABIT OF EXAGGERATION

The subjoined article, by Eliza Cook, shows up truthfully a prevailing fault in the use of language. It grows naturally enough out of the ultraism of the day, and the intense excitement that every body seems to labor under, which completely beggars the vocabulary of strong terms and extravagant figures of speech. If the present rate of exhaustion continue, we shall soon be reduced to the necessity of thinking more calmly and speaking more moderately, or else obliged to invent a new language, consisting entirely of superlatives. This high-pressure system has burst the covers of Webster's Quarto, and gone off into undefined space.

"The habit of exaggeration in language is a characteristic in many people, which appears to us to afford a truer index of their general qualities than is ordinarily observed. A great depth in any faculty, or acute intensity of any feeling is seldom possessed by those who invariably use the most imposing words they can find to express their opinions and sentiments. The stereotyped grandiloquence and florid warmth of tone used by them in discussing simple matters, or relating simple incidents, are, to our matter-of-fact organization, little beyond the flourishing of drum and trumpet, which upon close investigation is found to be the issue of sheep-skin, brass, and common atmosphere. Some people's tongues are eternally emulating the frog in the old fable and always straining into an ox—a state of verbal inflation alike ridiculous and false. There are those who never experience a moderate and occasional degree of pain, but they speak of it as a 'splitting' headache, and thus a common cold is mentioned seriously 'as a most violent influenza,' and a week or two of fever is recorded as a 'severe and frightful illness.' The superlative is the reigning mood with them; skim milk becomes Devonshire cream, and small beer Guiness's stout; 'superb,' 'exquisite,' 'wonderful,' 'glorious,' 'horrible,' 'tremendous,' 'delicious,' 'charming,' 'beautiful,' 'terrific,' 'astonishing,' and such extreme adjectives, being on their lips as plentifully as conjunctions, and we often wonder, while gauging the narrow calibre of brain whence the big torrent issues, how such large furniture could be found in such a small house. Let those people repeat a story or circumstance, and you can hardly detect the original; they see every thing through a magnifying glass and kaleidoscope blended. Talk of painting in veritable colors, the foreground and outlines, often given in mere words, beat the Raphaelites by notches—a Dutch garden all tulips and peacocks, or a summer sunset all purple and gold, are soft and unimposing compared to the limning power of one of those fluent sign-painters.

"We once kept account for a lady during a three miles' walk through rather shady lanes, who declared herself 'half dead' with fatigue every few minutes; and we found that she had died exactly eleven times and a half at the end of the journey, when she swallowed cider and sandwiches in a most vital fashion, considering her multiplied state demise. We met a cottager's child, which she rushed up to and pronounced to be an 'angelic little cherub;' but our near sighted eyes could only perceive about as average a bread-and-butter-devouring little biped as ever plagued a mother; then she informed us that the view to the left was 'grandly sublime,' though there was nothing to elicit rapture beyond a broad common, fringed with a plantation, barely relieved in the fore ground with a very yellow pond, and still yellower goslings."

"An elderly gentleman amuses us very often, by his description of his only son. The young man according to his papa's portraying, is an 'immense genius'—indeed his mind is too much for his body;' his abilities are in fact so great, that they do not know what he is fit for; he 'plays divinely,' 'sings exquisitely,' and 'possesses the poet's inspiration in a wonderful degree;' if he lives long enough he will 'do something very grand;' and withal, he is so delicate in constitution, that he can hardly 'bear the wind to blow on him.' These are the doting sire's own words, but we should, in giving a candid opinion of the youth, use less elevated language, and say that he is nothing more than a 'spruce fir, entered and labelled in his pa's grand conservatory as a cedar of Lebanon; and as for his 'delicate constitution,' it seems to stand pretty well under an unlimited amount of large dissipations and 'small hours.'"

GO FEEL WHAT I HAVE FELT!

The circumstances which induced the writing of the following most touching and thrilling lines are as follows: A young lady of New York was in the habit of writing for the Philadelphia Ledger on the subject of Temperance. Her writing was so full of pathos, and evinced such deep emotion of soul, that a friend of hers accused her of being a maniac on the subject of Temperance—whereupon she wrote the following lines:

Go feel what I have felt—
Go bear what I have born;
Sink 'neath a blow a father dealt,
And the cold world's proud scorn:
Then suffer on from year to year—
Thy sole relief the scorching tear'

Go kneel as I have knelt—
Implore—beseech—and pray;
Strive the heated heart to melt—
The downward course to stay;
Be dashed with bitter curse aside—
Your prayers burlesqued—your tears defied!

Go weep as I have wept
O'er a loved father's fall—
See every promised blessing swept—
Youth's sweetness turned to gall:
Life's fading flowers strewed all the way
That brought me up to woman's day!

Go see what I have seen—
Behold the strong man bowed,
With gnashing teeth—lips bathed in blood—
And cold and livid brow!
Go catch his withering glance—and see
There mirrored his soul's misery!

Go to thy mother's side,
And her crushed bosom chase;
Thine own deep anguish hide—
Wipe from her cheek the bitter tear;
Mark her worn frame, and withered brow,
The gray that streaks her dark hair now,
With fading frame and trembling limb,
And trace the ruin back to him
Whose plighted faith in early youth
Promised eternal love and truth—
But who, forsworn, hath yielded up
That promise to the cursed cup!—
And led her down, through love and light,
And all that made her promise bright,
And chained her there—'mid want and strife,
That lowly thing—a drunkard's wife,
And stamped on childhood's brow, so mild,
That withering blight—the drunkard's child!

Go hear and feel, and see and know,
All that my soul hath felt and known;
Then look upon the wine-cup's glow—
See if its beauty can atone;
Think if its flavor you will try,
When all proclaim—'tis drink and die!

Tell me I hate the bowl!
"Hate" is a feeble word—
I loathe,—abhor,—my very soul
With strong disgust is stirred,
When I see—or hear—or tell,
Of the dark beverage of hell!

DECLENSIONS AFTER REVIVALS.

The Canada Christian Advocate, in an article on revivals, thus accounts for those declensions which usually succeed revivals. It says:

"Every effect, it is said, must have a cause; there must, therefore be a cause for those declensions which so universally follow revivals of religion; and that cause, we apprehend, may be found in the belief so predominant in the Church, that such will be the case. This most erroneous and most ruinous notion, that every revival must come to an end and be followed by a season of backsliding, coldness, and spiritual death, cannot be sufficiently deprecated—as it tends more than any thing else to produce this result. No person, who considers the powerful influence which a man's belief has upon his practice, will be at all surprised at this; it follows as necessarily as an effect follows its cause."

MATERIALISM.

An infidel, who had been attempting to prove that men have no souls, asked a lady, with an air of triumph, what she thought of his philosophy. "It appears to me," she replied, "that you have been employing a good deal of talent to prove yourself a beast."

Prosperity too often has the same effect on a Christian that a calm sea has on a Dutch mariner, who frequently, it is said, in those circumstances, ties up the rudder, gets drunk, and goes to sleep.

HOW OLD ART THOU?

A question often put to others—seldom to ourselves. Man has a natural dislike to marking and remembering the flight of his years, and dislikes to ask himself what progress he is making in the journey toward eternity. But God has divided this journey into separate stages, that at each successive period the traveler may be reminded of the distance he has passed. Thus days and weeks, months and years, follow upon each others track; and, as each one begins or ends, man is compelled to think that he is moving onward to the close of his career. But age is very imperfectly measured by the flight of years. A man's life does not consist of the number of days that he has lived, any more than in the abundance of things that he hath. And when the question is asked, "How old art thou?" the answer must embrace more than the sum of "the days of the years of the life" that we have spent thus far.

"How old art thou?" in years? The inquiry is solemn and important, though it embraces no more than this. It is a solemn thing to live—to be a creature of God—moral, accountable, mortal, immortal—dependent on God for life, and breath, and being, and liable to be summoned in an instant into the immediate presence of the Judge of all the earth. You are such a creature. How long have you lived on the footstool of God, and fed at His table, and reposed in His arms? Pause, and think for a moment on the progress you have made toward the bar of God! You are ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, or seventy years old. Youth is a precious season. Your character is forming. If you have not sought already, seek and find it before the age of manhood. Manhood is a dangerous season. The world then engrosses and absorbs the thoughts. Its cares, and perplexities, and temptations, beset, and entangle, and ensnare the heart. There are obstacles in the way of your conversion now that do not oppose at any other season. If you have reached the years of manhood without an interest in the great salvation, it becomes you to rouse from your fatal sleep, and make a manly, mighty effort to secure the deliverance of your soul from the power of sin and the danger of hell. You may be old in years. Your feet may tremble on the verge of the grave. Soon you must die. Dying in sin and in years, how aggravated your eternal condemnation! How many years of time—how many precious Sabbaths—how many blessed privileges you have slighted, despised, and rejected!

Behold the aged sinner goes,
Laden with guilt and heavy woes,
Down to the regions of the dead,
With endless curses on his head.

The dust returns to dust again;
The soul, in agonies of pain,
Ascends to God! not there to dwell,
But hears her doom, and sinks to hell.

"How old art thou" in sin? You cannot determine a youth's proficiency in learning by the length of time he has been at school, nor can you estimate progress in iniquity by the years you have spent in the transgression of God's laws. Some walk in the paths of sin; and of others it is said, "their feet are swift to shed blood." There are degrees in sin, and some make far more rapid progress in it than others. By one awful plunge you may have bathed your soul in guilt of the deepest dye. By one aggravated rejection of the blood of the covenant—by one determined act of resistance of the Holy Ghost—you may become old in sin. Your heart will tell you how much harder it is now than it once was—how much more it hates God, and his laws, and his character, and how much more determined and settled it is in sin. These are the marks of age in sin; marks as infallible and solemn as gray hairs or trembling knees. You may be very young in years, and even in youth may have reached an unenvied preeminence in guilt. Or you may have lived to be called old, and have added to the number and magnitude of your sins, until they exceed the sands of the sea-shore and the stars in heaven. In either case you are old, very old in sin, and may soon sink under the weight of age, and be pressed deep into hell. Age is a heavy load to bear, but sin weighs more heavily. Both are insupportable.

"How old art thou" in grace? The work of sanctification is progressive, and far more rapid in some hearts than in others. It is the fruit of the Holy Spirit, which he gives in answer to prayer, and which may be secured in any measure by those who seek it. God is more willing to give his Spirit to them that ask him, than parents are to give bread to their starving children. What supplies have you received? Have you hungered and thirsted after righteousness, and longed to be filled? Do you go on from one degree of grace to another, forgetting the things that are behind, and reaching forth unto those that are before? Does the Holy Ghost dwell in you richly, and produce in your life the fruits of the Spirit—"love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance," If so, "happy are ye." Believers are apt to forget that they may grow in grace as rapidly as they desire. Grace is not the result of their own works, but it is implanted and cultivated in answer to their desire. God loves to promote the work rapidly, and it is your fault if you are not already old in grace.

"How old art thou" in the service of God? Some die old at thirty, and some die young at four-score. Multitudes of those who profess to be the servants of God, have spent years of time, and have done little or nothing for him "whose they are." When the old patriarch Jacob was asked by Pharaoh, "How old art thou?" he answered, "Few and evil have the days of the years of my life been." And if this saint, who had prevailed with God and man, and spent a life of prayer and self-denial and devotion, that is not exceeded by that of any one whose history we read, had reason to say when his was one hundred and thirty years old, that his days had been "few and evil," what a miserable account must we be compelled to give, who have done little or nothing for God!

"How old art thou," dear reader, in years, in sin, in grace, in the service of God? These are solemn questions. Weigh them well, and pray over them. Answer them in the secrecy of thy closet, in the honesty of thy heart, and remember that the answer bears heavily on thine eternal hopes.

THE CHURCH AND ASIA.

A glance at any map of the world will show at once the vast extent of territory embraced in the grand division of the earth's surface called Asia, including the adjacent islands, it stretches through 88 degrees of latitude, and 160 of longitude. Its superficial area is about 17,500,000 square miles, or nearly as large as the Americas and Europe together. Geographically, the Asiatic continent may be distributed under five divisions, whose boundaries are marked by prominent physical features. 1. The central table land, (Mongolia, Ili, Thibet.) It is situated near the centre of the continent, having for its bearers—north, the Great Altai; east, the Manchurian Mountains; south, the Himmaleh and Mountains of China; west, the Belur-tag, the Elburz, and Persia Mountains. 2. The Northern Slope, (Siberia,) extending northward from the central table-land, and comprising the northern portion of the continent. 3. The Eastern Slope, (Manchuria and Corea.) 4. The Western Slope, (Persian Empire, Turkestan, Caucasian Provinces, and Asiatic Turkey.) 5. The Southern Slope, (China Proper, Farther India, Hindostan, Southern shore of the Persian Empire, and Arabia.)

The population of Asia is immense. It is startling to read the estimates of reliable authorities on the subject. Including the islands which belong geographically to it, the sum of the population, as given in a recent work, is 655,643,300. Making from this statement a liberal deduction, on the ground of its being, as the writer remarks, only "an approximation to the truth," still what myriads remain. More than one half of the human race are now living beneath the sun of Asia.

The religions of Asia are, Brahmanism, (in Hindostan,) Budhism, (in Farther India, China Proper, Central Table-land, Eastern Slope, and eastern part of the Northern Slope,) Confucianism and Rationalism, (China Proper,) Sinto, (Japan,) Shamanism, (Siberia,) Fetichsects, the Sikhs, Parsees, etc., Jewish and corrupt forms of Christianity. The Brahmins number 100,000,000; Budhists, 260,000,000; Mohammedans, 155,825,000; Confucians and Rationalists, 67,000,000; sect of Sinto, 25,000,000, Fetichists, 50,000; Shamans, 50,000,000; Sikhs, Parsees, etc., 5,000,000; Jews, 300,000; Christian sects, 2,005,000.

The precise number of languages and dialects spoken in Asia, it is at present impossible to determine. What we have written, however, in reference to the population of Asia suggests that it must be almost infinite. In Hindostan, it is stated there are thirty distinct languages and dialects prevail; the same remark applies to the nations of Central Table-land, Eastern and Northern Slopes; while in Western Asia, we find many dialects of the Arabic, Persian, Syrian, and Caucasian languages. In China there are three great dialects from which branch off innumerable varieties of pronunciation.

We come now to notice the present openings and encouragements, difficulties and wants of Asia, as a mission field.

The assertion would to many seem like mockery, were we to declare that the whole of Asia is now open to the Church. And yet how nearly would such a statement be sustained by facts. We are assured, that were the Church now filled with the spirit of the early Christians, the statement would be true in its fullest extent. But let us examine the point. Starting from the Bosphorus, Asiatic Turkey, Persia, Hindostan, Ceylon, and other islands in the Indian Archipelago, Farther India, Loo-Choo, and the consular ports of China, have already been occupied by the Church. Arabia, if we except Aden, is without a mission-station; but the only difficulties so far as the country is concerned, are its deserts and the roving character of its tribes. We know of nothing else, either in its people or governments, to intimidate the Church in her efforts for its evangelization. Within the Central Table-land and Eastern Slope, no mission has been established; and yet we are not aware of any really formidable difficulty in the way of so desirable a movement. In Siberia, promising missions were commenced some years since; but the last one was given up in 1840; the reasons assigned being, the opposition of the Russo-Greek Church and the unsettled habits of the people. We feel satisfied, however, that vigorous efforts to send the gospel to the greatest plain in the world, would be eminently successful. Japan is the only country presenting really formidable difficulties to the Church; and even there light is dawning. The Loo-Choo Islands are intimately connected with Japan, and there a missionary has been laboring for several years. We understand, too, that the "Naval Missionary Society" is about to reinforce the mission in Loo-Choo. China exerts a powerful influence over the people and governments of that insular empire; and at Hong-Kong and the consular ports, large missions are in active operation. Large fleets of American and English whaling vessels are constantly floating in her seas, and looking in upon her shores. At this time the United States East India squadron is about sailing from China to Japan, in the hope of forming with its government a treaty of friendship and commerce.

The population of those countries to which the Church now has access, is more than 550,000,000, while that of the countries in which there are no missions, is only a little over 65,000,000. Again, the positions now occupied by the Church, are the salient points of the continent. From Western Asia the gospel will pass easily, southward, to Arabia; east, to Afghanistan and Beloochistan; north to Turkestan; and onward to the western Steppes of Siberia. The mountains of Hindostan command the peninsula; while with the stations in Farther India, we are directly in front of China, the way is direct to the Mongol tribes of the Table-land, the Tungusians of the Eastern Slope, and northward to the southern and eastern portions of the great northern Plain.

We observe further that in some of these countries the profession of Christianity exposes the native convert to no legalized persecution; in others it is shielded by the laws of the land; while in none are the converts subjected to trials greater than those endured by the primitive Christians. The work of conversion is going forward most cheeringly. In Asiatic Turkey, Persia, Hindostan, Ceylon, Burmah, Siam, and China, native Christian congregations have been gathered; and churches for the worship of God, rise where once stood the gorgeous temples of Paganism.

From these facts we feel prepared to say, first, that the Church has no warrant or justification in withholding from the work of evangelizing Asia, the least moiety of her resources on the ground that the country is not open; and, secondly, that for the full and efficient operation of all the resources of the Church, Asia is open.

The existence of ancient, though corrupt forms of Christianity, in many parts of Asia, is a promising indication in reference to our subject. The Maronites occupy the steeps of Lebanon; the Jacobites reside in Syria, and near the Tigris; the Armenians in Turkey and Persia; the Nestorians are scattered over Armenia, Mesopotamia, parts of Persia and India; the Greek Church extends through the districts of Aleppo, Damascus, and Jerusalem; while the Russo-Greek Church has established throughout the towns and military posts of Siberia. Were the Spirit now poured upon these Churches, what a light would rise on Asia! This blessed work has indeed commenced. Among the Armenians and Nestorians, in connection with the missions of the American Board, a glorious awakening is going forward. The work will doubtless advance until all these ancient sects, scattered as they are from Jerusalem to Ormuz, shall awake to a new spiritual life.

The profound peace now reigning throughout the eastern continent, is highly favorable to the spread of Christianity. The fierce nomadic tribes of the Central Table-land no longer pour from their mountain fastnesses to scourge the nations. The Mongols, whose rapid conquests, says Gibbon, "may be compared with the primitive convulsions of nature, which have agitated and altered the surface of the globe," now quietly pitch their tents near the sources of the Amour, the Hoang-Ho, and the Indus; or beneath the shadow of the Altai and the Thsar-Shang. The Mahometans in their splendid towns, or on the boundless plains of China, from the peril and glory of the conquest. No Nadir Shah or Hyder Ali leads on his fiery hosts to the shock of battle and the sack of cities. All is quiet. The weary of conflict, seated, waiting for the response of an Oracle, higher, purer and more authoritative, than those of earth.

Those conversant with Asia have not failed to recognize, in the effete character of its superstitions, an auspicious omen for the gospel. We are far from believing that heathenism has lost all its power over the mind of Asia. Magnificent temples, glittering pagodas, and pompous ceremonies, mark its sway. The systems, however, have grown old. Brahmanism still rules in Hindostan; but the vigor of its manhood is now yielding to the decrepitude of age. Budhism, with its "vain repetitions" and senseless mummeries, still exerts a wide influence; but progress has ceased, and its energies are expended in maintaining its present position. Confucianism does not even profess to meet the moral wants of man. There are in it refined formalism and heartless scepticism, but no salvation from sin. That upon such a field no impostor is permitted to enter, while toward its thronging hosts the hearts of Christians now strongly turn, seems to indicate that its long night of heathenism is about to yield to the light of the gospel.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, February 19.

while the Empire of British India covers an area of more than 1,000,000 square miles, and contains a population of 150,000,000.

The events of the last half century are full of encouragement. The Church has made rapid advance in spirituality; the missionary spirit has largely revived, and the success with which missionary operations have been crowned, is most gratifying. The frequent and stunning blows which the Papal power has received, indicate that the fall of Antichrist is at hand. The political aspect of the world at the present time is deeply interesting. The Ottoman power, so terrible in story, is now moulded and directed by the sentiments of Christian nations; and the dominions of the Porte, forming as they do the connecting bond between Christendom and Pagan countries, owe, in a great measure, their continued existence to European diplomacy. On the possessions of Protestant England the sun never sets, and her language now girdles the globe. The Pacific coast of North America, almost within hail of Asia, is gathering on its soil people out of every nation under heaven. Observe, too, the present social condition of Europe. What mean these frequent and violent upheavings of society in those old kingdoms! The signs of the time indicate, we think, the approach of some great event. To many Christians they proclaim that "the heathen and the uttermost parts of earth," as promised in the covenant of redemption, are soon to be given to the Son for his inheritance and possession. LET US HAVE MANY SUCH.—Who does not approve word and deed of the following business letter?

MR. EDITOR—You will perhaps call to mind a writer in the Southern Methodist Quarterly Review, who advocated a reduction in the price of our books and periodicals.

And as you have became the pioneer as I believe in the practical part of this work, I have felt it my duty to show my faith by my works, and thus aid you in a small way to be sure, yet according to my ability in your praiseful effort to accomplish the desirable end, (at least in part,) of showing that the reduction of the price of our periodicals is practicable.

Herewith you have five new subscribers for the Advocate—the papers for whom are all to be sent to the village of Cooksville, Noxubee county, Miss.

In Christian bonds, your Brother,

THE RUMORS.—Bishop Andrew after spending a few weeks in our city to the edification of the Church, and to the improved health of himself and family, left Georgia-ward on last Monday.

On Thursday evening Bishop Soule arrived on his way to California. The venerable Senior Bishop has had a refined trip from Nashville. His health is at present unfavorably affected by an asthmatic attack. He contemplates leaving on the Pacific mail line with Tuesday morning.

REV. CYRUS BEASLEY, of the Troy Conference, died in this city of typhoid fever on the 17th instant. Mr. B. was in our climate to restore his health. His fine qualities of mind and heart had most favorably impressed a large circle of friends, formed during his brief residence. He died in great peace.

THE RIGHT WAY.—The citizens of Dunnville Settlement, Harris county, Texas, have resolved, in order to afford inducements to sustain a good school in their vicinity, to furnish good board, washing and lodging, at two dollars per month. They have an excellent teacher, and sustain a good Sunday School.

REV. B. B. NEWMAN.—The Chicago Christian Advocate, of the 2d instant, says Rev. B. B. Newman, Swed's Missionary, whose arrival we noticed last week, has commenced his labors with prospects of very encouraging success. He received forty of his countrymen into the Methodist Episcopal Church last week.

REV. MR. HATCHER, of the Tennessee Conference, and late Bible Agent, died on the 26th ult. near Ocala, Florida, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health. He died in great peace.

REVIVAL AT JACKSON, MISS.—Rev. W. H. Watt, pastor, writes at date February 9:

"Our protracted meeting closed on Monday evening, 24th ult. We had about one hundred conversions and seventy-seven accessions to the Church. On the ensuing Sabbath we resumed services, and there were four conversions and two accessions. The meeting was, however, broken up after a few nights by the bad weather."

CHARGE, MISS.—Rev. Jacob Matthews writes February 7:

"We have nothing of special interest here, further than that the Colleges are doing well, both male and female.

"The competency and efficiency of those who have charge of each department, give their friends great hope of more than ordinary success, both for mental and moral training. The healthiness of the location of our town, and its freedom from immoral influences, protected too by its valuable charter, render it altogether desirable. Environed and interspersed by its beautiful groves, affording the finest field for recreation and pastime, in common with its religious advantages, it would be strange that our youths should not grow wiser and better."

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

The monthly meeting of Managers was held on the 6th instant:

Four new Auxiliaries were recognized—two in Georgia, one in Ohio, and one in Illinois.

Letters were read from Agent Lyon, of Tennessee, shewing the destitution in certain portions of his field, and the need of aid; and from Agent Strong, of Texas, in regard to the German population, and mentioning the return of many of the former inhabitants, Mexicans, and their demand for the Scriptures.

Another from Rev. D. D. Lore, of Buenos Ayres, and one from Rev. Dr. Smith, of Beirout, in regard to the publication of the Arabic Scriptures, and asking for Bibles in different languages. The grant was made.

A communication was received from the British and Foreign Bible Society, in reference to the celebration of their approaching Jubilee. The year 1854 will be just half a century since the organization of that Society.

Numerous grants were made, including grants to the American Missionary Society, of Arabic Bibles and Testaments for their Missions in Africa; to the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, for their Indian Mission Schools; and appropriations of $300 to the Ahmednugger, and $400 to the Yulu Missions.

The receipts of the last month amounted to $29,386 93, and the issues of Bibles and Testaments to 41,955 copies.

FLORIDA CONFERENCE ITEMS.

We are indebted to Rev. G. W. Price for some items, additional to those detailed by our courteous and prompt correspondent Bro. Smith, whose letter came to hand previously. Bro. P. is a member of the Alabama Conference, was present at the session, and what he saw, and how he liked, can tell for himself:

* * * * *

The Florida Conference numbers between thirty and forty; but though small, it is far from being a feeble body. There are in it men of energy, of indomitable courage, of commendable perseverance, and holy boldness. It will challenge a favorable comparison with the same number selected from any of our annual Conferences. I was particularly impressed by the modest and retiring demeanor generally exhibited on the Conference floor. There was no unnecessary display of verbosity. There was no unmeaning waste of important time, no disposition to convert the occasion to the purpose of fledgling rhetoricians, or inflated utterers of "melodious wind." Doubtless, this was partially attributable to the judicious employment of Episcopal authority, for the Bishop unceremoniously and properly nipped in the bud many incipient flowers of useless oratory. But the cheerful submission with which the preachers yielded to his recommendations and advice, witnessed at once their love of order, and their respect and affection for the venerable President.

The first two days were spent in the patient examination of certain allegations affecting the character of two of the ministers. It is only necessary to state that the unanimous acquittal of their Brethren evinced the trivial, unfounded, and frivolous nature of the charges and specifications. With these exceptions, the session was harmonious and pleasant, and well calculated to cement more closely that hearty fraternal union that subsists between Methodist preachers.

Have you ever been in Quincey? Many of your readers have not, I know. Indulge a word of description. It is situated in middle Florida, about twenty miles West of the Chattahoochee River, and as many East of the Capital of the State. Its situation is beautiful, slightly undulating, high and salubrious. The town is symmetrically laid out: the streets spacious and clean, cross each other rectangularly. I cannot state definitely the population. It amounts, I should suppose, to several hundreds. The neatness, and in many cases, simple elegance of the private residences, impress the stranger most favorably. A more intimate acquaintance with the occupants by no means detracts from such impressions. On the contrary, the visitor is delighted to find that large hearted hospitality, courtesy, urbanity, and Christian politeness are prevalent characteristics. The Public Square is said to have been one of the handsomest in the South. The recent terrible hurricanes have marred its beauty by uprooting, breaking, and tearing in pieces the noble primitive forest trees that constituted its prime adornment. I have never seen a town where so much of the natural growth was allowed to remain. You know in the South, generally, the vandals who settle the soil leave no traces of the pristine wilderness. Here, however, tall, erect oaks adorn many of the ornamental flower-plats attached to the neat private edifices. In the spring, I am told, it is charming. I can readily accredit it. It imparts to the town a sort of vis-a-vis aspect. Indeed, even now, with the balmy, soft atmosphere that bathes the village in mid-winter, it realizes much of the spirit of those frequent poetioisms about the sunny land of flowers. It is the most delectable spot that I have seen in Florida.

Florida Conference is arousing herself to the growing importance of missionary operations, and though small and few in numbers, she seems determined to occupy her rightful position beside her sister Conferences. I predict that next year will show a considerable increase in the collections, which this year have amounted to about $3000. The preachers will go forth "baptized copiously," as Dr. Summers said when correcting President Myers' wish that they might be "deeply baptized" with the missionary spirit.

You know that the Chattahoochee is the western boundary of the Florida Conference. West Florida is attached to the Alabama Conference. But there is a growing desire on the part of the latter to be connected with the Florida Conference. The people desire to dissolve their present relations with the Alabama Conference. Nothing formal has been done, but I hear the matter canvassed very frequently, and I hear few dissenting voices. I apprehend that the General Conference will be memorialized to make a new division. Of the expediency of this step, I do not feel authorized to speak.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

A French Methodist Periodical began—Its Scope—Progress of the New Conference—Increased power of Romanism under the Empire—Persecution—The Madiai Case uncertain—The Probability—Reliefs of St. Genevieve Worshipped—The Weather—Politics

PARIS, January 20, 1853.

I have just been favored with an early proof-sheet of the prospectus of a new periodical to be entitled: Les Archives du Méthodisme, or "The Methodist Record," and intended to represent the interests of Methodism in France. Its publication is not official, though it will be edited by a member of the Book Committee; but it is hoped that the next Conference will approve of its design and spirit, and take it up as the organ of our Church. According to the prospectus, the aim of this paper will be especially to make known Methodism in an historical point of view, and such as it now exists in France, in England, in the United States, in Germany, and in every part of the world where God has planted it. By these means the editor will try to create an interest in favor of Methodism among the various denominations of Christians speaking the French language, and will endeavor to destroy the prejudices which still exist in the minds of many. He thus hopes that the Methodist Church, in France and Switzerland, will henceforth occupy, among the Evangelical Churches of these countries, a position which she could not reach so long as she was only a missionary station, not having any liberty of action.

You will, no doubt, be pleased to hear of this effort to have Methodism represented in the French Protestant Press. This was indeed quite a desideratum. The Papists, the Rationalists, the Evangelical Party of the National Church, the Independants, and even the Mormons, have their periodicals in France, whilst we have had none of late. I say of late, for a Wesleyan Monthly was started in 1839, and vegetated, rather than lived, for ten years. But as it was in the hands of the traveling Preachers, not one of whom had time to devote to it, so as to make it a really interesting Review, it was dropped at last. This time, the editor is not a traveling Preacher, and moreover he intends to issue but very few numbers this year (only six) in order to get them up in good style. It is hoped, therefore, that this new periodical will not have the melancholy fate of its predecessor, especially as the editor has a little experience in such matters, having successfully edited other Magazines for the last six years.

The information I have received from some of our newly constituted circuits is of a cheering nature. In the Cevennes a revival is going on, and in one place, daily Prayer Meetings have been numerously attended at the early hour of six in the morning, that is some time before day-light. From Nimes the Rev. Dr. Cook reports progress also. An ouvroir, or Sewing School, has been opened for girls, and a Day School for boys, and both have encouraging prospects. The Sunday School contains one hundred and ninety children. In one part of the Drome circuit many have given their hearts to God, among whom are three children of the Pastor. Here, in Paris, we are getting on very slowly. There are, nevertheless, encouraging tokens of God's presence. At our last Quarterly Meeting an increase of seven members was reported on our last quarter. Our public services are well attended, and our Missionary Meetings, held a fortnight ago, were excellent, the donations and collections for 1852 having amounted to $370, or $20 more than the preceding year.

As yet, the wind of persecution has not passed over us, which is a cause for thankfulness; for our brethren of other denominations are far from being let alone. The Romish Clergy have now more power than ever; they obtain from the Government whatever they ask for, whether it be the re-establishment of an order, or the restoration of the Bishopricks, suppressed in France by the Concordat of 1801, or the suppression of religious worship established by Protestants in Roman Catholic communes. This is what we have just seen at Estissac. You, perhaps, remember that some months ago the Pastor, and his suffragant, had been condemned by the Police Court for having held public worship in the commune, although five hundred inhabitants had inscribed their names as Protestants at the last census. They appealed to a higher Court—the Court of Appeal at Paris. The first sentence was confirmed last Saturday week, after a speech full of bitterness and partiality from the Attorney General, who proclaimed for the Government the right of closing, when it judges proper, edifices opened for the exercise of worship. The Court, in confirming the first sentence, based its decision upon the decree of the 25th of March, which renders applicable to public meetings, of whatever nature, the Articles of the Penal Code interdicting—under penalty of fine for the first offence, and imprisonment for the second—meetings of more than twenty persons. There would have been for our suffering brethren one more resource—an appeal to the Court of Cassation, which is the Supreme Court; but an eminent pious lawyer has advised not to make that appeal, as it would be altogether useless, and the Supreme Court would do nothing but confirm the previous sentence. In the mean while a temple has been built at Estissac, at an expense of $4000. What will be done I know not, but our friends are resolved to obey God rather than man.

The reports concerning the Madiai are of a conflicting nature. First, the Opinione, of Turin, announced the death of the husband, which was at once telegraphed to London. A few days after this report was contradicted by the Courrier Suisse, of Lausanne, which which declared that a Protestant Clergyman had just obtained special permission to visit Francesco, and found his health improving. These two contradictory statements are the foundation of all the articles published in the religious periodicals of Europe during the last fortnight. We have not yet received in Paris any confirmation of the one or the other, and neither paper giving their authorities, we scarcely know which to believe. It appears, however, probable that Francesco Madial is not dead, and the report of his death has been circulated by the Papists in order that the Tuscan Government may not be teased any more about his release.

The Pantheon has now become the Church of St. Genevieve, the patroness saint of Paris, and upon the occasion of the dedication (2d January and following days) the relicts of the saint were brought out and—worshipped; for I cannot give any other name to their bowings and kneelings, by hundreds of thousands. And this in the Metropolis of civilized France, in the Nineteenth Century! What next?

The present winter is remarkable for its incessant rains, and its uninterrupted mildness. The rains have caused inundations almost every where. Even the Seine, which seldom overflows its banks, is now so high in Paris as to render all navigation impossible. Now and then the weather clears up, but it is only for a few hours. The usual New Year's Day's sales have suffered a great deal from this.

As to the mildness of the weather it is most extraordinary. I do not think the thermometer has yet fallen here below the freezing point. The consequence is that vegetation is two or three months in advance of what it is expected to be at this time of the year, to the great sorrow of farmers, whose hopes of a good crop may be ruined in a single night by a hard frost. Almond trees and peach trees are in full bloom—the fields are as green as in May—the flower and the kitchen gardens are equally advanced. On New Year's Day I saw a lilac tree the leaves of which were fully developed.

About politics there is but little to say. The Empire has at length been acknowledged by all the European Powers. Napoleon cannot find a wife, though he is said to keep a sharp look out on the marriageable Princesses that exist any where under the sun. En attendant, he is giving numerous balls and soirees, and making almost every body a member of the "Legion of Honor," so that the day is fast approaching when a man who is not decorated will be quite a rarity worth looking at. At the Bourse a most scandalous game appears to have been going on, in which Fould is sadly implicated. No doubt he will get off, through the intervention of the Government.

LET THE FAIR DECIDE IT.

Some of the idle and titled dames of England lately held an anti-slavery convention, at their safe distance from the scene of relief and responsibility, and addressed, through the Dutchess of Sutherland, a circular on the subject to the women of America. This gives a new and interesting character to the agitation. Man, having exhausted his energies in the contest, hands the strife over to the more enduring and invincible companion of his troubles. A cotemporary of the secular press gives this lively sketch of the case; and gallantly consents to a transfer of the responsibilities:

The Duchess of Sutherland imitates the sentimental philanthropist, who left his grandmother to die of want, and was found weeping over a dead ass in the road. She has hundreds of poor Highlanders on her Scotch estates, whose condition would excite the pity and commiseration of our happy negroes—but that they are too near to be seen by the telescope, which is the indispensable instrument of all these theoretical philanthropists. So the Duchess prefers to employ her charity in behalf of such distant subjects as our negroes, and in creating troubles in our household.

But thanks to the patriotism and gallantry of our own fair sex, Mrs. Stowe and the Duchess of Sutherland, backed by the Mrs. Jellybys of England, are not likely to have the field to themselves. A second Ivanhoe has entered the lists against these formidable knights-errant, in the lovely person of Mrs. Julia Gardiner Tyler, the beautiful wife of John Tyler, once President of the United States. Mrs. Tyler was, some years ago, the "cynosure of all eyes" in the gay circles in Washington, as the elegant, graceful, spirituelle Miss Gardiner. A New Yorker by birth, she was long a reigning belle of that city. The pleasant bon hommie and kindly suavity of the ex-President won her from the crowd of eager, ardent and more youthful aspirants. She became Mrs. Tyler, and the happy couple settled down at the handsome residence of the ex-President, on James river. Here, a few years enabled Mrs. T. to observe closely the condition of our negroes—to study the nature of that institution which she had been educated to regard as a great curse and evil.

The result of this study has been the same in her case, as in that of all other persons who have pursued the same course of honest observation. With these views, Mrs. Tyler gallantly accepts the gauntlet of the Duchess of Sutherland, and replies to her manifesto in a letter, full of palpable hits at the Mrs. Jellebys of England, and of honest graphic forcible views in defence of slavery. This letter is a demolisher. There could be no better evidence of it than the fact that it has thrown Greeley into a perfect paroxysm of rage and indignation. He has lost all sense of gallantry and propriety, if he ever had any, and abuses a lady of the highest character with the scurrility and violence of a fish-woman. This is a great compliment to the power and vigor of Mrs. T's. blows at fanaticism and negro-philism. We feel now perfectly willing to leave the whole subject to be contested, debated and settled, by the ladies of England and the United States. Let the men stand aside and allow the ladies fair play.

PRE-EMINENT TACTICS.—The Reverend Mr. Holmes, a Baptist clergyman, says an exchange, some time since made a very sensible request of his audience, which might be advantageously concurred in by every congregation. He proposed that the ridiculous habit so prevalent in Church, of a whole pew-full of gentlemen arising, and filing out into the aisle, merely to give one or two ladies a seat in the other end of the pew, should be at once abandoned; and the ladies, when coming into Church, would take their seats in the end of the pews vacant, quietly and without disturbing the whole congregation. A contemporary, however, that is in habit of canvassing consequences, contingencies and results pretty closely, suggests that if the desirable reform can't be brought about, the following routine, or system of tactics, be adopted, that the thing may be well done, if at all:

"Suppose, then, that six men are quietly seated in a pew upon the right hand side of the broad aisle, when a lady proposes to herself the somewhat difficult task of taking possession of the remotest seat, which a foolish custom has assigned for the special occupancy of the elder lady of a household, or in default of her presence, any lady or anything that wears petticoats, though it be but a child. This she proposes to take possession of, "peacefully, if she can; forcibly if she must." Happily the sterner sex are disposed to yield the point, and it is desirable that it be done with grace. This can be done in this way:

"Let the lady advance one pace beyond the door of the pew, halt, about face, and salute. The pew must then be vacated by a flank movement. The squad occupying it should rise simultaneously, then deploy into the aisle, the head man facing the lady, and the rest passing to his right and rear, changing the direction of line by a right countermarch, and forming again in line, up and down the aisle, still faced by the right flank.

"The lady, when she sees the coast clear, completes her salute, and advances at once to her position in the pew. The gentlemen break off by files, from the rank, and resume their places. Great care should be taken, of course, by other parties, not to enter the aisle, where this evolution is in progress, until it is completed.

TRUE PROGRESS.—Senator Clemens, of Alabama, in a speech in the United States Senate, drew this graphic and glowing sketch of the "thing called progress:"

This thing called progress, in the eyes of many, covers all defects and makes atonement for every error. If it mean that glorious spirit which sweeps abroad upon the wings of peace, shedding life, and light, and happiness over the land and on the sea; which sends the missionary among the heathen, and gathers the infidel and unbeliever beneath the Gospel's ample shield; which doubles the productions of earth and lays bare the treasures of ocean; which plants the Church of God in the wilderness of the West, and substitutes the Sabbath bell for the howl of the panther; which carries literature and science to the log-cabin of the pioneer, and connects every part of this wide Republic by links so strong and so close that the traveler feels every spot he treads, his home, and every bond he grasps a brother's hand—if this be the progress which is meant, most gladly do I enlist under its banner.

ORNAMENTAL SERMONS.—The preachers in the time of the Commonwealth, says the Harpers' Magazine, looked upon coughing and hemming as ornaments of speech; and when they printed their sermons, noted in the margin where the preacher coughed or hemmed. The practice was not confined to England, for Olivor Molliard, a Cordelier, and famous orator, printed a sermon at Brussels, in the year 1500, and marked in the margin where the preacher hemmed once or twice or coughed.

ADVICE TO PARENTS.—Beware of smiling at that trick—that nice little trick of the prattler at your side. Very cunning—very smart, isn't it? Especially in that little fellow? But, what is the principle involved? How would it look if the actor or speaker were a grown up son or daughter—a man or woman? Parents would do well to observe the rule not to show an approval, or merition in any way, of any trait in a child, which they would not wish should "grow with his growth and strengthen with his strength."

"THE PULPIT ELOQUENCE OF LUTHER" is the title of a new work about to be published in Germany. Professor Tholuck has lately brought out a new work called, "The Spirit of the Lutheran Theologians of Wittenberg, in the Seventeenth Century." He has long been collecting materials for a history of Rationalism.

CHINESE TRACTS.—The American Tract Society has donated to the China Missionaries, Rev. Messrs. Taylor and Jenkins, $200 for publishing tracts in the Chinese language.

RESIGNATION OF BISHOP IVES.—The following letter from Bishop Ives, who has lately joined the Catholic Church, he addressed to the Convention of the Protestand Episcopal Church, in the Diocese of North Carolina:

ROME, Wednesday, Dec. 22, 1852.

DEAR BRETHREN—Some of you, at least, are aware that for years doubts of the validity of my office as Bishop have at times harrassed my mind and greatly enfeebled my action. At other times, it is true, circumstances have arisen to overrule these doubts, and to bring to my mind temporary relief. But it has been only temporary, for, in spite of resolutions to abandon the reading and the use of Catholic books; in spite of earnest prayers and entreaties that God would protect my mind against the distressing influence of Catholic Truth; and in spite of public and private professions and declarations, which in times of suspended doubt I sincerely made to shield myself from suspicion and win back the confidence of my diocese, which had been well nigh lost—in spite of all this, and of many other considerations which would rise up before me, as the necessary consequence of suffering my mind to be carried forward in the direction in which my doubts pointed, these doubts would again return with increased and almost overwhelming vigor, goading me at times to the very borders of derangement.

Under these doubts, I desired temporary relief from duties that had become no delighting to me, and determined to accompany Mrs. Ives, whose health demanded a change of climate, in a short absence abroad. But absence has brought no relief to my mind. Indeed, the doubts that disturbed it have grown into clear and settled convictions; so clear and settled that, without a violation of conscience and honor, and every obligation of duty to God and His Church, I can no longer remain in my position.

I am called upon, therefore, to do me act of self-sacrifice, in view of which all other self-sacrificing acts of my life are less than nothing; called upon to sever the ties which have been strengthened by long years of love and forbearance, which have bound my heart to many of you, as was David's to that of Jonathan, and make my heart bleed as my hand traces the sentence which separates all pastoral relation between us, and conveys to you the knowledge that I hereby resign into your hands my office as Bishop of North Carolina; and further, that I am determined to make my submission to the Catholic Church.

In addition (my feelings will allow me only to say), as this act is earlier than any perception of my own, and antedates by some months, the expiration of the time for which I asked leave of absence, and for which I so promptly received from members of your body an advance of salary, I hereby renounce all claim upon the same, and acknowledge myself bound, on an intimation of your wish, to return whatever you have advanced to me beyond this 22d day of December.

With continued affection and esteem, I pray you to allow me still to subscribe myself,

Your faithful friend, etc.,

L. SILLIMAN IVES.

REVOLT OF THE MONTENEGRINS.—The European papers have recently contained intelligence of a formidable insurrection in the western part of Turkey, upon the Adriatic.

Montenegro, so called from the sombre appearance of the mountain forests, is inhabited by Sclavonians—a bold, warlike and hospitable people, but inclined to robbery. They number about 60,000, can bring into the field 15,000 good soldiers, and have never yet been reduced to complete subjection by the Turks. In 1797 they dissolved all connection with Turkey, and formed an independent State under the protection of Russia. They belong to the Greek Church. Their religion, when connected with their former history, lends some plausibility to the rumor that Russia is about to espouse their quarrel, and also accounts for so large an additional force as 30,000 men being sent to put down an otherwise insignificant revolt:

AN INCIDENT IN THE CAPITOL.—A Washington correspondent of the Concord Democrat, writing January 22 says:

Yesterday, in the House, a poor lady over 60 years of age, who had been for six years prosecuting a claim on Congress, in the name of her mother, a woman 89 years old, was the occasion of quite a scene. The bill, at last, after many days of hope deferred and anxious poverty, was brought up. The lady herself, who was present, and in scant attire of sable, listened to the debate with painful interest, and when at last the indications that the bill would pass, became too evident to be doubted, the long-pent emotions of her heart were stronger than her strength, and she fainted and fell insensible on the floor. The claim, amounting to some $2000, was put through instanter. Never did woman faint in better time. There was hardly a show of opposition."

NEW JERSEY LIQUOR LAW.—A bill reported by a special committee in the New Jersey Legislature, prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal, chemical and mechanical purposes. Any person manufacturing or being common sellers without authority, to be fined $100 on first conviction, and costs, in default of payment to be imprisoned sixty days, and give a bond of $1000; second conviction to pay $200 and costs, in default to be imprisoned four months; on the third and subsequent convictions to pay $200 and be imprisoned four months. Judges are authorised to issue search warrants to search dwellings, to find liquor kept for sale. The owner of liquor seized to appear and show cause, and if he fail to appear, or cannot prove that it was imported, and is contained in the original packages, or is kept in accordance with the law, the liquor is to be forfeited, and the person made subject to penalties.

A German physician is said to be about to publish in German a scientific condemnation of the present loose sleeves worn by ladies. He asserts that they promote rheumatism, and all kinds of complaints, and recommends a return to the long and loose sleeves of a former period.

METHODIST PRESS.

A PIONEER PREACHER.—The N. W. Christian Advocate, published at Chicago, Ill., gives some account of the labors of Father Walker, one of the itinerants that planted Methodism in the West, in the days that tried preachers' souls:

In his wanderings he became acquainted with Wm. Smith Tee, a man of large property in the mines at Potosi, in Missouri, of noble and generous impulses, but awfully profane and wicked, who formed for Father Walker a sincere affection, and admiration for his zeal.

Sometime after the success of his efforts at St. Louis, Walker deemed it his duty to go and preach at Potosi, the Sodom of the West, where Satan and sin held undisputed sway. He made an appointment to preach there on the Sabbath. Satan and his servants were enraged, and resolved that the preaching of the Gospel should not disturb his kingdom there. Word was sent to Walker that if he came there to preach, they would "regulate" him: that is, mob him. He replied, that "God had required him to do so and he should obey." Tee heard of the threats, and the reception preparing for his friend, and asked him if he "really intended to go and preach to those devils at Potosi!" He told them he "thought it his duty, and he was going." "Well," said Tee, "you are a great fool to suppose you can do any good to these reprobates, but if you want to try, you shall have a chance; don't be afraid, I will be there, and they shall hear the Gospel once in their lives, at any rate."

On the day appointed, Walker mounted his horse, shouldered his rifle, and rode to Potosi. He there found assembled some three hundred as probably as desperate and wicked men as ever congregated in the West, all armed to the teeth. Tee was also there, who was of Herculean strength, with a large party of his men. When Walker rode up, Tee mounted a stump and told them "Walker was a Minister; he did not know anything about his religion; he knew he was a brave man and a clever fellow: and though he was a great fool to think his religion could do any good to such a set of scape-gallows as they, (interlarding his speech with oaths and imprecations,) he wanted to preach to them, and he should do it, and they must hear him. And now," said he, "you know me—the first one who interrupts him, goes from this place a dead man." And then turning to his friend—"Walker," said he, "now give them hell-fire and damnation, for they deserve it." Walker set his rifle down, mounted the stump, sung and prayed, and feeling that God had made the wicked his protection, and indicated that he had sent him, he preached in the power and demonstration of the Spirit. A revival broke out, an entire reformation occurred, and its fruits remain to this day. Truly, "the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to all that believe."

SABBATH MEMORIAL.—The Southern C. Advocate contains a dignified and well-put memorial to the stockholders of the South Carolina Railroad, touching the desecration of the Subbath by the Company's operations. It is drawn up and submitted in behalf of the South Carolina Conference, by a committee appointed for the purpose. It seems the Conference is involved as a share holder in the capital and dividends. Surely it is time that a remonstrance be made from that quarter. At least, the Conference has a right to complain. They say:

That the employment of the Christian Sabbath for purposes of labor by the company, depreciates the value of the stock in market; inasmuch as it prevents many persons from becoming purchasers, through honest and conscientious scruples. Some individuals have already disposed of their stock on this very account: and to the certain knowledge of your memorialists, many others are deterred from purchasing by this consideration. The present position of your memorialists may be adduced in illustration of this fact. Exclusive of what is held by individuals, they own stock as a corporation, to the amount of $8000, and bonds of the company to the amount of $3000 more. Some members of the South Carolina Conference are opposed to the continuance of that body as a stockholder, only from conscientious considerations connected with the profanation of the Sabbath. If these scruples are not removed by some action of your body, that corporation will be compelled to sell out their stock, or submit to the withdrawal of some of their members. And it might be well to ask, how many other religious and charitable societies may desire to invest their funds in this company, and may be withheld by the same consideration. It must be perfectly obvious to every mind, that the stock of the company is reduced in its market value by any cause, whatever it may be, which excludes or drives off purchasers.

The memorialists, among other forcible considerations, bring the following to bear on the railroad management:

Laborers in the employment of the company are entitled to all those claims of humanity which are common to our nature. Not the least among these is the rest demanded, alike by the constitution of body and mind, of one day in seven. The nature of the service required of those in the employ of the Railroad Company, is such as does not even afford the recreation of public holidays. Is it right, is it justice, to any class of men in any station or pursuit in life, to cut them off from every opportunity of domestic tranquility and enjoyment, and doom them to toil without intermission, and to labor without rest? Even if the laborer does not choose to avail himself of the religious advantages of the day—if he has no inclination to lead his wife and children to the house of God, and acknowledge with gratitude the goodness of his Creator—yet the humanizing influences of home and of a day spent in quietness in the bosom of his family, are incalculable. The prospect of the coming rest cheers him through the work of the week; and the enjoyment of it reanimates him for another six days' toil. But the absence of a weekly Sabbath and the holy associations of home, makes life's labor a cheerless task; and is, doubtless, one of the greatest causes in promoting a carelessness and recklessness, eminently dangerous in such a service.

It is well worty the consideration of the stockholders, how many competent and efficient persons are kept from seeking employment, where it can be had only at such a sacrifice.

THAT PIG.—The Helston Advocate gives an account of going the whole hog (or pig) that pleases us:

Rev. William Bruce, a local preacher in Powel's Valley, some time ago set apart a pig to fatten and sell for the Chinese Mission. But at the time of Brother Cunnyngham's leaving for China last year, the pig was not sold, and he did not know what the avails of his pig would be, but guessing at it, he paid over eight dollars, after that time his pig grew and fattened so that it brought fourteen dollars, and he has sent us the three dollars not paid over before.

STOPPED.—The Illinois Christian Advocate, owned and conducted by McKendree College, Ill., has ceased to be.

HELPED, AND NOT HURT.—The Christian Advocate and Journal being hard pressed in controversy, and unable to restrain to rampant cotemporary organ at Auburn, on account of its very exclusiveness, did some time ago as a desperate resort, try to stop the editor by advising his subscribers to stop his paper. This has turned out a wind-fall to the Northern Christian Advocate. The editor records it:

Many who have never seen the paper, have sent us, at once, their names and money—as they wished to discountenance the proscriptive course of our cotemporary at New York. Others have been induced to renew their subscriptions who had intended to stop, and agents, who were languid, have taken fresh hold of the work.

TRACT STEWARD.—Rev. A. Stevens writes to Zion's Herald, that the New Tract Society has just brought out an edition of Carmens, at very low rates, and will begin operations without least 400 Tracts. They have cut out a new officer:

One of its propositions is, that every Church should form an auxiliary, or where this is not deemed desirable, appoint a Tract Steward to take charge of the distribution of tracts and volumes once a month, or once a quarter, within its own limits, and also to see to the Annual Tract Contributions, whether public or private. This officer should be appointed by the "Official Board," and at the next General Conference, will, it is hoped, be made a member of the Quarterly Conference. What present member of that body, except the pastor himself, can be more useful than such an officer! This new appointment, if the incumbent be the right sort of a man, will soon have a visible effect upon the whole Church.

WHAT THE WOMEN CAN DO.—Exchanges abound with notices of the success of Christian effort in redeeming the "Five Points"—a well known festering point of New York. There, it seems, vice in all forms cumulated and gendered for long years. The Augean stables were not more unclean. The moral putridity of the place disgusted and discouraged those who turned a thought upon it. The "Old Brewery" was its head quarters. A few years ago some Christian ladies resolved to bring to bear the ameliorating and redeeming influence of their benevolence upon its inhabitants. They approached it prudently, with the usual appliances of Sunday Schools, etc. Lo, what a change! In the last Advocate and Journal, we find a description of the laying of the corner-stone on the site of the Old Brewery of Mission Rooms, on which occasion several ministers of various denominations were present and participating. All honor to the ladies—those noble women! They are such as St. Paul would have made mention of, as helping him. How it would change the face of things if others who sigh and exclaim, "Ah, oh! dear me!" at human woe, would do likewise:

Bishop Janes then laid the corner-stone, prefacing the ceremony with "a very felicitous exposition of the objects aimed at, and, as far as instrumentality can go, provided for by the excellent ladies whose practical benevolence and indomitable energy have so wonderfully changed the aspect of the scene. Education, he said, is to be promoted, therefore here is to be a free school-room; virtue and temperance are to be advanced, and here we have a lecture-room; the salvation of immortal souls is an end in view, and there will be a chapel in this edifice; and as temporal blessings will be an object also, here will be accommodation for the sick and needy."

MORE LINE, MORE LINE.—The Western Christian Advocate makes some extracts from a volume now in course of publication at the Cincinnati Book Concern, in which is a sketch of a man who must have made a stir in his time:

Rev. John Strange died at Indianapolis December 2, 1832. He was received on trial into the Western Conference in 1810, when he was not quite 21 years of age. His ministerial life was spent in Ohio and Indiana. It is not our object to give an account of his labors; for that would require a volume; but to give a brief notice, and attempt a faint sketch of the man as one of the prominent actors in the early history of Methodism in Indiana. Strange was tall and slender, and stood remarkably erect. His hair was black as a raven, and his eyes were a mild blue, yet remarkably brilliant when he was animated. His education was not very thorough; yet he was a close student, and but few men ever had a better command of language than he. For years he was in the habit of carrying Walker's octavo dictionary in his saddle-bags, and of studying it closely; and thus he acquired a very ready and happy use of language, and his storehouse of words seemed inexhaustible. His great attention to the choice of words frequently made his style quite florid and ornate. His leading mental traits were feeling and imagination, and, as a consequence, his sermons were highly descriptive. Sometimes his imagination would tower and soar aloft, till his hearers would be carried in feeling and fancy to the third heaven. He could paint a panoramic scene with the hand of a master, and he frequently employed metaphoric representations with wonderful effect. Once, when preaching on the love of God, he compared it to an ocean, and then he endeavored to sound it with a line. While letting down his line, he became most impassioned, and cried out, at the top of his shrill voice, "More line—more line!" and the effect was to enrapture and convulse the entire congregation on a large encampment, while they seemed lost in wonder and adoration at the unfathomable depths of God's love to a lost world.

INFIDELITY DESPERATE.—Our readers may have seen a marvelous statement going about, that a distinguished English geologist recently stated that among the results to which Layard and Rawlinson have been led, by their researches at Ninovah, is the following: That the prophecies of Daniel were undoubtedly written after the events to which they refer had taken place, and that the whole of this book is probably nothing but a political satire!

This is an absurd story. Layard, when publishing a work on the results of his researches, would hardly have omitted such an item: hardly. The Richmond Advocate accounts at it in this proper style:

Infidelity has a face of brass, a heart of stone, and a very treacherous or convenient memory. Foiled at one point of attack against Christianity, it retreats to another; driven from its entrenchments it maintains a running fight through the whole realm of doubt; whipped in every contest, it rubs its conscience with oblivious-salve, forgets all of its past failures and misfortunes, and seeks by all the arts and strategies of inglorious war, to surprise, deceive and capture the hangers on about the Christian camp. It has all the rampant qualities of the prophetic he-goat pushing and stamping with an unconquerable desire to hurt somebody—or, to break his own horns short off in his mad violence.

OBITUARY:

DIED—In Macon county, Alabama, Feb. 5, WILLIAM BOX, infant son of Rev. Wm. P. Miller, having nearly completed his fourth year. Another golden link is added to the chain that binds the hearts of the bereaved parents to heaven.

Friend after friend departs.
Who has not lost a friend?
There is no union here of hearts,
But here must have an end.

MRS. LOUISA JOHNS was born in Kentucky 27th of April, 1817, and died in Iberville Parish, La., on the 14th of January, 1853.

She was among the first who attached herself to our Church at Plaquemine, and she was the Church's brightest ornament and most devoted friend. Not satisfied with the atmosphere common Christians breathe, her soul sought a height where it could be regaled with a purer element—that Christian love which enables the possessor, even under the most adverse circumstances, with rapture to exclaim, "Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life or by death. For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." Phil. i. 20, 21.

She was always among the foremost in every good work—it was her delight to make herself useful in the Church. Her works shall praise her. In her death the ministry has lost a strong and sympathizing friend. Those who have been pastors of the Methodist Church in Plaquemine know well its worth. She was always at her post, not only at Church, but at class meetings, and experience here, poured forth with childlike simplicity, but which gushed from a heart warm end overflowing with the love of God always encouraged her class-mates, and cheered the heart of her pastor. How encouraging to the preacher is the assurance that devoted souls duly bosiege by faith in the throne of grace in his behalf! She was an example in charity. One-tenth of her income she yearly gave for benevolent purposes. Over this rule made by all the members of the Christian Church, every avenue of sorrow would be dried up as far as wealth can be poured towards that object. Our missionary treasury would be full to overflowing, enlarged scenes of missionary enterprise would be seen, and the everlasting gospel would then be felt in her hallowed influences in every part of the habitable globe.

Sister Johns was a daughter of affliction, several times after she embraced religion, was brought to the verge of the grave. It was a privilege to see her at these seasons. She feared no evil, for she had the rod and staff of Jehovah on which to lean. It is true, she has gone to earth were strong, for she had many friends whom she loved us a Christian can love, but she looked forward with unfaltering hope to that better land where our friends will meet never to part. She has also one child—a daughter—for whom she felt the deepest anxiety. Her daughter, in verging upon womanhood, has her sister's bright Christian example before her. All her prayers unnumbered stand at the throne of God in her behalf.

During health she had read her Bible diligently and prayerfully. In looking over it I find that the most pointed promises, and those passages which more than others she felt that suited her, were marked with pencil. In fact, here is the best marked Bible that I have ever seen. Now, when her arm is no longer able to hold up the Blessed Book, she would get her sister-in-law, Mrs. Jones, to read it for her, while her countenance would light up with joy as her soul was drinking in the rich draughts of divine truth. She would say, "I have prayed that the promises of God would be to me as springs of water in a dry and thirsty land, and now I have the most need of them, I find them so."

About three weeks before her death, it was her privilege, in company with her pastor, to visit the chamber of this dying saint. She was very low, scarcely able to speak even in a whisper, but perfectly happy, waiting with all patience till her change should come. It was a glorious privilege to behold a Christian triumphing over death. I shall ever look back to that visit as a green spot on the page of memory. In the radiant light of faith and hope—

O what is death? 'tis life's vast shore,
Where vanities are vain no more;
Where all pursuits their goal attain
And life is all retouched again.

A SONG.

...By Mas. H. J. Lewis.

I would I were asleep, mother,
Beneath that mossy bed,
Where many a tender flower you nursed
Hath lain its weary head:
And mine that aches with bitter grief
Would fain beside them droop,
And join on earth and meet in heaven
That well remembered group.

Where tears, like summer showers, mother,
Held strong through transient sway,
They passed into the spirit land—
Their tears all wiped away:
Oh! why shall that blessed throng
Was I not gathered too,
Not to move with painful step
Like wildering mazes through?

My head upon thy breast, mother,
My arms around me thrown,
I say not that I would shrink to treat
Death's dreary pass alone;
And do not weep above my grave,
Set rather smile to think
The mother filled from bitter fount
Was shattered on its brink.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

Law School—Louisiana University.

On last Monday evening the students in the Law Department held a meeting for the purpose of electing a valedictorian for the next Commencement day. On the third ballot Mr. Hayes, of Canada, was elected. Mr. Hayes is a young man of fine abilities, and well qualified to deliver a valedictory oration. Wesley P. Winans, Esq., of this State, was last year elected to deliver the oration to the Alumnæ on the next Commencement day.

STEAMBOAT DISASTER.—At or about 10 A. M. Tuesday, the steamer "John Swasey," out of the Yazoo, with a full load of cotton—near 2000 bales—took fire in her wood ranks when nearly opposite Jefferson City. A short distance in her rear was the "Rockaway," which in her endeavors to pass the "Swasey," not knowing her to be on fire, caught a few sparks which ignited her cargo of cotton, but owing to its timely discovery, it was happily subdued without her sustaining serious injury. On the Swasey, unfortunately, the scene was different—approaching the city with a full gale of wind from the south, the fire having originated underneath the cotton, it was not discovered until it was past human means to save her and the cargo from destruction. But while the property was inevitably doomed, the officers of the boat knew that other responsibilities than the protection of property rested on their shoulders. Human life was entrusted to their care, and recognizing the importance of the trust, nobly did they stand up to their duty. While all was confusion on board, the pilot on watch, with his pilot-house in flames, was seen standing coolly at his post, and regardless of his own safety, using his endeavors to secure that of the passengers and crew.

For the credit of humanity, we would like to register the names of the brave and faithful officers, but regret very much to state we were unable to learn his name, however, his best reward is the consciousness of having nobly and manfully acquitted him of his duty. Noting the rapid progress of the fire, he held the boat hard in for the Bretna dock against which he ran her, for the purpose of affording the passengers an opportunity of escape. Many—all who could—availed themselves of the chance, and the boat swinging off in the stream, the engineers stopped her and all hands engaged in throwing overboard the burning cargo.

Drifting in this state she swung in at the foot of Illinois street, and from her fire was communicated to the "Texas," "St. Charles" and the "Postboy." The Texas of the "Texas" was consumed, when she, with the "Postboy," the latter of which had received but slight damage, bore away for Algiers, where they are now lying. With the "St. Charles" it was, however, different, for near half an hour she was side and side with the burning steamer, and but for the indefatigable exertions of our fire department, must have been a total loss. As it was, the injury received by her was very serious.

The Swasey was burned to the water's edge, and most of the cargo is lost; but we have heard of but one instance of loss of life, in the case of the cook, who, in a temporary state of stupefaction from the smoke, fell overboard and was drowned. The Eliza, Capt. Stevens, who had up steam, it being her hour of departure, took in tow some three boats and removed them from the scene of danger. The steamer Eclipse was hauled out in the stream to avoid her being made a feature in the conflagration. At one time the scene appeared ominous of the destruction of a great number of steamers and shipping.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.—At a late hour yesterday afternoon the cotton, part of the cargo of the Swasey, was burning on the Levee, but a careful watch being kept upon it, no further danger was anticipated. We take pleasure in announcing that the pilot on watch at the time of the discovery of the disaster was Mr. Pope Oldham. His courage is well known, but at the same time it rests with us to chronicle the fact that his presence of mind did not desert him on such a trying emergency, but sustained him in his laudable endeavors to effect the preservation of life. Mr. Robert Fletcher, mate, who was on watch on the hurricane deck, had stationed hands with buckets to guard against the occurrence of a fire, but observing it, he quietly gave notice that it had originated. Hearing it, Mr. Oldham, who had a brother in the pilot house, a "striker," learning the river, told him the boat was on fire, to save himself and leave the pilot house; the brother rejoined he would stand by him. Again he was told to seek his safety, and that after the brother (Pope) had looked to the passengers, he would secure his own escape. Soon after the landing at Gretna was effected, Mr. Oldham, by a desperate leap through the rear of the pilot house, on to the hurricane deck, was enabled to affect his own release from his dangerous position by precipitating himself into the river and swimming on shore. There was a collapse through the escapement pipe and the boat remained at the mercy of the three elements, until reaching the city side of the river, where, after burning to the line, she sunk in twenty fathoms water. The load of the boat was one thousand six hundred and ninety-nine bales. No blame is or can be attached to the officers of the boat, for the accident is one liable to occur, despite all precautionary measures.

Later from Havana.

The steamship Isabel at Charleston brought dates from Havana and Key West to the 8th instant. Mr. King arrived at Havana on the 6th instant, and on his arrival in the Fulton the British sloop-of-war Vestal sent a boat to the steamer asking him if he would receive a salute. He declined doing so, and on going ashore took up his quarters at an American boarding-house.

We take from the Charleston Courier the following Key West correspondence:

KEY WEST, February 8, 1853.

Messrs. Editors—On the 4th instant, Mr. King, Vice President elect of the United States, embarked for this place, accompanied by his two nieces, Mrs. Ellis and Miss King, on board of the United States steamer Fulton, Lieutenant Commanding, Murray, for Havana, but did not go to sea before the following day, in consequence of the heavy sea, and the wind being from southeast.

Mr. King's health is rather improved, and he was enabled to enjoy several rides during his stay in our most delicious climate. Since my last, the British ship Lucy has been got off, and towed to this port and discharged; a short time after floating, in consequence of very bad weather the wreckers, and her first officer, (Captain Hiseltou being here) cut away her fore, main and mizzen mast; if is said that she will be repaired. The British brig Cambyses has been condemned and ordered to be sold. Capt. Wilson has gone to Havana to charter some vessel to take his cargo of cotton and corn to Liverpool. On the 31st, the schooner J. S. Burges, of Elizabeth City, N. C., arrived here in charge of wreckers. She was from Black River, Jamaica, for New York, with an assorted cargo of rum, sugar, pimento, pewter, etc., etc. While on her passage, she lost some of her sails, and crossed the reef, near Key Vacas, to come here to replace the same. On the 1st, some of our wrecking vessels arrived here from Tortugas, with the captain, his lady, etc., and crew of Bark Edgar, of Boston, Pendleton, master, from New Orleans for Norfolk. The bark had bilged and gone to pieces, losing almost the entire cargo; a few barrels and half barrels of molasses and whisky were saved, but all of the sugar was washed out of the tierces before the gale abated, so as to admit the wreckers to work—what has been saved has been sold, and 50 per cent. awarded as salvage, and Capt. Pendleton and family leave this piece in the Isabel for your city.

The ship Union, of Boston, has been ashore on the quick sands, half way between this place and Tortugas, and got off after being ashore some forty hours, without assistance. She was from New Orleans for Liverpool with a cargo of 5000 bbls flour and 900 bales cotton. A brig passing through our northwest channel, reports a large ship had been ashore on the banks, with a cargo of 2500 bales cotton, and that the English wreckers had taken out 400 or 500 bales, and got her off, and while in the act of towing her to Nassau, N. P., her mast having been cut away, a gale came on and obliged them to cut her adrift. They think for the direction of the winds, she must have been driven over this side, and likely gone ashore in the neighborhood of Cape Canaveral. OBSERVER.

Mme. Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt has just presented a considerable sum in money clothes, bedding and provisions to two charitable institutions recently established at Stockholm—the hospital of St. Magdelene and the institution of the Deaconesses. The celebrated cantatrice, who is at present residing at Dresden, has promised to visit Stockholm in the holy week, to take part in two religious concerts, which are to be given in the cathedral, for the benefit of the poor. In these concerts Mendelssohn's oratorio of "St. Paul" and Handel's oratorio of "Messiah," with the instrumentation of Mozart, are to be performed. They have never been executed in public at Stockholm.

A letter from Leghorn in the Parliaments of Turin states that the Duke of Parma had suddenly dismissed all the French ladies and gentlemen belonging to his household, and in that of the Duchess. Among them are the Countess de Forest, of an illustrious family in Provence, who has been shut up in a convent. The father of the latter, however, has demanded her liberation in very strong terms.

A letter from Constantinople, of the 8th ult., in the Post Amptl Gazette of Frankfort, says: "Abd-el-Kader arrived here yesterday, but he has not been presented to the Sultan on account, it is said, of a difficulty which has arisen between M. de Lavalette and Fuad Effendi on the form in which the presentation should take place."

A dreadful accident occurred at Constantinople on the 4th. A ship was conveying forty soldiers of foreground to a steam frigate about to leave for Dalmatia and it was driven by the violence of the currents against a large vessel anchored near the Seraglio. The shock was so violent that all the men were thrown into the waters, and they, being incumbered with their arms and baggage, were all drowned with the exception of four or five, who were picked up by the boats of the English, Russian and French men-of-war.

ENGLAND AND THE SLAVE TRADE IN CUBA.—The English press boldly charge the Spanish Government with conniving at the slave trade, and a very forcible article upon the subject, published in the London Times, contains the following significant declaration:

"Better that the 'Lone Star' of America should revolutionize Cuba; that the authority of the Court of Madrid should be expelled from its most valuable remaining possession—than that it should be allowed to renew in all its ancient abominations the outrages on Africa. And this, it is to be hoped, Lord John Russell and his forthcoming successor, the Earl of Clarendon, will plainly tell the Court of Madrid. The British nation and Government can take no interest in the retention of Cuba by Spain, whilst Spain refuses to do—which recent experience has demonstrated she can easily do—suppress and terminate the slave trade in that island. It is useless longer to argue or to remonstrate with such a Court as that of Madrid; for reason and remonstrance it is now indispensable to substitute a determination that cannot be disregarded."

NEW BANKING LAW IN MISSOURI.—A very stringent bill to prevent illegal banking is now before the legislature of Missouri. It provides that any persons within the State except the Bank of the State of Missouri and its branches, who either directly or indirectly make, issue, or put in circulation, as currency, any note, bill, check, certificate of deposite, or other document, setting forth that the holder is entitled to receive a certain sum, or that it will be taken in payment of any debts, or exchange for property, shall forfeit for every offence five hundred dollars. The provisions of the bill are to apply to Missouri partners or persons without the State, who issue such paper and circulate it in Missouri. The counterfeiting of such paper and its signatures is declared to be no offence against the State.

THE INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT TREATY, which, it is said, has been prepared between the United States and Great Britain, is similar in its provisions to those of the international copyright treaty between France and England. Under its authority, the authors of book, of dramatic works of musical compositions, paintings, etc., etc., published and copyrighted in the United States, will, ipso facto, enjoy all the rights and privileges which an English copywright would secure to them to Great Britain; and, in like manner, a British copyright will possess the same legal authority in the United States as an entry in the clerk's office of the District Court, pursuant to an act of Congress. The only conditions imposed on American authors are the registration of their copyright in Stationer's Hall, and a strict compliance with the laws of Great Britain in respect to the deposit of a copy of their work in the British Museum, where similar restrictions are imposed on British authors. The treaty has not yet received the signatures of the contracting parties.

"MOTIVE POWER WITHOUT FUEL.—Among the many wonderful discoveries of the age, the Genoa correspondent of the Newark Advertiser notes that a complete revolution in the means of steam navigation is anticipated from a recent invitation by Dr. Carosio, of that city. He has, it is said, succeeded in constructing an apparatus for the decomposition of water by electro-magnetism, which will introduce the gases thus generated into the engine, in a way to save all the expense of fuel! His invention has been approved by savans and practical engineers, and a company has subscribed the means of giving it a full experiment. Means have also been adopted to secure patents in all other countries. Mr. J. B. Musso, a respectable merchant of Genoa, has started for the United States with letters from our Minister at Turin to the head of the Patent Office, at Washington." This appears to us to be a revamped edition of Palue's theory.

WEBSTER'S WORKS.—The New York Journal of Commerce states that the six large 8vo. volumes, constituting the works of Daniel Webster, have already passed through seven editions, and that another is immediately to be put to press. Two volumes of his letters are expected to be published in about four months, which we doubt not will be intensely interesting. Several hundred letters have already been collected by the gentleman having the matter in charge, and others are coming to light daily.

REDUCTION OF CHEAP FARES.—It is stated that since the reduction of fare to Albany on the Harlem Road, the receipts for through business have increased fifty per cent. This is another practical demonstration of what has been so often asserted and proven, that low fares almost invariably bring an increase of revenue. Many railroad companies now charging exhorbitant rates, and doing little more than paying current expenses, we have not a doubt would be astonished, themselves at the increase of their receipts, were they to evince little more of the spirit of the age, and reduce their fares just one-half.

NEW MALADY IN BENTON COUNTY, TENN.—We learn that an alarming malady has made its appearance in the Southwest part of this county. Several deaths have occurred in a few days. The patient is first taken with a chill, followed by a pain in the head and dies in a few hours. Young Mr. Nordon, a Mr. Cale an old lady and a boy have all died since last Thursday (Camden Tenn. Democrat, January 28.

RELIEF FOR MADEIRA.—The brig Tally Ho, chartered by the committee for the relief of the sufferers in the Island of Madeira, cleared on the 11th inst. She had on board 6,630 bushels of corn, 291 barrels of flour, and 400 pounds of rice, besides small quantities of other provisions. Her cargo is consigned to the United States Consul at Funchal, who will superintend the distribution of the provisions. It is proposed to send out another vessel on the same mission, and sums of money have been raised in various quarters for this object, but the amount is, as yet, inadequate.

POSTAGE TO FRANCE.—The Postmaster General officially announces that in accordance with the advice of the President of the United States, communicated to his department through the Hon. Secretary of State, and given on the personal solicitation of the French minister, the order of the 24th of January last, equalizing the rates of postage on all letters between the United States and France, via England, is hereby suspended for three months from the 10th instant.

OPPOSITION CAYENAL PALACE.—It is said there is serious talk in New York of getting up another crystal pele, to compete with the one already under way, to be located on Staten Island. The movement is backed by influence and capital, and very possibly it may succeed. It is proposed to build it of wood, and have it adapted for a permanent summer house, after the exhibition has closed.

The Uncle Tom excitement in Paris appears to have just begun. Musard has composed a Schottisch called Uncle Tom; Marx has published a quadrille, also called Uncle Tom, and M. Michelet announces a "Pensee Fugitive," entitled Eva; Bignorice is now called "Uncle Tom's candy" and a new play, founded on the story, has been produced at the Ambigu. Uncle Tom is a secondary character. He does not die in the piece, but gets off with a bastinado. The chief interest is centred in Eliza. The scenery is said to be exceedingly splendid.

CHINESE IMPERIAL.—Parrott's building in San Francisco, of one hundred feet in front, seventy or eighty feet deep, and four stories high, all of solid granite, was put up in Canton, block by block, by Chinese workmen; and the blocks being all numbered, the building was then taken down, put aboard ship, brought across the Pacific, and re-erected in San Francisco by the same hands.

COTTON.—It is stated that the wealthiest and most influential commercial organization in Europe has determined to send an agent to the United States, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the cotton-growers of the Southern States are disposed to throw off the Liverpool monopoly of cotton. The proposition is to create a continental depot for cotton.

Littlefield, the janitor, who discovered the remains of Dr Parkman, has just returned from California, where he is said to have cleared $25,000.

A return of the wine exported from Oporto during the year 1852, states the total export to have been 31,400 pipes of which 19,219 have gone to Great Britain; 1312 to other ports of Europe; 242 pipes to Portuguese possessions; 4452 pipes to the United States; 2833 pipes to Brazil, and 3450 pipes to other ports out of Europe.

NEW YORK, February 13, 8 P. M.

The Cunard steamer Niagara has arrived here, bringing dates from Liverpool to the 29th of January—three days later than the accounts brought by the Atlantic. She reports that the steamer Humboldt arrived at Southampton on Friday, the 25th of January. The Niagara came up at 7 o'clock this evening. The following is a summary of her commercial news.

Trade and Money.

Trade in the manufacturing districts has further improved during the week.

The London money market has slightly improved, and consols have advanced. The closing rates are 97½@98. The bullion in the Bank of England has further decreased £630,000. There has been no further change in the rates of interest. American securities are unchanged in rates, but with only small transactions during the week.

Havre Cotton Market.

The cotton market at Havre has been active, and the sales for the week ending January 25, embraced 11,000 bales—the 20th the sales were 4000 bales. The quotations are for Tres Ordinaire Orleans 91, and Tres Ordinaire Mobile and Uplands 89@90 francs.

General News.

BALLOT CARTELL.—It is reported that Francis Baring will soon succeed Mr. Gladstone as Chancellor of the Exchequer.

NEWMAN AND ACHILLI.—The Court has refused a new trial in the case of Achilli against Newman.

ANOTHER FAILURE.—The house of Hirsch & Co., of Amsterdam, has failed to halt a million pounds sterling in consequence of the forgeries of H. F. Price, the corn dealer.

WEATHER.—The weather has been favorable throughout Great Britain.

FRANCE.—LOUIS NAPOLEON'S MARRIAGE.—The civil contract of marriage between Louis Napoleon and the Countess Montego has been signed. Great preparations are making for the marriage.

Cherbourg has been declared open as a trans-Atlantic port.

LOANS TO SPAIN AND PRUSSIA.—The house of Baring Bros. & Co. has loaned fifty-seven million of reals to Spain, and the Rothschilds have loaned twenty million Rix dollars to Prussia.

TURKEY.—The Turkish Government are about sending thirty thousand new troops against the Montenegrins. It is thought that Russia will interfere. Austria is sending troops into Dalmatia.

Further by the Niagara.

It is reported that a further seduction is to be made in the French army. Louis Napoleon has declared that after his marriage, his Cabinet will not contain a single individual who has opposed his views on this subject.

California Steamers.

NEW YORK, February 13.

The steamers Northern Light and Uncle Sam arrived here to-day from San Juan and Aspinwall. They passed the Ohio off Kingston, Jamaica.

Congressional Proceedings.

WASHINGTON, February 10.

In the House, yesterday, nothing was done except to debate Mr. Cass' Monroe resolutions, to the delay of the regular business. To-day the post-office appropriation bill was passed, the rest of the time being occupied in a desultory debate.

In the Senate, the report of the Commissioners for the survey of the canal around the falls of the Ohio was read, after which the Deficiency bill was taken up and passed. The Railroad bill was then debated and passed, when the Tehuantepec question came up. A motion was made to postpone them, pending which the Senate adjourned.

General Pierce.

BOSTON, February 16.

Gen. Pierce left here to-day for New York en route to Washington City.

Congressional Proceedings.

WASHINGTON, February 15.

On and after Monday the House will meet at 11 o'clock, and will hold no evening sessions. In the House to-day, Mr. Davis reported a bill to adjust the difficulties growing out of the sale of swamp lands by the General Government, heretofore granted to States. The report was laid on the table after debate.

In the Senate, the Deficiency bill was taken up and debated. The amendments for light-houses on the Pacific were stricken out. Mr. Douglas addressed the Senate at length on the Monroe doctrine. With regard to Cuba, he said he was desirous to leave the Island alone as long as it remained loyal to Spain. If, however, the inhabitants asserts her independence and demands admission to the Union, and if Spain wishes to sell the Island, he is in favor of the purchase. He opposed Mr. Cass' resolution, but favored the principle asserted with regard to the English Colony at the Bay of Islands. Mr. Cass replied to Mr. Douglas.

Steamer for Japan.

NORFOLK, February 15.

The steamship-of-war Powhatan sailed to-day for China and Japan.

General Pierce.

BOSTON, February 15.

General Pierce arrived here to-day, and had a private interview with Caleb Cushing and Col. Greene. He declined a public reception.

Congressional Proceedings.

WASHINGTON, February 15.

In the Senate to-day, an amendment was adopted to the Deficiency bill, giving California three hundred thousand dollars for duties collected prior to her admission into the Union.

In the House the bill taken up relative to the coinage of half and quarter dollars, and dimes and half dimes, and after debate, passed.

The Ericsson Ship.

NEW YORK, February 15.

The Ericsson ship to-day made six miles per hour against the ebb tide.

Four Days Later from Europe—Arrival of the Alps—Cotton further Advanced—Marriage of Louis Napoleon.

NEW YORK, February 17—9:16 P. M.

The Cunard screw steamer Alps has arrived here, bringing dates from Liverpool to the 2d instant, four days later than the accounts brought by the Niagara. The following is a summary of her commercial news:

Liverpool Markets

LIVERPOOL, February 2.

There has been a good demand in the Liverpool market since the departure of the Niagara, and the sales of the three business days embrace 23,000 bales, of which 9000 were taken for speculation. Prices have advanced about ⅛d for all qualities, but the greatest improvement has been made in the lower grades. The quotations now are: for Fair Orleans 6¼d; Middling Orleans 6d; Fair Uplands 6¼d. and Middling Uplands 5¾d ₱ lb.

The Flour and Grain markets continue depressed, and both articles have considerably declined. Western Canal Flour is quoted at 25s. and Baltimore and Philadelphia brands 26s. 6d@27s. ₱ bbl. All qualities of corn have declined 2s ₱ quarter.

The Provision market has been firm. Beef has been in active request. For Pork there has been only a moderate demand. Bacon has been active, and is wanted at full prices. Lard is without change.

Tobacco a fair business has been transacted. There is no Rice on the market.

The America arrived at Liverpool on the 30th of January.

Marriage of Louis Napoleon—Political Pardons.

The marriage of Louis Napoleon took place on Saturday. Three thousand political offenders were pardoned on the occasion.

Still Later from Europe.

Arrival of the America—Cotton Firm.

NEW YORK, February 17, 11:10 P. M.

The Cunard mail steamer America arrived at Halifax this morning, bringing dates from Liverpool to the 5th inst. Her advices report a continued firm Cotton market at Liverpool, with a good demand: the sales of the week embracing 65,000 bales. Of these 10,000 were taken for speculation and 7000 for export. The quotations as fixed by the Board of Brokers on Friday evening, were as follows: Fair Orleans 6¾d.; Middling Orleans 6d.; Fair Uplands 6¼d., and Middling Uplands 5¾d. per lb.

The Flour market was still heavy. Western Canal was quoted at 25s. and Ohio at 26s. ₱ bbl. The quotation for Yellow Corn was 32s. ₱ quarter. Lard 62s. ₱ cwt.

The sales of Cotton on Friday were 12,000 bales, and on Saturday, the 5th inst., 10,000 bales, at rather better prices. Trade in the manufacturing districts had improved during the week. The London money market was easy; Consols closed at 99¼. The bullion in the Bank of England had increased 250,000 pounds.

The Pacific arrived at Liverpool on the 4th inst.

Havre Cotton Market.

The Cotton market at Havre had been active and prices advanced, with sales during the week of 12,000 bales. Tres ordinaire Orleans was quoted at 92f.

Eastern Mail.

MOBILE, February 17.

The eastern mail has arrived, bringing dates from New York and Philadelphia of the 11th, from Baltimore and Washington of the 12th, and from Charleston of the 14th inst., all as late as due.

Mobile Cotton Market.

MOBILE, February 18.

There has been only a moderate demand in the cotton market here during the past week, and the sales embrace barely 10,500 bales. The receipts for the same time are 38,000 and the exports 32,000 bales. The quotations for Middling is 8¼@.

It appears that Lamartine is not, after all, so very poor, for Turkey pays him $700 a year for his leech lakes in the east.

PASSAGE OF THE LIQUOR LAW—Providence, Feb. 8—The anti-liquor law has passed the House by a vote of 39 to 27.

FRESHETS IN THE EAST—Boston, Feb. 7.—The rain and warm weather have caused severe freshets in the Merrimac and Contoocook rivers in New Hampshire, and in the vicinity of Concord immense masses of ice have been thrown up, and the rivers in some places diverted from their channels. Several bridges have been started from their foundations, and some of the railroad trains detained.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL.—The London Times of February 8.—An election was held in this State to-day upon the question of sustaining the Maine liquor law. Thirty-two towns heard from show a majority of 2230 in favor of the law, and it is doubtless sustained by a large majority.

SECOND DISTRICT—Burlington, February 8.—The towns of Burlington, Brattleboro, Woodstock and Montpelier, give 674 majority in favor of the Liquor Law. Forty-nine towns give large majorities for the law, rendering its success certain.

AUSTRALIA.—An English paper states that there were 388,102 ounces or £1,323,800 of gold produced at the Mount Alexander and Ballarat mines, in twenty working days, in September, though one hundred thousand people were directly or indirectly employed in the job. The fact is imposing taken as an isolated report, and doubly so when counted with the annual results of the gold yield in Australia, and the continued richness of the placers in California.

ANOTHER WONDER.—A monster steamship, it is said, is to be immediately built in New York. The column is to be 200 feet in length with accommodations for fifty thousand passengers! There are to be sixteen engines, with 5,000 horse power, the maximum speed contemplated is thirty miles per hour, and the ship is expected to make the passage from New York to Liverpool in five days.

The New York Times learns that the famous physician and medical author, Dr. Marshall Hall, is about to visit this country. He expected to leave England about the 1st of February. He is the author of a treatise on blood letting. His researches into the philosophy of the nervous system, and his "Theory and Practice" are familiar to all professional readers.

THE WILL OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.—A petition was presented to the Virginia Legislature, on the 9th instant, from Alfred Moss, Clerk of the County Court of Fairfax, authorizing him to carry out of the Commonwealth the original will of General George Washington, for the purpose of having it lithographed, accompanied by a letter approbatory thereof from G. W. Parke Custis, the sole surviving executor of General Washington.

PARAGUAY OPENED TO THE WORLD.—The London Times contains, among other news from South America, the announcement that the Government of Paraguay had issued a decree dated November 29, to the effect that all vessels of one hundred and twenty tons and upwards will have free access to the port of St. Nicholas; that settlers will be allowed to enter the country free from military exactions; will be allowed to purchase, hold, and dispose of land, and will also enjoy religious toleration to a certain extent.

A BAD SPECULATION.—The steamship Europa, which sailed from Boston for Liverpool on Wednesday week, took out as part of her cargo 40,000 lbs Butter—the same butter that was imported from Ireland some time since, and afterwards attempted to be sold at auction in Boston and New York, but did not command its value. This is rather an unprofitable speculation for the importers, but it is believed it contributed a little, to bring down the prices of the domestic article to something like a reasonable standard.

PEACH TREES IN BLOOM.—The editor of the Savannah Morning News, was on Monday last shown by a gentleman several twigs taken from peach trees on Hutchinson's island, opposite the city, which are full of buds far advanced, and some of them entirely open. He also states that many of the trees on that island are nearly covered with blossoms. The mild weather for some days past has caused, says the News, the vegetable kingdom in many instances, to assume the livery of spring.

WOMAN'S INFLUENCE IN CONGRESS.—A Washington correspondent of the New York Commercial attributes the loss of the New York mint bill to a woman. It seems that Mr Price, of New Jersey, who was in favor of the bill, was stopped in the lobby by a lady, who held him by the button until after his name had been called and the vote declared. The result was 87 to 88. The vote of Mr. Price would have made a tie, and the Speaker was in favor of the bill.

SPECULATION.—Captain Alfred K. Fisher, some four months since, shipped one thousand barrels of flour from New York to San Francisco, and, at the present prices, expects to realize a profit of some twenty thousand dollars by the operation.

SPIRITUAL RAPPINGS AND INSANITY.—In the Ohio Assembly for the Insane, there are now twenty-eight persons who have lost their reason by the folly and wickedness of the spirit rappers; and there are eighteen persons in the Indiana Hospital for the Insane, who were sent to that institution from the same mischievous cause.

BUSINESS AT AUSTRALIA.—Some idea of the business done at Melbourne, Australia, may be obtained from the fact that the Argus of that place, of September 1, a daily paper, contains over forty-two columns of advertisements, seven of which are auction sales.

During the month of December, twenty-six ships, with 8,200 passengers, left Liverpool for Australia.

AN INDIAN CAPITOL DEFENDER.—A son of Mr. Chubbs of Adrian, Michigan, who was stolen by Indians fourteen years ago, when he was only six years old, returned to his father, near Detroit, lately. It appears he was sold by his captors to another tribe, who subsequently re-sold him to a different tribe; that he married the daughter of an Indian chief, and that, having adopted their customs, he is about to go back to them.

The discovery of the precious metals in Australia has suddenly presented to a wondering world a spectacle it previously could never have dreamed of beholding, namely, an extensive emigration from the United States to the British possessions. Ten or twelve first class vessels are up at New York for the new country.

Paul Hildreth, of Greenfield, Mass., is manufacturing poplar wood into mattrasses by means of machinery which he has fitted up for the purpose. The logs are first sawed, and after the bark is stripped off, they are placed in a machine which reduces them to very fine shavings. What an idea that of sleeping on a "poplar" bed.

FIRE IN LITTLE ROCK.—A fire broke out in the Post-office building in Little Rock, Ark., on the 4th inst., which destroyed the building in which it originated, and six business houses—some of the principal ones in the place. The loss is estimated at $20,000.

NEWSPAPERS IN THE WORLD.—The following is supposed to be the number of newspapers in the world: "Ten in Austria, fourteen in Africa, thirty in Asia, sixty-five in Belgium, eighty-five in Denmark, ninety in Russia and Poland, three hundred in Prussia, three hundred and thirty in other Germanic States, five hundred in Great Britain and Ireland, and eighteen hundred in the United States.

CARRIAGES FOR THE CALIFORNIANS.—Several vessels recently sailed from Boston for San Francisco, having taken out a number of hacks and private carriages. The expense of freight is quite large, considering the value of the property, yet it is less than the difference between the cost of manufacture in San Francisco and New England.

CAPERS OF THE BEAR.—The bear has even a greater fondness for acorns than the deer; he also is seen in numerous parties during the season. An expedition that took the field against them a short while ago, saw in the neighborhood of Clear Lake, no less than fifty at one time. Of the social habits of the bear no great deal is known. As the temper of the gentleman does not invite much familiarity from outsiders, men one only trent with him from the top of a tree. The Indians, however, say that after his own bearish fashion he has some idea of sport. The female cuffs her little ones about much in the spirit of many two-legged mothers; and the cubs, on their part, cut all sorts of queer antics, very often apparently for the sole purpose of distressing their anxious parents. Solemn dances are often held among these bears that have arrived at mature age, in which, though there may not be much of the agility of a French danseuse, the actors behave with a remarkable degree of dignified decorum. For such exhibitions they retire into some dense thicket, and there beat down an area of convenient size. Generally, one at a time occupies the floor; and while he peeps up and down on his hind legs, the rest squat down on their haunches, and, as is probable, with an occasional grunt of approval or otherwise, they look on and criticise the performance. It is something like the old-fashioned minu

THE OLD MAN TO HIS WIFE.

We are growing very old, Kate—
Our heads are growing gray,
And upon our temples now
Is growing thin and gray.
Though not all we were, Kate,
And yet our hearts are young,
As when we roved the sunny hills
And flowery dells among.

We are growing very old, Kate,
And in our age of heart,
Though sparkling the hope comes on,
When I and thou must part:
But we will part, I trust, Kate,
As we have ne'er before,
Within our cottage hearth to meet,
With words of love no more.

But we're growing very old, Kate,
And the parting won't be long,
Till we shall obtain a better home.
Amid yon heavenly throng;
Till we sing the song together, Kate,
The angels sing above;
Where love for love of parting takes
The bitterness from love.

RIP VAN WINKLE.—This appellation, given by Irving to one of his most favorite characters, around which agreeable associations are apt to cluster, has been occasionally applied to the good old solid State of North Carolina. Rev. Dr. Hawks lately delivered a lecture before the New York Historical Society, in which he dwelt at considerable length on the historical incidents connected with North Carolina, and the character of the inhabitants, in which he pretty clearly proved that few States in the Union are less entitled to the appellation of Rip Van Winkle than North Carolina. This will be seen in the following extract from the conclusion of the lecture, as reported in the New York Literary World:

"Now I said, with becoming modesty, say in conclusion, for the good old State that has furnished my theme, that as one of the children of the great and learned, she is exceedingly good natured, and not over ready to take offence when no wrong is meant. She can understand, too, a joke among friends. She is willing the other children of the family, especially the little and the young ones, should (if it will afford their parents any amusement) call her "sleepy old Rip Van Winkle." Rip Van Winkle be it then; it is a respectable soubriquet, for it is Dutch; and North Carolina has rather a fancy for the Dutch, inasmuch as it has never proved to be sour enough; but let me tell you, sleepy as you may think Rip to be, he follows the fashion of his country, and generally sleeps, to use the phrase of his country, "with one eye open."

Rip Van Winkle he was wide awake on the 20th of May, 1775, in Mecklenburg; wide awake when on the morning of the 27th of February, 1776, he fought the royalists to the number of 1500, and made a clear field of it, scattering them and crushing their principles throughout Carolina; wide awake on the 12th of April, 1776, when he told the Constitutional Congress to shout out, without fear, Independence; wide awake, when after the war, almost one of his first acts was to found an University; wide awake when he took the lead and ordered the first geological survey of any State in this Union; and above all, wide awake when he saved the money he earned, and always paid promptly every dollar he owed, from the time he was a freeman, and never had occasion to give his promissory note, much less deny his signature to it afterward; wide awake when he resolved to use a little of his surplus money to show his respects and regard for a very worthy gentleman and friend of his, one George Washington, and so caused the best sculptor in the world to make a marble monument of his departed friend, and had it set up, that the children might know what was old Rip's idea of a man. Who would have thought, by the way, that the sleepy old fellow was so full of gratitude and good taste! Really, he does not seem to have been such a drowsy character after all; and when he is up where he is, perhaps he will be lying down, and perchance you will think he is again asleep; but let me tell you he knows very well all that is going on in the great family household, and how each child is getting on in the world; and he knows, too, something about the qualities that are of no kin to him; and just whisper to him that you think there are thieves and enemies prowling around the old homestead, and he will tell you that he knows it, and soon will see him on his feet in an instant; and when he is wanted, there he will be, rifle in hand, with a man's heart and a man's strength to do all a man's duty; and when he has done it, he will, perhaps, quietly lie down again; and whether he is too sleepy, or whether he is too modest, I cannot say—but so it is, that after he has done all that a man should do, he will be very sure, unless obliged to speak, to say little or nothing about it. This is Rip Van Winkle. I hope you like him."

SHAWLS.—The passion for shawls among all women every where is remarkable. In one country, the shawl may flow from the head, like a veil; in another, it is knitted around the loins like a sash; in yet another, it is swathed round the body like a petticoat. Wherever worn at all, it is the great article of dress. From a time remote, and beyond computation, the sheep of Cashmere have been cherished on their native hills, and the goats of Thibet on their plains, and the camel of Tartary on their steppes, to furnish the materials for the choicest shawls. From time immemorial; the patterns we knew so well have been handed down as half sacred tradition through a Hindoo ancestry, which puts even Welsh pedigrees to shame. For thousands of years have the bright dyes, which are the despair of our colorists and art, been glittering in Indian looms, in those primitive pits under the palm trees, where the whimsical patterns grow like wild flowers springing from the soil. For thousands of years have eastern potentates made presents of shawls to distinguished strangers, together with diamonds and pearls.

At this day, when an Eastern prince sends gifts to European sovereigns, there are shawls to the value of thousands of pounds, together with jewels, perfumes, and wild beasts, and valuable horses; just as was done in the days of the Pharaohs, as the paintings on Egyptian tombs show us to this day. And the subjects of sovereigns have as much liking for shawls as any queen. At the Russian Court, the ladies, judge one another by their shawls as by their diamonds.

In Europe, the bridegroom wins favor by a judicious gift of this kind. In Cairo and Damascus, the gift of a shawl will cause almost as much heart-burning in the harem as the introduction of a new wife. In England, the daughter of the house spends the whole of her first quarter's allowance in the purchase of a shawl. The Paris grisette and the London dressmaker go to their work with the little shawl pinned neatly at the waist. The lost gin-drinker covers her rags with the remnant of the shawl of better days. The farmer's daughter buys a white cotton shawl, with a gay border, for her wedding and it washes and dyes until, having wrapped all her babies in turn, it is finally dyed black to signalize her widowhood. The maiden-aunt, growing elderly, takes to wearing a shawl in mid-winter; and the granny would no more think of going without it any season than without her cap. When a son or grandson comes home from travel, far or near, his present is a new shawl, which she puts on with deep consideration—parting with the old one with a sigh. The Manchester or Birmingham factory girl buys a gay shawl on credit, wears it on Sunday, puts it in pawn on Monday morning, and takes it out again on Saturday night, for another Sunday's wear, and so until she has wasted money that would have bought her a good wardrobe. Thus from China round the world to Oregon, and from the Queen down to the pauper, is the shawl the symbol of woman's taste. [Dicken's Household Words.

LORD MAYORS AND THE SEWS.—The circumstances accompanying the decoration of the Grand Rabbi, Moses Montefiore, of Ramsgate, with the legion of honor, makes that occurrence a matter of general importance. He had received an invitation to breakfast, and after breakfast the Prince President (now Emperor) handed the Grand Rabbi the Order of the Legion of Honor, in the presence of his suite, the municipal officers, etc. In expressing his thanks for the distinction conferred upon him, the Grand Rabbi added, "this is again a confirmation of the generosity of religious liberty, which your Highness has proclaimed and defended." "You may," said the Prince General d'Hautpoul, "be a Mohammedan or a Jew, and yet be a Frenchman and a Senator;" that fine words and liberties of the Jews shall be respected. All the inhabitants of Bordeaux symbolized their joy at the arrival of the Grand Rabbi, and even the Cardinal Archbishop of Bordeaux paid a congratulatory visit to the Grand Rabbi.

FRANCE.

The news, to the exclusion of everything else, is the Emperor's marriage to Mlle. Montigo, which has taken Paris by surprise, and was unfavorably received by the Bourse. Mlle. is a Spaniard, (twenty-five years of age, a blonde, and grand-daughter of the British Consul at Malaga. Her mother was an Irish woman, named Kirkpatrick, and her father, the younger son of a Spanish family, who, fortunately, by the death of his elder brother, succeeded to the titles of Count Montigo, Duke of Teba and Pennemonde. Her sister is Duchess of Alba, and Mlle. herself Countess of Teba. The proposal for her hand was formally made by the Emperor on Sunday last, and was, of course, accepted. The next day the happy bridegroom communicated to his Ministers that his determination was taken, and that it was a marriage of affection. One report says that the Ministers, except one, resigned, but that the Emperor refused to accept their resignations.

It is said that the civil marriage has already taken place, and that the religious ceremonies will be held on the 29th inst., (January) on which occasion Prince Napoleon Jerome also will espouse the daughter of Prince of Wagram, grand-daughter to Marshal Berthier.

The Senate Legislative body and Council were summoned on the 22d ult., noon, to receive a communication from the Emperor relative to his marriage.

Simultaneously with the matrimonial scheme has taken place a disastrous fall on the Bourse, but the Government assert there is nothing in the state of the country either financially, commercially or politically to cause distress. They attribute the fall solely, and probably truly, to the check of speculation, and say that when the reaction has ceased all will restored things to their proper level, the funds will be in harmony with what the Pays calls "the general prosperity."

Nevertheless, the Bourse, Wednesday, 19th, was more depressed than since the coup d'etat of December. Prices of 4½ per cents were on the 17th, 105f. 45; on the 18th, 105f. 15; on the 19th, 105f. 50; 20th, 105f. 60; 3 per cents, 16th, 70f. 4d; 18th, 70f. 80; 19th, 71f. 90; 20th, 70f.

M. DeDrouyn de L'Huys persists in his resignation, which, however, the Emperor has refused to accept, at least for some days, to allow the Minister time to reconsider his resignation.

The export trade, moreover, is checked by the determination of South American merchants no to purchase except at a long credit. The rain has ruined the retail trade in the manufacturing towns, and marked depression is exhibited.

Since the beginning of the present month, the Paris corn market is unchanged, and since December, business in the Departments is quiet, with barley, rice and oats declining.

AUSTRIA.

A telegraphic dispatch from Vienna, 7th, announces the death of the Archduke Regnier, formerly viceroy of Lombardy.

INDIA.

The details of The Indian news add little of interest in the telegraphic intelligence already published.

Great complaints are made of the inactivity of General Godwin in Burmah. Pegu was captured by 1200 men under Godwin, while five months since Major Cotton took the place, and would have kept it had his instructions permitted.

The intention of the Indian Government is believed to be to annex Pegu only, but competent authorities strongly urge an advance on Ava.

CHINA.

Hong Kong dates to November 29 say, in the early part of the month the rebellion was successful, but latterly rumor states that the imperial troops have gained decisive advantages. The transit through the disturbed districts was uninterrupted. American credits 4s. 10d.@4s. 10½d. Freights from Canton to New York $1d for tea, and $25 for silks.

Shanghae dates to the 26th November state that the import market was favorable. Transactions in teas had been large, and prices were maintained. The exports show a decline of 1,000,000 lbs, as compared with the previous year. Silk was lower, and the exports amounted to 20,000 bales.

The U. S. sloop of war Plymouth was at Macao.

Arrival of the Steamer Atlantic.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

NEW YORK, February 7.—The American mail steamer Atlantic arrived at her wharf this morning, bringing dates from Liverpool to the 26th ult., and from London and Paris to the 28th. She brings fifty passengers.

On the 26th ult., in latitude 51 57, longitude 17 16, she passed a steamer supposed to be the America, from Boston.

The steamer Asia arrived at Liverpool at ten o'clock on the forenoon of the 26th, just prior to the sailing of the Atlantic.

ENGLAND.

Price, the forger, had been fully committed for trial.

A great meeting in behalf of Madiai was held at Essex Hall on the 25th, and another for the same purpose was held at Birmingham.

FRANCE.

Napoleon contemplates sending an army of 500,000 emigrants to Algeria.

BELGIUM.

The Belgian Government has discharged all foreign officers from the army.

ITALY.

Another Madiai case had occurred at Genova. A surgeon named Daniel Massinglio had been sentenced to three years' imprisonment for preaching.

A company had been formed at Geneva, with a capital of 10,000,000 francs, to establish a line of steamers to New York and South America.

Vessels arriving at Genova from Charleston and New Orleans were subjected to quarantine, also from Brazils and West Indies.

It was reported that the Pope was dangerously ill of apoplexy.

TURKEY.

The Turks were pursuing operations vigorously against Montenegro. On January 15, Omar Pacha took Grahovo by storm, but afterwards, in attempting to surprise the capital of Montenegro, in the mountains, he was repulsed.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Dates from the Cape are to December 20. The war drags slowly on. Large shipments of provisions were making to Australia.

SECOND DISPATCH.

FULL REPORT OF LOUIS NAPOLEON'S SPEECH DECLARATORY OF HIS APPROACHING NUPTIALS—New York, Feb. 7, P. M.—The Atlantic arrived at her dock this morning at 10 o'clock, thus beating the British steamer Canada awfully.

FRANCE.

On Saturday, the 22d ult., various functionaries of State presented themselves at the Tuileries, to receive from the Emperor the announcement of his intended marriage.

At noon the Senate and members of the Corps Legislatif, together with the Council of State, met in the Salle du Trone, and awaited the arrival of the Emperor.

The ex-King Jerome, wearing the uniform of a Marshal of France, seated himself to the right of the Throne, and his son, Napoleon Jerome. In citizen's dress, occupied a similar seat on the left; the Ministers, Officers of State, and members of the Imperial Household, were gronped around the Throne.

Dukes and by the Duke Cambaceres entered from the apartment of the Emperor with the announcement of His Majesty; on which ci devant Louis Napoleon entered, and, taking his seat on the Throne, proceeded to read the address as follows:

EMPEROR'S ADDRESS.

Messieurs—I assent to the wish so often expressed by the nation, and come to you to announce my intended nuptials. The alliance contracted is not in accordance with the old political traditions, and therein lies its advantage.

France, by its successive revolutions, has ever abruptly severed herself from the rest of Europe. Every enlightened government ought to seek to lead her back within the pale of old monarchies; but the result will be more certainly attained by a just and straightforward policy, and by an honesty of conduct more than by a royal alliance, which creates false security, and often substitutes family interests for those of the nation at large. Besides, in this respect, examples of the past have left in the spirit of the people superstitious feelings.

It is not forgotten that for seventy years foreign princesses have ascended the steps of the throne only to see their race dispersed and proscribed by war or revolution.

Only one woman has seemed to bring happiness—to live more than others in the affections of the people—and this woman, the modest and good wife of Gen. Bonaparte, was not of royal blood.

It must be admitted, however, that in 1810 the marriage of Napoleon (the first with Maria Louise was a great event. It was a guaranty for the future, and a real satisfaction to the national pride to see the ancient and illustrious house of Austria, which had so long been at war with us, solicit an alliance of the elected child of the new Empire.

Now, on the other hand—under the last reign—had the coup proper of the country to suffer when the inheritor of the crown vainly sought for several years to ally himself with a sovereign house, and obtained at length a princess, accomplished, no doubt, but of second rate rank and of a different religion.

When, in the face of old Europe, one is borne, by the force of new principle, to the height of ancient dynasties, it is not by antiquating one's sentiments, and seeking to intermingle himself at any price into the family of Kings, that one makes himself accepted. It is much rather by always keeping one's origin in remembrance, in preserving one's own character, and in taking frankly, before Europe, a position of parvenu—a glorious title when it comes from the free suffrages of a great people.

Thus obliged to depart from the precedents followed even to the present day, my marriage became but a private affair, and there remained only to choose a person. She who has become the object of my preference is of high birth—French in heart, by education and remembrance of blood shed by her father for the cause of the Empire—She whom I have chosen has, as a Spaniard, the advantage of having no relative in France to whom it might be necessary to give honors and dignitaries. Endowed with all the qualities of soul, she will be an ornament to the throne, as in the days of danger she would become one of its most courageous supporters. A devout Catholic, she will address to Heaven the same prayers as myself for the welfare of France. Good and gracious, she will revive, I have a firm hope, the same position of the virtues of the Empress Josephine.

I come then, Messieurs, to say to France that I have preferred a woman whom I love and respect to any unknown lady, whose alliance would have brought advantages mingled with sacrifices.

Without disdaining any one, I yield to my feelings; but after having consulted my reason and my convictions.

In short, in piecing independance, the qualities of the heart, and family happiness, above the tyranny of prejudices and the calculations of ambition, I shall not be less strong because I am more free. Ere long, proceeding to Notre Dame, I shall present the Empress to the people and to the army.

The confidence they have in me assures me of their sympathy towards her whom I have chosen; and you, gentlemen, after learning to know her better, will be convinced in this also. I have been directed by Providence.

THE NEW EMPRESS OF FRANCE.—Her American Origin.—The New York Commercial of Saturday, 5th, publishes a communication, from one who was formerly a resident of Spain, the following sketch, which seems to explain the family origin of the new Empress of France very satisfactorily. Her history is no less romantic than that of the Empress Josephine:

"By to-day's advices from Europe, we are told that the Emperor Napoleon III. has espoused a Spanish lady, whose grandfather was British Consul at Malaga, and whose mother was an Irish lady by the name of Fitzpatrick; also, that this new Empress was in her own right Countess Teba, although bearing the name of Mlle. Montigo. Thus much by telegraph. Now the plain English of all this is, no doubt, as follows:

"A worthy Scotchman, by the name of William Kirkpatrick, was for some time the American Consul at Malaga, and, falling in business, was succeeded by George G. Barrell as United States Consul at Malaga. This was, I think, under President Monroe's administration.

"Mr. Kirkpatrick's eldest daughter, Maria, or 'Mariquita,' as she was familiarly called and known by all Americans there, was a very fine, dashing lady, and married the Count de Teba, a younger brother of the celebrated Palafox, who behaved so gallantly at the siege of Zaragoza, and who in reply to a demand of surrender, declared he would continue the defence by 'war to the knife.'

"The Palafox family embraced numerous titles, and was singularly brave and noble.

"This husband of Maria Kirkpatrick (Count de Teba) was a gallant soldier, and on set up by wounds as to be unable to mount his horse without aid, and when in the saddle looked more as if he was hooked on than seated there.

"The new Empress of the French is no doubt the daughter of this Countess Teba, 'Marquita Kirkpatrick,' who was the daughter of William Kirkpatrick, late U. S. Consul at Malaga—not British Consul—not Fitzpatrick, and not Irish.

"The British Consul at Malaga was Wm. Laird, another old Scotch gentleman, and he was followed by Mr. Marks, an Englishman.

"If the new Empress of France was Countess Teba, as stated, then her mother is dead, as also is her father, and she took the title of her mother. The name Montigo, under which she passed in Paris, is perhaps one of the family names or titles of the Palafox family."

The Commercial, in giving this, says:—

"Like his uncle, the great Napoleon, Louis has determined, it appears, upon a marriage of affection and not of convenance; with this difference, however, that while Napoleon I. divorced Josephine after obtaining imperial rank, Napoleon II. raises one of the people to the throne. This marriage may increase the sympathies of the masses with Louis Napoleon.

Further from the Plaine.

We take the following from the Independence (Mo.) Messenger of the 22d ult.:

The Santa Fe mail under charge of Mr. Jones, reached us on Wednesday morning last, in very good season. We learn that the early arrival of the party was in consequence of the fine weather, and the good roads—no interruption from snow or anything else. A winter trip, when all is favorable, is delightful enough on the prairies, but when the snow, sleet and rains come, then one may desire to be any where else. By the mail we learn that business, either in upper or lower New Mexico, or Chihuahua, has not largely arrived, and until our government patronage is extended towards that land, in the way of building roads, sinking Artesian wells, and developing the resources of the country, little better state of thing can be expected. It seems that the civil and military authorities have come into (or nearly so) collision. From all that we can gather, Col. Bumner was a little chagrined that he did not receive the appointment of governor, finding it given to another, he has thrown every obstacle in the way of pacifying and making smooth affairs in and about Santa Fe. On the eve of his departure to Albuquerque, he had the American flag, that has floated in front of the palace ever since Gov. Kearny entered the country, taken down—he did not give the Governor appointed a friendly greeting on his arrival, etc., etc.

Lately, and just while the Legislature were about assembling. Gen. Lane requested Col. Brooks, the commandant at the port, to hoist the flag during their setting. This was done. Col. Sumner, as soon as he heard of it, had Brooks removed to Fort Union, and one of his pets put in command. The flag was again removed. The citizens, with Gov. Lane at their head, run up another flag; but to their haste made a tri-colored one—this properly by the military was ordered down—again it was lowered, a few stars painted on it, and again unfuried at the top of the staff, amidst cheering. The military authority was not sufficiently strong to have it brought down again, and it floats still. It is with regret that we learn such statements, as it is very necessary under the present state of things in that country that the civil and military powers should move along harmoniously, and we think, taking all things together, that Sumner's removal would be very beneficial to all parties.

We are glad to see a recommendation to our government to aid in the construction of Artesian wells. Water is all that is wanted in those jornadas, and in the gold and silver mines, to make that region of country the most valuable in the world.

Our friend and townsman, Jas. Gilchrist, is here now, on his way to St. Louis to perfect his machinery in the construction of those wells. We sincerely trust he may do, well.

Near Fort Fillmore, Messrs. Lucas & Co. were robbed of a wagon load of goods, by some Mexicans dressed as Apache Indians.

The mail outward bound was met at Fort Atkinson on the 14th ult.

From Texas.

INDIAN NEWS.—The Southwestern American states that Hon. H. P. Bee, of Austin, has received a letter from Col. E. B. Jordan, dated Laredo, January 25, saying that news had been received that a party of Indians, twenty in number, on Saturday, 22d instant, about mid-day, arrived at San Ignacio, and killed, within 1500 yards of the rancho, two men, left one severely wounded, and took off a youth about sixteen years old.

The moment the information came, Lieut. Burleson started a party after them, consequently hopes are entertained that the savages may still meet their well merited chastisement.

WHEAT GROWING IN TEXAS.—A Tarrant correspondent of the Palestine Advocate, writes that Col. M. T. Johnson, of that county, has taken the contract for furnishing flour at $12 per barrel to the military posts at Forts Worth, Belmot, and Phantom Hill. Also, that Col. Johnson's at this time erecting a steam mill, which will be completed by harvest time. He has sown down nearly his whole farm in wheat. There will be a large amount of wheat raised in Tarrant this year. For the growth of wheat, he says, the country is admirably adapted. It will take, he says, nearly all that can be raised in Tarrant to fill Col. Johnson's contracts, and thinks farmers need have no fears of selling all they can raise for the reason that they will find a better market at home than New Orleans.

The Richmond Recordrr mentions the murder of Mr. Lum, near that place. He was shot while sitting with his family at their evening meal.

POULTRY SHOW IN LONDON.—From the 11th to the 13th ultimo there was a grand Poultry show in London, at which were exhibited no less than 615 pens of different species of fowls, each pen containing from two to four animals—besides eleven pens of geese, thirty-three of ducks, ten of turkeys, two hundred and forty-nine of pigeons, and forty-eight of rabbits. Of the fowls, there were two hundred and forty-nine pens of the Cochin China breed, sixty-three Dantams, seventy Dorking, besides Spanish, Malay, Flamburg, Poland, etc. On the first day there were some hundreds of visitors, at an admission fee of five shillings, on the second day over five thousand at a shilling, and on the third day a much larger number at the same price. Very high prices were put upon some of the pens. At the auction sale on the last day the highest price paid was forty-eight guineas for a Cochin China cock and pullet. The general selling prices varied from fifty to two pounds for each pen.

CONSUMPTION OF TOBACCO.—At a recent meeting of the Liverpool Statistical Society, a paper was read on the history and consumption of tobacco. The following table exhibits the consumption in the United Kingdom and revenue derived therefrom, at different periods since 1821:

Year.	Consumption.	Duty per lb.	Revenue.	Population.	Consumption per head.
1821	12,585,152 lbs	4s	£2,192,883	21,185,960	1,21 oz.
1831	16,858,541 lbs	4s	£2,964,899	24,410,432	12,0 oz.
1841	22,209,870 lbs	3s	£3,990,484	27,019,678	19,31 oz.
1851	25,084,875 lbs	3s	£3,685,762	27,452,502	16,56 oz.

The total annual production of tobacco is estimated at 2,000,000 tons, and would require half the British tonnage which "enters inwards" or "clears outwards" annually to transport the same. The value at 2d. per pound would amount to £37,000,000.

PROTECTION AGAINST FORGED CHECKS.—At a meeting of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, on the 1st inst., the report of a committee in regard to the protection against forged checks was read. The Chamber adopted the following recommendations, as proposed in the report:

1. That there be only one person connected with a firm who shall draw checks, and that each house use its own blanks, which are recommended to have some distinguishing peculiarity. 2. That these blanks be kept as carefully as bank bills, and that each one be numbered. 3. That no check shall be drawn for a less sum than ten dollars.

VALUABLE DISCOVERIES.—Three of the Chinca Islands, on the coast of Peru, on which guano is deposited by birds are said to contain two hundred and fifty millions of tons of the manure, worth twelve hundred and fifty million pounds sterling, or upwards of seven thousand millions of dollars. The number of human beings and vessels that find employment in this trade, and the fortunes acquired by it, show that other "diggings" than those of gold may be of value to mankind. As a universal fertilizer of the earth, increasing the food of its inhabitants, it possesses an importance that surpasses all other "diggings" in proportion as food is superior to anything else.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.—It is stated that this company, now applying to the New York Legislature for an act of incorporation, have made arrangements with Norris & Co., of Philadelphia, to put up works to manufacture motive power for their road; and, with Hewett & Cooper, of Newdersey, to roll the iron. T rail, at the Iron mountain in Missouri. Wells & Co., A. S. Divin & Co., with others, have contracted to build 1000 miles of the road within twenty-four months, to be six foot guage and double track. The company expect the government will loan them $45,000 per mile. If so, the probability is, the road will be built in less than five years.

NEW GUN.—It is stated that Porter's newly invented repeating gun can be discharged nine times, as fast as the trigger can be pulled, without taking it from the sight; and then in a few seconds the discharged cylinder replaced by a charged one, and so on, to fire nine, eighteen, and twenty-seven times, in almost as many seconds. It can be used as a self-loading gun, without displacing the cylinder. It is probable that this revolving cylinder invention is destined to make a revolution in the manufacture of all kinds of fire-arms.

HOW TO MAKE OLD OAK.—The appearance of old oak may be obtained by exposing any article of new oak to the vapors of ammonia. Every variety of tint may be procured, according to the duration and temperature of the volatile compounds. A new oak carved arm-chair, exposed to the vapors of ammonia, will in about twelve hours have all the appearance of having been made two hundred years before. [Kidd's Own Journal.

BISHOP AND CONSCRIPTION.—We find in The Baltimore papers a very remarkable document from Mr. A. J. Marshall:

It appears that Mr. Marshall was the hired agent of the the Baltimore and Ohio Company in 1810 and 1847, to obtain from the Legislature of Virginia the right of way for that company to the Ohio river. The company promised to give him $50,000 to procure the desired grant. After the work was accomplished, it refused to pay the fee. Mr. Marshall brought suit, and was met by a plea that the contract was a fraudulent one, which a Court of Justice should not enforce. This plea was sustained, and the laborer has been deprived of the fruits of his toil.

A London letter of the 11th January, says that the accounts from all the manufacturing districts of the prospects with which the year commences, are more satisfactory than have perhaps ever been known. High wages are every where obtainable, and pauperism, except in the cases of the idiotic and helpless, is rapidly becoming extinct. The returns of the Savings banks, provident societies, life assurance companies, and all similar institutions tell thesame tale.

MINORS IN FACTORIES.—The Senate of Rhode Island has passed a bill which provides that children under twelve years shall not be employed in any manufacturing establishment in that State, and children between twelve and fifteen shall not be employed more than eleven hours in any one day, nor more than nine months in any one year, and these children must attend school at least three months in the year. The bill provides that ten hours shall constitute a day's work.

One by one of the pioneers of Mississippi are passing away. Gov. Charles Lynch died at his residence near Jackson, on the 9th inst., at a very advanced age. He had filled several stations of public trust, and was Governor of the State from 1836 to 1838. He leaves a numerous family connection and many friends to mourn his loss and emulate his virtues.

THE SENATE.—The U. S. Senate, after the fourth of March next, as far as is now known, will consist of 38 democrats and 21 whigs—a democratic majority of 17. The number of democrats already elected or holding over is 35; number of whigs 16. Vacancies to be filled by democratic Legislatures, 3; by whig Legislatures, 2; vacancies in which the result is doubtful, 3.

SCARCITY OF SALT AT THE WEST INDIES.—Capt. Duncomb, of the brig Wellhouding, arrived at New York on Sunday week from Rosaire, in ballast, having been unable to procure a cargo of salt there, on account of its scarcity. He also reports it to be very scarce at Turk's Island, and very high.

SEVERE COLD.—At Quebec on Thursday week the thermometers ranged 22 to 31 below zero, the latter being the lowest point indicated by a registering thermometer upon the Cape. In other exposed places, the low point of 34 deg. is said to have been reached.

MY TIMES ARE IN THY HAND.

My times are in Thy hand!
I know not what a day
Or e'en an hour may bring to me:
But I am safe while trusting Thee.
Though all things fade away,
All weakness—I
On Him rely,
Who fixed the earth and spread the starry sky!

My times are in Thy hand!
Pale poverty or wealth,
Corroding care or calm repose,
Spring's balmy breath, or winter's snows,
Sickness or buoyant health—
Whate'er betide,
If God provide,
'Tis for the best—I wish no lot beside.

My times are in Thy hand!
Should friendship pure illume,
And strew my path with fairest flowers,
Or should I spend life's dreary hours
In solitude's dark gloom,
Thou art a Friend,
Till time shall end,
Unchangeably the same—in Thee all beauties blend.

My times are in Thy hand!
Many or few my days,
I leave with Thee—this only pray,
That by Thy grace I, every day
Devoting to Thy praise,
May ready be,
To welcome Thee,
Whene'er Thou comest to set my spirit free!

My times are in Thy hand!
Howe'er those times may end,
Sudden or slow my soul's release,
Midst anguish, frenzy, or in peace,
I'm safe with Christ—my friend:
If he be nigh,
Howe'er I die,
Still be the dawn of heavenly ecstasy.

My times are in Thy hand!
To Thee I can intrust
My slumbering clay, till Thy command
Bids all the dead before Theo stand.
Awaking from the dust:
Beholding Thee,
What bliss 'twill be
With all Thy saints to spend eternity!

To spend Eternity
In Heaven's unclouded light!
From sorrow—sin—and frailty free
Beholding and resembling Thee
O, too transporting sight!
Prospect too fair,
For flesh to bear.
Haste—haste, my Lord, and soon transport me there!

[FROM THE DEATH OF NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.]

THE SOLDIERS OF THE POPE.

A Short Catechism for the use of Roman Catholics.

QUESTION: Who is the Pope?
ANSWER: A king of Italy.
Q. Who are his soldiers?
A. The priests.
Q. Who are the ministers of this Popeling?
A. The cardinals.
Q. Who are the generals of his soldier-priests?
A. The archbishops.
Q. And their colonels?
A. The bishops.
Q. The majors?
A. The vicars-general
Q. The captains?
A. The arch-priests
Q. The lieutenants?
A. The curates.
Q. The sergeants?
A. The curates.
Q. The corporals?
A. The officiating ministers.
Q. These, then, are all in command?
A. Yes, and the people obey.
Q. How many men are there in this army?
A. Some millions!
Q. Where are they?
A. Every where.
Q. How many of them are there in France?
A. Forty thousand, of all ranks, and with all weapons.
Q. Who enlists them?
A. The Pope.
Q. And who pays them?
A. The king.
Q. For whom do they fight?
A. For the Pope.
Q. And who are they quartered upon?
A. Upon the king.
Q. What are the Pope's weapons?
A. Bulls.
Q. Which is the most powerful the bull of the Pope, or the sword of the king?
A. With his three hundred thousand swords the king cannot alter or suggest to me one wish; with his simple bull the Pope commands forty thousand men who influence the wills of millions.
Q. Does the Pope command the King?
A. No. But he approves or annuls his orders.
Q. Does the Pope command the prefects?
A. No. But he directs the bishops.
Q. Do the bishops command the majors?
A. No. But they give orders to the curates.
Q. And who preaches in the parishes—is it the major?
A. No; the curate.
Q. Who confesses—is it the major?
A. No; the curate.
Q. Who acquits from peuances—the major?
A. No; the curate.
Q. Who shuts hell?
A. The curate.
Q. Who opens heaven?
A. The curate.
Q. Which, then, is subject to the other?
A. Not the curate.
Q. What interest have the soldier-priests in serving the Popo-king?
A. The Pope nominates the cardinals, and confirms the bishops; the bishops present to livings, and instal officiating ministers.
Q. Has this army any auxiliary troops in the interior?
A. Yes; monks and nuns.
Q. Has it any spies in foreign parts?
A. Yes; male and female Jesuits.
Q. What are their weapons?
A. The inquisition for the body, and damnation for the soul.
Q. Upon whom do they discharge these weapons?
A. Upon the people.
Q. What are their citadels?
A. Churches.
Q. And their keeps?
A. Convents.
Q. What is their favorite style of warfare?
A. The ambuscade.
Q. Where do they lay it?
A. In the confessional.
Q. What is confession?
A. The surest method of finding out secrets.
Q. What is it besides?
A. A school, where the penitent learns the evil that she did not know before.
Q. And besides that?
A. A study where the clerical notary directs consciences, alms, and the fate of inheritances.
Q. Is this last fact probable?
A. It has been foreseen and provided for by law.
Q. Who goes to confession?
A. Women.
What is it that makes their husbands feel secure?
A. The celibacy of the priest.
Q. What ought most to alarm them?
A. That very celibacy.
Q. What is the distinction between marriage and celibacy?
A. Marriage makes a natural want a duty—celibacy makes it a crime.
Q. What calms passion?
A. Marriage.
Q. What, on the contrary, irritates it?
A. Celibacy.
Q. Does this natural want, thus repressed, grow weaker?
A. Just as much as hunger and thirst would.
Q. What, then, is the effect of celibacy?
A. To make one martyr or two criminals.
Q. What are in France the comparative numbers of men and women?
A. They are equal.
Q. Then, according to the intention of nature, what would our forty thousand single women have been?
A. The legitimate wives of our forty thousand priests.
Q. Does the adoption of the cassock free from passion?
A. No.
Q. Do those who go to the confessional escape temptation?
A. No.
Q. Who, then, tempts the priest in the confessional?
A. His penitent.
Q. And in his house?
A. His servant.
Q. And at the foot of the altar?
A. The married pair whose hands he joins.
Q. And in the world?
A. The women whose director he is.
Q. But how, then, escape scandal?
A. By an increase of crime.
Q. Who gave to our priests the example of celibacy?
A. Pagan priests of Isis.
Q. And to our nuns?
A. Pagan vestals.
Q. And who gives them the example of marriage?
A. The priests of the true God.
Q. Was Aaron married?
A. Yes: the Bible makes mention of his children.
Q. Were the prophets married?
A. Yes: Isaiah speaks of his wife.
Q. Were the apostles married?
A. Yes; the gospel alludes to the mother-in-law of St. Peter.
Q. Why, then, does the Pope prefer a state of celibacy for his priests?
A. For the same reason which would lead a king to prefer it for his soldiers. The priest, having neither wife nor children, but being bound up in the interests of his colleagues, or superiors, is consequently ready at all times to sacrifice his country to his church. As soon as his trunk is packed he may set off leaving nothing behind him, and sure to find friends and station five hundred leagues away. He has no need of your predilection to marry a daughter, or your interest to get a situation for a son, of your arm to escort his wife. The Church stands him instead of all besides. His Pope suspends him, or makes him a cardinal, without asking your leave, be you peer of France, or member of the Assembly. The good will of a verger is of more avail to him than that of a king; at least unless the king be on good terms with the Church, which amounts to saying, that in himself the king is powerless in these matters. And thus the priest, being perfectly independent of all secular authority, comes forward and speaks, opposes and overcomes all difficulties, rather than yield one inch of ground.
Q. But do not the offices of the Romish priest tend to moralize society?
A. No! 1. Abstaining from meat cannot moralize. 2. Lent, by depriving us of eggs and butter, cannot moralize. 3. Ashes rubbed on the forehead cannot moralize. 4. The fingers of a bishop applied to our cheek cannot moralize. 5. Olive oil, in annointing a sick man, cannot moralize him. 6. A hair-cloth, worn next our skin, cannot moralize us. 7. Words that we do not understand, repeated at so many an hour, cannot moralize. 8. The impure questions of a confessor cannot moralize.
Q. But does the priest, then, never speak to his people except in the confessional?
A. Yes, he baptizes in Latin, marries in Latin, officiates for them morning and evening in Latin, visits them on their dying bed in Latin, and buries them in Latin. Now, the living understand Latin no more than do the dead.
Q. But, at least, he preaches in French obedience to God?
A. Much less to God than to the church, that is to say to the priests.
Q. These priests are then useless to society?
A. Nay: they are injurious to it
Q. How so?
A. They deprive their country of forty thousand pair of arms.
Q. And of what besides?
A. Of eighty thousand children.
Q. Is not that last clause severe?
A. Not so; for it supposes that all priests keep their vows.
Q. But do they really do this?
A. History shall give the answer. Remark, first of all, that St. Paul himself assumes the marriage of ecclesiastics, for preserving a happy medium between the polygamy of his period and the celibacy of ours; he enjoins that not only the priest but the bishop should be "the husband of one wife." [1 Tim. iii. 2.] Thus we find that priests and bishops married during the early ages of the Church. Eusebius names two bishops of Egypt, Ceremon and Philias, who, in the midst of their martyrdom, were assisted by their wives and children. [Eccl. Hist. xvi., c. 48, l, viii., c. 9.] Unfortunately, the Pope Sixtus decreed, in the fourth century, by way of better discipling his troops, that "henceforth any bishop, priest or deacon, who was not a celibat, should be beyond the reach of pardon." [1st. Decretal.] The pontifical soldiers struggled for ages against this monstrous enactment, and it was only under Gregory the VIIth that it was definitively decreed. The army at length submitted, but not without compensation. Later, things came to such a pitch that several German synods were obliged to allow clerical concubinage in order to preserve clerical celibacy. By and by the bishops found a source of wealth in this happy innovation; impurity was not only authorized, but taxed. And Agrippa tells us of a license which granted to women, whose husbands were absent, the privilege . . . . But enough of this! .... No. yet one other fact: A Spanish inquisitor, being informed that certain women had cause of complaint against their confessors, had the candor and simplicity to open a registering office for the purpose of receiving their depositions. The penitents came in such numbers, that soon one recorder was insufficient, and a second was appointed. Complaints multiplied with the power of registering them, and as they came from all parts of the Kingdom the inquisitor opened a second court in another town. A certain term had been fixed, but the last day did not bring the last deposition, and the closing of the lists was postponed for four months. Then there was such a deluge of accusations of adultery, impurity, and other crimes, brought by the penitents against their confessors, that the Holy Tribunal, frightened at these results, closed the registering offices, and declared that it would not carry their hideous and disgusting law-suit any further.
Q. Who must we except from these disorders?
A. Those whose temperament is cold by nature, through artificial means, or old age; those who mourn because they are in the church, or gladly leave it.
Q. Continue your impressions of the papal army.
A. It is an alien in the bosom of our country, an independent power in the State, an isolated caste in society. All that it gains we lose. One priest more is one citizen less. A convent built is a farm destroyed; and as they live by our labor and our money, without returning either money or labor, it follows that, in proportion as they prosper, we decline. Elevated by the people, they employ that very elevation to subjugate the nation. Give them money to open a school—to found a hospital—they will yet sell you admittance into that hospital, and that school, at the price of your influence or your liberty. Receiving gratuitously and selling dear, they cannot fail to become rich, and to govern by their gold the consciences and passions of men. Formerly they required only the re-establishment of Divine service (des autels,) later, seminaries for the instruction of priests, and soon, the monopoly of instruction. Formerly they only asked for priests, now they have religious orders. a little patience, and they will demand the inquisition, and soon in their retrograde march they will arrive at imposing on you, people, the payment of tithes—they will present to you, kings, a slipper to kiss!
Q. What then must we do in order to arrest the advance of this immense army, which crushes us beneath its elephant tread!
A. We must simply deprive it of its two strongholds.
Q. What are they?
A. Confession and celibacy.
Q. What must we do induce our priests to marry?
A. We must send them no more women to confess.
Q. But without confession the priest will not grant absolution!
A. So much the better; we will ask it from God.
Q. But the married priest will no longer dare to offer the sacrifice of the mass!
A. So much the better; we will have recourse to the great sacrifice, Jesus Christ.
Q. But we shall no longer have the counsels of the confessional?
A. So much the better. we will seek these of the Bible.
Q. We shall no longer have any casuists to guide us?
A. So much the better: we will implore the aid of the Holy Spirit.
Q. No more penance?
A. So much the better; we shall have the more time to sanctify our lives.
Q. No more indulgences?
A. So much the better; depending no longer upon them, we shall be the more watchful as to our conduct.
Q. But, last of all, who will pardon our sins?
A. What! do not you see that I would only tear you away from the lying pardon a man can speak, to lead you to the real pardon, the gift of God! Who is the one who should pardon if not the offended? Who is it that died for you if it be not Jesus Christ? Who can give you strength to live holy, if it be not the Holy Spirit! Ah, leave human institutions to rise to a divine! Do you not see that till this very day you have been confounding two totally different things—the church and religion—priests and Jesus Christ—the word of man and the Word of God! If you knew not yet how to draw this distinction listen to me.

I will suppose that, becoming conscious of your sins, you go to a priest for absolution, what will he say to you!

A. He will say—You must give alms.
Repeat aves.
Make a pilgrimage.
Perform a nine day's devotion.
Burn a taper.
Wear a hair-cloth.
Fast.
Abstain from flesh.
Wear a medal.
Kiss a relic.
Walk on your knees.

And, now, suppose that instead of going to the Romish priest you went to Jesus Christ Himself—speaking in the Bible: what would be His answer to your confession, made in true repentence! He would reply as He replied to an open sinner of old, "Thy sins are forgiven thee: go in peace, thy faith hath saved theo." [Luke vii. 48—50.]

Which of these pardons seems to you the simplest, the noblest, the greatest! Which savors most of man—which of God! Compare them.

Lastly, say that you had given alms, told beads, made pilgrimages, performed nine-days' devotions, burnt tapers, paid for masses, put on hair-cloth, fasted, abstained from flesh, kissed relics, worn medals, bent your knees—say, do you suppose that you would be in consequence any more inclined to lead holy lives for time to come! Would all this make you love justice, purity, temperance! I know not: but wait; return to that Jesus, Son of God, who has said to you. "Thy sins are forgiven thee." If you believe the Word, what must be your feelings when you hear of this magnificent gift of Heaven, without reserve, without penance, without conditions. Ah, if I cannot be sure what you will feel I can, at least, tell you what Magdalen felt. She loved Jesus much, because much had been forgiven her by Jesus; she washed His feet with grateful tears, and won the brightest praise the Savior ever conferred. That is what Magdalen did; and if like her you were pardoned by Jesus, it is this that you would do. [See Luke vii. 36—50.]

And, now, measure the immense distance, the profound gulf, that separates the Church of Rome from the Gospel of Jesus Christ. There, a man's pardon sold, and for four days! Here, a sublime pardon given, and for ever! From the priest, a pardon, which wears off, and that must be renewed every month by some rounds of the rosary. From Jesus, an imperishable pardon, paid for by His blood! At the confessional, a pardon, which incites to new offences, since one has a cheap method of clearing one's self from them. On the cross, a pardon, which inspires a horror of sin, since it has crucified a Friend, a Savior! With the priest, a contemptible penance; with Jesus, the death of God! Say, do say, which of those pardons appears to you to proceed from God, and which to be invented by men!

Away, then, with this vain apparatus of forms, lusts, macerations! I have something else to do; I have my life to spend in works of love, courage, and holiness; I will no longer macerate my body, I will purify my heart; I will not mutter Latin prayers, wearisome and unintelligible alike, but with the warm impulse of my heart I will cry aloud to God, "Thanks, thanks, my Father, Thou hast saved me; I will love thee, love my brothers, and live a holy life. Take away your images: my Bible is enough! Remove your rosaries; I no longer count my prayers! Free me from the burdens of your fasts; I wish to abstain from nothing but sin! "Thanks, thanks, my Father, Thou hast saved me!"

A DESCENDANT OF JOHN ROGERS, THE MARTYR.—Died in Royalston, the 3d inst., Mrs. Eunice, wife of Benoni Peck, Esq., aged sixty-five. Mrs. Peck was daughter of Mr. Eliphalet Rogers, late of Royalston, and son of Mr. Benjamin Rogers, who was son of Rev. John Rogers, Pastor of the first church, in Ipswich and President of Harvard College, who died July 2, 1684. This gentleman was the eldest son of Rev. Nathaniel Rogers, who came from England in 1636, and settled at Ipswich as colleage pastor with Rev. Nathaniel Ward, and died July 2, 1655, aged fifty-seven. Nathaniel Rogers, was a son of Rev. John Rogers, of Dedham, England, who died October 18, 1630, aged sixty-seven, and John was grandson of the Rev. John Rogers, the martyr, who was burnt at Smithfield, February 5, 1555, nearly three centuries ago. [Fitchburg Reveille

RECOLLECTIONS OF NEW ORLEANS

Forty Years Ago.

[The following reminiscences are from W. Garret, Esq., and kindly forwarded to us through his son, the ex-Secretary of Alabama: Ed.]

During the war between the United States and Great Britain some forty years ago, I visited the city of New Orleans on business, and remained there some time. In my stay, I became acquainted with the Rev Lewis Hobbs, sent there as a missionary (as I understood) from the South Carolina Conference. As I was a boarder in the same house with him, I spent many of my spare hours in his company. I considered Mr. Hobbs a deeply pious man, and much in the spirit of his mission. He appeared to be a man of but feeble physical powers, and those powers to be giving way to his labors and to the climate. His labors were abundant. I remember of spending a Sabbath with him, in which I heard him preach four times:—early in the morning to the prisoners in the old Calliaboos, then at ten o'clock at a hired house in the city, again at four o'clock, and then again at night. His sermons were short, commonly from thirty to forty minutes, yet they contained the essentials of the gospel mission, and though he was not an eloquent man, in the common acceptation of that term, yet he was endowed with one kind of eloquence, (O, how important for a minister!) "He preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven," and with a heart filled with love to God and man; he spoke from the heart, and it often reached the heart of his hearers. I remember to have seen among his hearers finely dressed females, (attracted perhaps by the novelty of Methodist preaching, as it was a new thing in New Orleans at that time,) before the discourse was finished, dissolved in tears.

The Government had but recently passed from the hands of the French to the Americans. The citizens of Orleans were mainly made up of French and Spanish, and they were generally Roman Catholics. They opposed Methodist preaching. I was informed while at Orleans, that they applied to the Mayor of the city to use his authority to prevent it, and that he was disposed to do so, for he was a French Roman Catholic, but he was informed by an American lawyer, that he had nothing to do with it, and reminded that he was in America, where the Constitution and Laws authorized all men to worship God, according to the dictates of their own consciences—so they were disappointed.

I remember another incident. A servant of a rich French lady had gone to hear Mr. Hobbs preach. She became convicted, obtained religion, and joined the Church. The Roman Catholics went to her mistress, saying that her servants would all be ruined if she suffered them to go to the Methodist meetings. She replied that "she would like to have them all ruined as that one was; that before she went to hear the Methodists she was a disobient, bad servant, but that now she was one of the best servants she had."

I have remarked that Brother Hobbs was in feeble health, which appeared to be failing, yet he seemed to have the spirit of the Apostle Paul, when he said: "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God."

I left Brother Hobbs in Orleans, and made my way home to East Tennessee, where I then resided. And a long and weary journey it was, passing through the Choctaw, Chickasaw and Cherokee nations of Indians. About twelve months after I had parted from Bro Hobbs in Orleans, I was sitting in my porch, and saw some person coming down my avenue, bearing the appearance of "a weary man, and tired beast." It was Brother Hobbs worn down by his labors at Orleans, and the toils of a long and wearisome journey. He had come to rest and refresh himself at my house. He remained some time, and I importuned him much to stay with me, but he consented not. He seemed to think that he would die soon, and wished to get to his relatives in Georgia. I understood he did get there, and shortly after died in the triumphs of faith, and is no doubt now enjoying "that rest that remains for the people of God." W. G.

ALABAMA, February 5, 1853.

"IT IS GOOD FOR A MAN THAT HE BEAR THE YOKE IN HIS YOUTH."

By bearing the yoke is meant the enduring of hardships of whatever sort—poverty, affliction, disappointment, persecution—all adverse providences. These adverse providences in early life bode a man good—not evil. Like the storms that purify the air, they are healthful to the spirit. Harsh school-masters are they—teaching grand lessons of wisdom and fortitude. You have thought God partial, perhaps, in the bestowment of his favors because he brought not you into the world like some others—the born-heirs of station and riches. Under your burdens you have sighed for the freedom of a more prosperous condition, and coveted the walks of ease and plenty which are not for you; they would hurt you more than they would help you. Your burdens are your blessings. Your yoke, if you bear it, is good for you. This, I think, can be made to appear.

Because such a lot in early life creates a sense of dependence upon God. The heart that has few earthly hopes to kindle it, looks away more naturally and earnestly to the charm of immortal hopes. For such an one to sell all that he hath, and follow the cross-bearing Son of God is not like forsaking houses and lands. He who has no human helper, who is called to struggle alone, who takes his first painful steps with few of all who look upon him to bid him "God speed;" whose sensitive nature is wounded by coldness or taunting; and on whose neck the pressure of an unprovided condition bears gallingly, what shall he do but resort to God and make Him his friend, and seek a sympathy from His heart of love, and ask His hand to bind up his bruised spirit, and, having no other reliance to tempt him, rely upon strength and grace divine? And such a choice in life's morning, how it lights up all the gloomy day! In youth choosing God as the portion, all is well for manhood and age. Happy, happy lot, blessed hardships that lead to such a choice!

Such a lot in early life preserves from temptation and vice. How it does this, is seen at once if it lead the heart to God, for then divine grace enters in and becomes the keeper of the soul. And if it does not do this, it has yet an influence of its own to hedge up the way of youth from the onset of temptation. Idleness is the parent of vice. Ease and luxury are the high-priests of the shrine of pleasure. Riches and leisure are more than martyr flames, a fiery trial for virtue. It is in the sunshine that the serpent broad of the passions is warmed and roused to eager life. What the impetuous desire calls for, the unoccupied hand is free to seize upon—the ample resources able to command. A double guard of moral principles is needed for the heights of prosperity, especially in the ardent days of youth. But let this early way be beset with hardships—let the chill blasts of adversity blow upon the face of passion—let hand and thought be bond-slaves to daily necessity, and the heart overshadowed continually by the lowering clouds of trouble, and want, and the excesses of crime and wantonness are excluded, as by an iron barrier. Here, if any where on this flinty path, may the feet of young men tread safely though sorely.

Such a lot in early life develops, disciplines, and strengthens character. Childhood is quickly passed amid hardships. It is not a long summer of careless mirth—it is but a summer's day. The lines of thought-lessness are early traced on cheek and brow. An acquaintance is made with life's experiences while the years are yet few. Necessity, a rigid teacher, ripens her scholars fast in knowledge—bitter but salutary. The pupils of want graduate into a quick maturity. Young in number of days, old in lessons of what the world is, they are men with the stature of children.

A habit of self-reliance is one fruit of such training. Out of itself, having no refuge but God, the soul begins to summon whatever of energy it has within. With no helping hand to lead up the difficult steeps, it braces its own limbs to the ascent. With none to help to bear burdens, it hardens its own neck to the yoke. The mothers of the South Pacific Isles push their offspring, scarce out of infancy, into the sea, and they must swim or drown. Trained by such rude nurture, they are as much at home as dolphins amid the waves. Those pushed early upon life's sea of troubles, compelled to struggle or sink, learn to trust their own arms; the exchange of buffetings with the billows, becomes but pastime; they are never again afraid to commit themselves to rough waters. The lesson is laid up to fall back upon themselves, as upon energies tried and proved, in each exigency of life.

The issue of such varied discipline must be strength of character. Fortitude is the attribute only of souls that have passed through fiery ordeals. Strength to endure is purchased by having endured. They who have known in youth sorrow, and poverty, and hardship, will not blanch before them, let them come again. You may lay care upon such now, it is no new experience. You may weigh them down with burdens, their shoulders have felt such weight before. You may let loose the storms—there is no terror in them, they were the nurses of their youth. Such men are earth-fast rocks. They are no holiday makers. They have bone and muscle immovable when they stand, irresistible when they advance. The great and strong rise not up from silken couches. The earnest workers for human advancement go not forth to their labor in frills and stays. It is the early discipline of trial and suffering that makes men.

Such a lot in early life heightens the joy of success. Pleasant is it when our ends are attained, our good won, to sit down and look back upon our path of advance. Struggles past, perils over, hardships ended, are ever sweet to recall. If one gains success, it is worth more to him that he has conquered it out of difficulties. If his pursuits at first were environed with barrier beyond barrier of obstacles which, by stout and manful assault, he has surmounted and overthrown, the crowning of it is truly grateful, because it is a victory. He will love to contrast the early prospect, so much against him, with the greatness and felicity of the result. Old men who began with nothing, in their homes of ease and honor, or on their high stations of usefulness, recur, with no mean delight, to their struggles of long ago. Their pinched and straightened boyhood; their resolution to outbrave their circumstances, and get the mastery, is to them now their heroic age. Again and again they tell the story of early hardship to their more favored offspring. To part with that history would rob them of half the value of what was so hardly won.

MY PLAYMATE. By ALICE CAREY.

I little care to write her praise,
In truth, I little care that she Should seem as pure in all her ways
To others, as she seems to me.

At morn a sparrow's note we heard,
His shadow fell across her bed,
She smiled, and listened to the bird;
And when the even twilight red,
Fell with the dew, he came again,
And, perching on the nearest bough,
Higher and wilder sang the strain—
She did not smile to hear him now.

Many and many years the light,
This moonbeam, sheets for her have spread;
And scented clovers, red and white,
Have made the fringes of her bed.

Small care for sitting in the sun
Have I—small care to war with fate:
The wine and the wormwood are as one,
Since thou art dead my pretty mate.

DR. BEECHER ON REVIVALS.

We have been requested to publish the following remarks of the venerable Beecher on revivals. We do it cheerfully. The present is the time when we need all the light and experience of age and wisdom. The Doctor says:

I have lately heard disparaging remarks made concerning revivals; that they were attended with so many defects; that their absence was better than their presence; and that on the whole we had better go back to the good old days when revivals were unknown, and ministers had easy times; when no such attacks were made upon the heart, and conscience, and intellect, but that he could spend most of his time on his farm, fattening his hogs and getting in his crops, while if he preached half a century he would never hear of a conversion. I would ask these croakers at revivals how many friends of missions would have been mustered, if there had been no revivals? My brethren, we must have revivals! It must rain faster or we perish with drouth! There is no such thing as a growing, progressive church without them. God has never multiplied His people; never built up His kingdom rapidly without them, and never will. This is the thought I would impress upon those who hear me—the indispensible necessity of revivals of religion to perpetuate the church and to convert the world.

1. Revivals are necessary as a kind of substitute for miracles. God is the author of conversion, but not in the way of miracles—without reference to and conformity with the laws of mind. Miracles cannot convert the soul. How many of those who witnessed the miracles of Christ, do you suppose, were converted by the prodigies that astounded them? Miracles had their use, but that use was not the conversion of the soul. But now their object is accomplished; the gospel is authenticated; the work is under motion. Hear the world roar as it rushes along; and see, as civilization advances, wealth accumulates, luxury abounds, and society rises higher and higher, how men dislike the humbling doctrines of the cross! Religion becomes offensive; the gospel is odious; and if they go on they will scout it out of the world with their sneers and contempt. How are you to make head against all this accumulating hatred? By jogging along in the good old orthodox way? No; men will go to hell by whole generations if something be not done. But go into a church filled with those gay, self-sufficient, contemptuous schemers, when the spirit of God is abroad, and the atmosphere of revivals envelopes the mass. Then see how they stir; what an arrest is put upon the current of their worldliness! The whole town is affected. Conviction spreads from heart to heart, like a fire in a dry forest. Every body feels, and you cannot tell why. In Litchfield, during a great revival, I would hear of conversions taking place simultaneously, ten miles apart, without any contact or intercommunion. The gospel then took hold. It was invested with a kind of almightiness. It is impossible for the truth to make such an impression any other time. We must have revivals if the world is ever to be converted. To wait till the church is filled with the droopings of the sanctuary, is to wait forever. On the ratio of conversions which take place under an old cozy orthodox ministry, it would take to all eternity to convert the world. We must travel faster. A nation must be born in a day.

2. We must have revivals to keep pace with the progress of the world's education, civilization, philosophy, business, thought. Every thing now goes ahead; and nothing but revivals will keep us in hailing distance of the world. The church is in the world; and if the church goes ten times as fast as formerly, we need ten times the power to keep our hold of it. A church in the days of Puritane could endure a season of death and destitution for seventy years, and yet keep alive. But ten years of destitution now, will do more injury in a church now, than seventy then. If we went along in the old pace we would soon be out of sight. The world would leave us so far behind that we could not be discerned with a telescope.

3. We need revivals to secure the ministration of sound Scriptural doctrine. The carnal mind is enmity towards God; and where conversions are unfrequent the worldly spirit predominates. I have seen the time when men's minds were impressed with an omnipresent awe; some were vexed, and some trembled, as I preached the severe humbling doctrines of the cross, but not a dog wagged his tongue. The presence of the revival enabled me to preach, without let or hindrance, the whole truth. But just as soon as the revival subsided and the pressure was taken off, for me to have preached the same truths would have created an insurrection. We must have revivals, or we shall stand a chance to meet the mob. The world will not endure sound doctrine without the subduing power of revivals.

4. We need revivals to prevent the fatal effects of doctrinal formality. Many good people seem to think that if they have the Shorter Catechism in their houses, and especially if they have taught their children to "say" it, all will be well. I don't know of any thing more stupefying, Lethean, than a dead orthodoxy. Orthodoxy, without revivals, will produce formality. There are a great many ways to hell; and I do not know, but the orthodox way is as fatal as any. He who lives on trusting to the saving power of his creed, may be sure he is riding down the broad road at a railroad speed.

I do not wish to speak of myself; but if there be a thing for which I desire to thank God, it is that He has permitted me to have some part in the glorious work of revivals. I am an old man, and on the very verge of eternity; I would say that if I had a thousand lives, they would be devoted to [illegible] revivals. You will ask me how [illegible] are to be obtained? Take this, [illegible] last counsel of an old man, for I shall soon leave the world. I never yet had a revival unexpectedly, or on the mere ground that God is a sovereign, and pours out His Spirit when and where he pleases. This doctrine never yet begat revivals. I always sought and labored for them, carefully watching the indications of Providence, and endeavoring by the grace of God, to seize upon the appropriate moment. If the time came when efforts seemed called for, I made them. If I found my own heart not prepared for a revival, I took it to the throne of grace for correction. Revivals, like all good things, are to be labored for diligently, faithfully. Do any of you feel the need of a revival in your churches? There is my experience. Prayer and labor—faith and works. Let me add, the preaching I have found to be most successful was doctrinal. I never wrote articles for the press, with rounded periods and polished style, to do execution with in a revival. I never had any freedom when I was obliged to read my sermon so closely that I could not make a gesture. Such sermons always grow cold in the mouth, and freeze the hearts of the hearers. I taught men they were rebels against God—the doctrine of total depravity—defining what I meant by it, and by all means what it didn't mean; and then, after stating the doctrine as clearly as I could, I endeavored to send it home. I never did any good with a sermon which had no application. Men are not so eager for the truth that they will pick it up. Other animals may do it, but sinners will not. Sermons ought to be made properly for execution. The church will never do her duty without revivals.

Saturday Morning, February 26.

Minutes of Louisiana Conference.

These are now out—a neat pamphlet of 84 pages. Showing a membership of—

Whites	4872
Colored	5115
Traveling Preachers	43
Local Preachers	92
Superannuated Preachers	3
Total	10,125
Collected for missions past year	$10,297 05
Superannuates, widows, orphans	451 45
Support of Bishops	137 75
Bible cause	226 02
Sunday Schools	934 00
Total	$12,046 17

The report of the domestic field shows fifty-three plantations, numbering twenty-six hundred slaves, on which there is preaching by missionaries appointed by the Conference.

To the Presiding Elders packages will be sent for distribution addressed as follows:

Opelousas.....Rev. P. M. Goodwyn.
Shreveport.....Rev. W. E. Doty.
Trenton.....Rev. J. Sandors.
Lake Providence, La....Rev. Z. Thompson.

A Governor and the Sabbath.

The Mobile correspondent of the Delta, writing on the 22d instant, shows a "difference." The writer says that "save at a soldier's funeral, the military dress is never seen on a Sunday in Mobile." The item is a palpable hit at our Louisiana officials:

"Governor Collier arrived here at a very early hour on Sunday, and as he came for military duty, and in his military capacity, military preparations were made to receive him. Now, in your city the 'uniform' is a regular Sunday suit; not so here. Your Governors, too, differ from those of Alabama, and hence the messenger, sent to ask when the Commander-in-chief would please to be escorted to the quarters, returned with the simple intimation contained in the word 'Sabbath.' It was of course enough."

DEPARTURE OF BISHOP SOULE.

On Tuesday morning last, accompied by a traveling companion, Rev. B. T. Crouch, jun., of Memphis Conference, the venerable Senior Bishop of American Methodism, left our port, on the mail-line steamship Philadelphia, for California.

The oldest Bishop and the oldest preacher in the Church took his journey, in age and feebleness, to its most distant and rugged Conference, lying on the other side of the Continent, and reached by six thousand miles travel! Verily, the spirit of itineracy is not yet extinct.

A company of preachers felt it who lingered on the wharf as the steamer unloosed from her moorings. The whole Church must feel it. John Wesley, whose parish was the world, yet has successors. A brother, strong in the spirit of the scene, remarked that this example was a revival—a revival of itineracy, and the day would soon be when every member of an annual Conference would report himself, and hold himself ready, to go, for seven years, and preach the gospel to any part of the world! Nobly conceived! This is not a time to talk of locating the ministry. The spirit of the Church, the opening doors of heathendom, the increasing facilities of trade, and international communication, all speak—go ye—go ye out—go ye into all the world! The cords must be stretched out—not drawn in!—Gospel messengers must be on their feet!

The Bishop took a cheerful leave of his friends on ship-board, and in response to their frequent expressions of solicitude for his safe return manifested, like "Paul the aged," the same indifference to the things that might befal him, in the discharge of this duty, as was expressed in his letter to the Missionary Board when he undertook it:

"So I may but sleep in Jesus, no matter when, no matter where."

We would not omit to state, in justice to the courteous benevolence of the Messrs. Aspinwall, that a free passage was tendered him.

A DISAPPOINTED CHURCH.

A correspondent, R. F. P., writing from that portion of the Louisiana Conference situate in Vermillion Parish, complains with force and feeling that no pastor was sent this year to Perry's Bridge. He represents the people, and other representations corroborate his, as able and willing to support the Ministry of the Word—desiring and deserving it. The ministrations of our Church have been not only welcomed in that quarter, but attended with much moral and religious good. He asks—

"Has, indeed, an enemy gone forth from among us, to report aught of us to our harm, that thus we should have no one sent to sow the good seed, or reap the blessed harvest in our borders? Why should we be thus forsaken—left without a preacher in this land which Methodism, be it said to her praise, can claim by a sort of preemption right? I see no cause, and I think no valid one exists."

The evils of this non-occupation by a Conference appointment are thus portrayed in part:

"And what are to be its consequences? A new feature of worship is already to be introduced into our midst, to which we have no counteracting influence, much as it is to be desired. We have never yet had a Mass said in our little town. But it appears that on next Sunday, 13th instant, Catholic service is to be established among us. Even in the very building where, for the last two years, we have heard the gospel of truth, is the gowned priest of Rome to take his stand, and under the cover of religious worship entertain the people with the lifting up of the trailing robe, the jingling of bells, and the mumery of unmeaning Latin phrases. And a little way off, will stand the new Methodist Church, upbraidingly showing the unzealous contrast of closed doors, silence reigning within, and the spiders weaving their webs unmolested about its walls. We write these things "more in sorrow than in anger," and we put the question, in all seriousness, ought it so to be?"

R. F. P., and those he speaks for—not a few—are indeed afflicted at their destitution. And they show, by their appreciation of gospel privileges, that they deserve the best preacher in the Conference. We would not grudge him to them. But our Brethren should judge nothing and no man before the time—neither Bishop, Presiding Elders, nor Conference. We put the case in its simple difficulty to them: Seventy appointments to supply with about forty preachers. How could each get one preacher? Such cases as those must have racked St. Paul's brain when the "care of all the Churches came upon" him. We have sometimes imagined the Apostle in the midst of his perplexities—pushing on the kingdom, extending and planting Churches in his zeal, and yet hard put to it to supply them with ministers. Laboring to meet the demands of a great and widening work with the abilities of the few who say, "Here am I; send me!" Even Paul, with Timothy, and Titus, and Mark, and Epaphroditus, and such like at his command, was sometime at his wit's ends. They did not possess the attributes of ubiquity—neither he, though he hastened from point to point with anxious alacrity. Some churches were still disappointed, or to use our phrase, "poorly supplied." And in all this we judge his distribution of ministers was governed by the rule which our appointing power endeavor to observe—supplying not the most worthy, but the most needy.

We see something of his perplexities when he writes to the impatient Philippians—"trust to send Timothy shortly unto you." Again, in another place—"I also, myself, shall come shortly." That adverb of time, "shortly," has much meaning in it. Again, at another time, and writing from another place—"Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me." That word "shortly" once more. See him disposing of a feeble force to cover a large field—some deserting the ranks of availability to make scarcity more scarce. "Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world, and is departed unto Thessalonica; Crescens, to Galatia; Titus, unto Dalmatia. Only Luke is with me. Take Mark and bring him with thee; for he is profitable to me for the ministry. And Tychicus have I sent to Ephesus."

Now, good Brethren of Vermillion Parish, and all in your condition, do you not see this trouble is an old one? Do you not sympathize with the Bishop in making his appointments? It may be, that a supply will come to you "shortly." Perhaps the Bishop had his eye upon one when he left the place open, and ere this he is ministering to you.

Forget not to draw out faithfully your own resources in the mean time, in holding various religious meetings, and God will bless you, and that right early and abundantly.

We append a resolution adopted at the late session of the Louisiana Conference:

"Day of Fasting.—Resolved, That in view of the greatness of the harvest lying within the bounds of our Conference, and the fewness of laborers, we solemnly set apart the first Friday in May next, as a day of fasting and prayer, that the Lord of the harvest would send forth more laborers into this harvest; that we pray for the prosperity of the Church, and request all our members to assemble at Church on that day for religious services."

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS.

Our brethren of the Baptist Church will date an era in their history in this city from the past week. A Consultation Meeting, of delegates from the Conventions of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and Middle Tennessee, met on the 19th, and adjourned the 22d instant, to take into consideration measures for Baptist Church Extension. Rev. C. F. Curtis, Secretary of the Southern Mission Board, met with them. A fine feeling and liberal counsels prevailed. It was resolved to raise, in the bounds of those several Conventions, $t5,000 to be added to the legacy of Mr. Paulding, (about the same amount) for building a Church forthwith. An eligible lot, on the corner of Camp and Basin streets, has been bought for $5,500. Until the building is ready, for use, the congregation will occupy an apartment in Odd Fellows' Hall. Rev. J. E. Dawson, from Georgia, will act for the present as their pastor. It is hoped to secure Mr. Dawson permanently. Mr. D. is represented as a strong and good man, and just such is needed for this work.

We commend to Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, and all evangelicals, the following paragraph from their appeal, inserting "the cause of our common Christianity" just before "our denomination:"

"We do hope that the Baptists of the South, and South-west, will make one united effort for the regeneration of New Orleans. We regard the importance of its religious occupation to our denomination in the great West, as great as Jefferson did its political and commercial importance to the Mississippi Valley. It was for a vast sum that our Government purchased Louisiana to secure New Orleans, and had that sum been thrice what it was, it would have borne no comparison to its commercial value; nor will any sacrifice that our denomination may make, in successfully occupying New Orleans, in future years be considered too great."

REVIVAL INTELLIGENCE.

Perryville Circuit—Alabama Conference.

This Circuit was formed at the late session of the Alabama Conference, and is the major part, in point of territory, of the former Summerfield Circuit, and numbers nine regular appointments.

Our first Quarterly Meeting was commenced on Saturday, the 29th ultimo, and progressed without any unusual occurrence until Sunday night. The Lord very signally blessed the preaching of His Word; a number were pungently convicted, and presented themselves for the prayers of the Church. Such deep interest being manifested we resolved upon protracting, and did so; and the interest increased from day to day, as we continued to protract, until very nearly the whole community was under the heavenly influence. We continued eleven days in regular succession, and we have good reason to believe that upwards of thirty souls were happily converted, and thirty were added to the Church—twenty-four whites, and six colored.

Our Presiding Elder, Brother F. G. Ferguson, was with us four days, and labored with efficiency and acceptability.

Brother C. C. Callaway was with us nearly all the time, and by his Holy Ghost preaching was made a very highly honored and useful instrument in the salvation of many souls.

Rev. W. Wilkes, of the Baptist Church, preached us two very appropriate and useful sermons.

Our local Brethren, L. P. Ramsay and D. H. Smith, did much faithful service.

A number of the subjects of the revival were heads of families, and it was truly delightful to see the father and the children yielding to the overtures of mercy.

This village, although it has been proverbial for its wickedness and profligacy, has been almost entirely renovated; and we have the consolation to know that "where sin has abounded, grace does much more abound." May the holy influence exerted here spread out upon the entire Circuit.

NEW ORLEANS AND SOUTH-WESTERN BIBLE SOCIETY.

The Agent, Rev. H. C. Thweatt, is promptly in the field and at work. He has, since the 12th ult., visited Caddo, Rapides, Tensas and Feliciana Parishes, in Lonisiana, and gone into Mississippi. He reports a hearty cooperation on the part of people and preachers. We hope to hear from him often, and welcome to our columns his reports of progress. He writes 17th instant:

That my Christian brethren, and friends of the Bible generally, may see that I am endeavoring to do something, though in much weakness, toward the accomplishment of the contemplated object, at present desired, viz: the building of a Bible House in New Orleans. I give you briefly, as follows, the amounts contributed at each place where I have thus far presented the claims of the Society:

Shreveport	$51 00
Greenwood	24 50
Alexandria	50 00
Waterproof	t02 50
Natchez	628 00
Clinton	190 00

At Baton Rouge I took up a small collection, among a few friends, on the eve of my departure, $28 00, which, however, was only the beginning, as they assured me, of what they would do when I returned there, which will be in a few days, after I leave here.

So, you find, from the 10th January to the present date, embracing a period of five or six weeks, as the result of my labors $1074 00 to which add, on former subscription, t90 00 making in all $1,264 00.

I do not flatter myself that any peculiar influence can be brought to bear in this enterprise simply by my efforts, but would rather attribute whatever success may attend it, to its own intrinsic excellency, and the previously prepared views and feelings of the people who so far as I have found, are generally favorable to the object.

The cause is a good one, and must commend itself to every considerate, enlarged, and liberal mind. God has declared that His Word shall fill the Earth. We are only his humble, though honored agents—sent forth to bring together, and rightly apply, the means which He, himself, hath so graciously and abundantly provided. O! then, let us, who dwell in this portion of his vineyard, see to it, that we do our part in this important work, and rest not at least till we have erected, in the great Emporium of the South-west, a depository from which shall issue, to the destitute of these lands, the Word of Life. With sincere and Christian regard, I am, fraternally, yours,

Jackson, La. H. C. Thweatt.

STATE OF LOUISIANA AND CENTENARY COLLEGE.

The present Legislature of Louisiana has not neglected to consider the interests of Education. The proposition, touching Normal Schools, we hope to see perfected and something come of it. In the mean time public attention has been drawn by Hon. D. Randall, of Lafourche, who has expressed the opinion that Centenary College was bound, according to its contract with the State, to board as well as educate ten students designated by the Governor. The matter has been brought before the Legislature, and if this construction be correct, then the College has failed to fulfil the terms of its contract.

We are glad to see in the Southern Mirror, of the 17th instant, the legal opinion of the Attorney General, Hon. Isaac Johnson, on the subject. From this it appears that those having charge of Centenary College have been true to their engagements to the uttermost. President Rivers, in submitting the opinion for publication, remarks:

"This opinion, which I regard as lucid, just and satisfactory, should have the more weight as the act referred to was passed during the administration of Governor Johnson, and as no man is better acquainted with the history of the act than himself."

New Orleans, La.,
January 15, 1853.

My Dear Sir—I am in the receipt of your letter in which my official opinion is desired in reference to the proper interpretation to be given to the third section of the Act of the Legislature for the relief of the Purchasers of the College of Louisiana, approved March 10, 1848. The section declares that it shall be the duty of the Faculty of the Centenary College to have at all times in said Institution, and to educate gratuitously, ten indigent young men, to be designated by the Governor of the State, and the question presented for consideration arises from the fact that the Faculty of the College deny that their obligation, to admit into said Institution and to educate gratuitously ten indigent young men, includes and carries with it the obligation to board them. On this view of their obligations and duties the Trustees and Faculty of Centenary College have uniformly acted, and in that view my judgment is obliged to concur.

Argument is certainly unnecessary to prove that to educate gratuitously does not embrace in its meaning the obligation to furnish food also. By the terms of the section the Faculty may be bound to furnish rooms in the College buildings to such indigent beneficiaries as may be designated by the Governor, but this inference will not sanction the idea of an obligation to board them free of charge. There is no obscurity in the law, and the rule is when the letter of a law is plain, it cannot be deserted under a pretext of pursuing its spirit.

I am not, however, inclined to the opinion that the intention of the Legislature has been violated by the Faculty of Centenary College in the construction they have given of their duties and responsibilities in virtue of the Act of the 16th March, 1848.

The College of Louisiana having failed to accomplish the object and purposes of its incorporation, the property and buildings belonging to it were sold by authority of law, at public auction, to several philanthropic and enterprising gentlemen, who gave their bond for the purchase money thereof in the sum of $10,000.

On the ruins of the College of Louisiana the purchasers built up the Centenary College and put it into successful operation. The bonds thus executed were required by the first section of the Act of 16th March, 1848, to be delivered to said purchasers whenever the Trustees of the Centenary College executed officially their bond to the State for a like sum, with a first mortgage on the property and buildings of said College. This being done the bond was relieved of interest, and from collection, as long as the Trustees furnished a regular Faculty of Arts, competent teachers, etc.

The Faculty were moreover bound to have at all times in said Institution, and to educate gratuitously, ten indigent young men to be designated by the Governor of the State, and in the event of a failure on the part of the Trustees and Faculty to perform these conditions, and others enumerated in the fourth section of the Act, the bond executed as aforesaid became due and collectable with legal interest from the time of forfeiture. Legal interest on the bond for one year is $500, and the cost of educating ten young men for the same time amounts to the same sum, and it is clear to my mind that the abeyance of interest, as stipulated, was intended as the consideration for the gratuitous education of ten indigent young men.

If, therefore, in the sense of a supposed implied obligation, the Trustees and Faculty are held bound in law to board gratuitously those ten indigent students, as well as to educate them, it would cost one thousand dollars in addition or fifteen per cent. per annum on their bond, ten per cent. of which would necessarily be of cash expenditure, when in fact the bond can bear no interest except in the event and from the time of a forfeiture as already stated. Such a construction cannot prevail. It would render the obligation of the Trustees extremely onerous, especially when considered in reference to other duties and responsibilities assumed by them, not only in the interest of educating, but as fair equivalents for the forbearance of the State to enforce payment of their bond.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
Isaac Johnson, Att'y Gen'l.

Hon. David A. Randall, Donaldsonville, La.

Baton Rouge, La., Feb. 1853.

Sir—The foregoing opinion is a copy from the Record in the Office of Attorney General, which I think proper to communicate to you. With great respect, your obedient servant, Isaac Johnson.

Rev. R. H. Rivers,
President Centennry College, Jackson La.

Oak Bowery, F. M. C.—The President, Rev. W. F. Samford, writes 14th instant:

"Our College to-day enters upon its second week, and we number fifty-three pupils, with brightning prospects. Our halls will be full and we shall, with God's blessing, succeed."

We quote from the College Circular the Faculty:

CHOLERA and INTEMPERANCE.

It is a fact, and a singular one, that a cholera visitation puts "good old brandy" into uncommon requisition. Thousands broke through their pledges of total abstinence the few years past, because the cholera was about and they were fighting it off. We visited a fair in this city once, when it was prevailing to considerable extent, and on one table, kept by beautiful ladies, was a decanter labelled "Cholera King." It was brandy. How far these cures and preventives go let this tell. A clergyman in Rochester, New York, referring in one of his sermons to the cholera, which so fearfully prevailed, recently, in some sections of that city, remarked:

"Most of the adult cholera victims were also victims of intemperance, hurried into the presence of their Judge with but a few hours' warning, and to all human appearance, I must say, unprepared for eternity. Never did I more heartily deprecate the vice of drunkenness than when, on some of those sad funeral occasions, I was not only forced to think of the ghastly tenant of the coffin as having, as it were, reeled and staggered into eternity, but was also forced to see living drunkards as my attendants to the place of burial, and so under the influence of intoxication, at the very grave, as to be unfit to render the needed aid to those who bury the dead! On one occasion I remonstrated with the only persons, four in number, who constituted the company at the grave, and all of whom were partially intoxicated, and within three days they all died of the cholera, and were in their graves near the spot where I had forewarned them of their danger."

ARMINIANISM SPREADING.

The Presbyterian suspects that Congregationalists, transplanted in the West, work loose from the tight Calvanistic lacing that obtains in the East. Of course the Presbyterian laments this "degeneracy" which we rejoice over as a good sign of improvement. In the broad, expansive, unsophisticated West, without "notions" and ecclesiasticul cretchets, where common-sense people will judge doctrines, in a common-sense way, without the bias of "Schools," old or new, we expect Arminianism to hold its own, and more, in all contests with Calvinism. The Presbyterian bases its remarks upon a lately published sermon, and refers to its author as one whose statements may be confided in. It says:

"The defectious in Western Congregationalism, as referred to in this sermon, are at once startling and melancholy. He relies for his facts on the published doctrinal formulas of conventions, conferences, and prominent churches, by which it is made apparent that Western Congregationalists are fast receding from the Calvinistic basis, and slurring important doctrines, either with a view of propitiating Arminians, or what is more probable, from a want of hearty faith in the doctrines themselves."

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

If there be any subject of universal interest—any one which would command the suffrages of Ninety-nine out of every hundred men, women and children in our land—it is that of the immediate commencement by our Government of a route of communication by railroad between the Atlantic and Pacific portions of the confederacy.

While we admit that the importance of a measure demands a commensurate deliberation, yet we do earnestly deprecate and protest against that selfish, dog-in-the-manger policy which, while it cannot effect all that its own immediate interest requires, only induces to the lamentable result of doing nothing at all. All the letter writers from Washington admit the universally favorable disposition of members of Congress towards this vast project; but they all equally agree that the preference for particular routes—a sort of commercial (honorable, because not sectional,) jealousy at the North and the South, will inevitably lead to its defeat, at least this session.

The importance of a speedy communication with the Pacific is so generally admitted, that it seems a labor of supererogation to dwell upon it. As a peace measure it gives us the trade between all Europe and Eastern Asia, and the Isles of the Pacific. In time of war it would be indispensable to the integrity of the Republic. Only a few days ago Mr. Senator Bell (and, as late Secretary of War, few men are more entitled directed to it, and we shall be surprised if the next year does not witness demonstrations which the National Legislature will not dare to neglect. We trust that petitions will flow from every Congressional District in the Union, that members may be admonished of the imperious necessity of discarding all sectional interests, of throwing aside all their petty bickerings, and uniting in the firm resolve to enter at once upon a work demanded by every consideration of national policy.

METHODIST PRESS.

What Should be Done—The editor of the Nashville Advocate discusses that endless and interesting subject—the periodicals of Church. We have said our say on this subject, and for the present shall confine ourselves to the practical part of the business—publishing a Church periodical, on the cash plan, at a low price, at the most eligible point in the bounds of the Southern Church, and promoting, by a broad-cast circulation, as much as in us lies all the ends, aims, and interests, of a Methodist Christian Advocate. We hope our patrons are of the same mind, and will help us do the same thing.

Our Nashville cotemporary thinks the General Conference should select two or three points for the location of weekly papers. "Let them be well edited, and published as cheap as possible." Exactly so. He suggests that—

"Two or three weekly papers, a quarterly, or well conducted monthly, a lady's magazine, and a Sunday school journal, might, by harmony of action and united energy, be well sustained, and would certainly meet the demands of the Church in her calls for periodical literature; while the further energies of the Church should be directed to a more permanent class of works—expounding and advocating the doctrines and duties of Christianity, and such miscellaneous productions as would be useful to the Church and the reading public."

Dancing Professors.—Certain sins are epidemical in their character. They take to particular classes of the Church and run their course. They break out, in various and distant places, simultaneously. This is singular and worthy of consideration. Last week an old and faithful Pastor published in our columns a Prescription. It was plain enough what sort of troubles he had been contending with. This week the Buffalo Advocate comes to us and the leader is not headed "Prescription," but evidently looks to the same thing. The editor says:

"We have heard of Dancing Christians. No, excuse us, we have heard of Dancing Professors. Those who had solemnly at the altar renounced the world with all of its vain pomp and glory. But, alas, conscience has grown unwatchful upon her sentinel post. Her voice has been stifled, or her faithful admonitions are no longer heeded. The spell of pleasure is upon them. Her syren notes invite to the public ball-room, and there with the giddy, thoughtless, sinful throng, are seen professors giddy, thoughtless and sinful, apparently, as any of the children of the world. The mind of the scoffer and the impenitent exult over the fact. The accession of such fills with satisfaction the ungodly heart. Christ is wounded in the house of his friends. The Church and the cause of religion is disgraced in the person, and by the acts of the unworthy professor. How sickening the sight! But this might do were there no life beyond the grave. Pause and consider, ye offending ones, whether this is your Father's work, about which you should be. For a moment let the scenes of the Judgment pass in review before you. See the assembled dead of a thousand ages around the throne. The Almighty Judge sits in robes of light and majesty. All classes and conditions are arrayed to meet the results of a life spent in piety, or squandered in folly and sin. The expectant angels cease from their songs of praise, while in character of living fire is seen written on the arches of heaven, 'as ye have sown, so shall ye reap this day.' Then, how extremely vain will the vanities of life appear in comparison to that virtuous and godly course, which will meet the outbeaming wonders of the last day with joy and the most triumphant realizations. May not our warning and entreating voice be heard! May it not gather strength in view of the bitter reflections of the hour, and the dreadful forebodings of the fearful future. The sublime principles upon which Christianity is based command the respect and admiration of the world. Their purity is such that they force an homage, unwilling though it may be, from the impenitent. Who, think you, among the church membership is held in the greatest respect by those who make no professions of religion? Is it he who is seen at the theatre, in the public ball-room, in the tippling shop, he whose garments of piety set loosely upon him—he who is the boon companion in the social hour! Most certainly it is not. The scoffer may like the association, may like the treason to God and the Church, but in his heart he despises the traitor. But that one who makes the word of God the 'man of his counsel,' and the guide of his life—whose every-day walk bears evidence that he has sat at Jesus's feet—who mirrors forth the Christian virtues in their greatest purity and perfection, is looked up to even by the vile and impenitent, with mingled feelings of veneration and respect."

A Call to the Ministry.—Nothing is worthier of the best efforts of the best writers, at this time, than the task of setting distinctly, impressively, and in a manner difficult to be misunderstood, before the Church a call to the Ministry—what it is. He that furnishes the proper article, or series of articles, readable and scriptural, to this point will furnish a desideratum—he will serve his generation and bless the Church. And those who do not write it, ought to preach it. We do not suggest what a Prize Essay is offered for in a late number of the "Independent," a Congregationalist paper. A layman fears that unless some means are used "to arrest the tendency of high-minded, cultivated, and pious young men, to enter into other departments of life, in preference to the Ministry, the Churches, and the world, will long have reason to regret it," and therefore he offers a prize of two hundred dollars—

"For the best Essay on the means to be used by the Churches for making the pastoral office a more inviting and productive field of Christian labor."

Now, we would have the duty only made plain. This being done—pious young men will hardly wait for the field to become more "inviting."

The Holston Advocate has a well-timed article on a call to the Ministry. The editor begins by saying:

Some alledge that there is no such thing as a conscious manifestation of the Divine will to any man, that a dispensation of the gospel is committed to him, and he will be held to a strict accountability for obedience to the injunction thus imposed: that the only proof of such call any man can have, is found in a desire for usefulness and to his fellow men—a desire for their salvation, and the providential opening of his way into the Ministry. But, meanwhile, it is supposed that no penalty is annexed to a refusal to obey this call.

But he indicates his better opinion to be otherwise:

That those who are put into the Ministry by the great Head of the Church, are the subjects of a call so clear and convincing as to leave them no option but at the hazard of their comfort in this life, and of their prospects for the world to come. In other words, that their call to this work is ordinarily convincing, that a refusal to obey it involves a willful disobedience to Christ.

Thereupon follows a "running sketch," not a fancy sketch, as many have proved:

Did you see that young man? He was converted at ——, joined the Church under the Ministry of Rev. ——, and has maintained a consistent Christian walk and conversation ever since. The secret wish of his heart has been to live the life of a Christian, but in a modest and retired manner, not being conspicuous in the Church, or regarded with those who are specially "set for the defence of the gospel." He takes great delight in seeing the work of the Lord go forward, but trembles at the idea of being in any measure responsible for the defence of the outposts. He will converse freely with his friends on the interests of religion, and even venture to urge the importance of personal piety; but he does not wish it understood that he claims to be any thing more than a private Christian.

But, notwithstanding the purposes and the plans for life which have been formed by the subject of our story, there is a secret, undefinable sensation, which occasionally comes over him, leaving the impression that he will one day preach the gospel, and yet, even the thought almost startles him.

Fix your eye upon that young man—follow him to the Church to hear the preaching of the Word. Whenever the Ministry—the work of the Ministry—the responsibilities of the Ministry—or the rewards that await the man "that winneth souls" is the theme of the pulpit—he is, unconsciously, all eye—all ear; and the visible emotion which he feels betrays the secret workings of his heart, and tells that the preacher's theme has found a response in his bosom—has touched a chord which vibrates to its loftiest sentiments.

Follow that young man to the lonely walks of life—what are his exercises? He is almost alarmed to find himself exhorting sinners as he walks along. He kneels to pray—he becomes engaged—his thoughts seem involuntarily to run in a certain channel; and after a time he arouses as from a reverie and reproaches himself—for, lo! instead of praying he has been exhorting! Could you follow his eye as he reads the sacred page, you would see that whenever it falls upon a passage touching the duties, obligations and responsibilities of the watchman on the walls of Zion, his bosom heaves, a tear starts from his eye—he enters into the spirit of the man whom his imagination sees on the ramparts of Zion. He wonders why it is so, and passes on.

See the same man when after the business of the day is over and he retires to revisions of preachers, congregations, and religious exercises are before his eyes—"I have called thee"—"cry aloud and spare not"—"he that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me"—"O! son of man, I have set thee as a watchman over the people"—"go preach my gospel saith the Lord" and such like sentences occupy his mind, till it becomes a question of alarming reality, whether he is not indeed called to the work of the Ministry.

Put you ear close to his heart and hear the contest which is going on there. "Vain man that I am—the pride of my heart would prompt me to seek a place among the elders of the land!"—"I will compose myself and think no more about it." This resolution is scarcely formed till the conviction that he must preach returns with greater force, tears gush from his eyes and he cries, "Lord I am but a child—what wouldst thou have me do." All this time he probably keeps his exercises to himself—ashamed to let any one know his thoughts, and if a brother who reads his thoughts in his countenance, should hint the subject, his cheek mantles with a blush, lest it should be thought that he was aspiring.

But we are not yet done with the subject of our story. The matter is drawing to a crisis, and the question has assumed a character of grave reality, involving his interest for both worlds. He begins to count the cost: "What do I seek! Is it ease! I cannot hope for it in the Ministry; to perform that work acceptably requires close application and much labor. Do I seek fame! Alas! not one in twenty acquires fame as a public speaker, and I may not hope to be numbered among the few. Besides, I am well aware that my motives will be impugned by some—that I will be repudiated as unqualified for the work by others. But what shall I do? I cannot gainsay or resist this abiding conviction of duty."

After much prayer and self-examination, he ventures, with trembling, to disclose his exercise to some friend, and begins to arrange his plans for an entrance upon the arduous field that lies before him. We need not pursue his history—our readers know it. He either holds on his way through evil report and good—cultivates his talent—makes the work of the Ministry the business of his life—acquires character and influence, and becomes a blessing to the Church and the world; or he prosecutes his purpose for awhile—becomes fascinated with the flowers that grew by the way-side—concludes that his call, though genuine, was only to a limited sphere of action—he is not qualified for extensive labor—is not required to make such heavy sacrifices. * * * Reader, we need not tell the end.

Bishop Soule and his position.—It is satisfactory and admonitory to see the venerable Senior Bishop of American Methodism, at this stage of the Division Question, and at his time of life, calmly reviewing his position in the M. E. Church, South; and reaffirming it. He writes to the editor of the S. C. Advocate, acknowledging the receipt of $15 contributed by the colored people of Georgetown, S. C., to aid in clearing his expenses to California:

"I regard this offering as one the fruits of the great and precious work of God which has been effected through the instrumentality of the preaching of the gospel, and religious instruction to this deeply interesting class of the population of these States. Let our Northern friends continue their worse than useless controversy. Let us leave them alone in their speculative, but not very brotherly, contentions. We know our calling of God better. We know, blessed be God, that masters and servants may be Christians without the laws of a dissolving the relation which the authority Civil Community, and the higher authority of the inspired Canon, have recognized.

"I assure you, my dear brother, that there is no act of my life, since I entered the Christian ministry, on which I look back with stronger assurance of purity of motive, or with greater satisfaction, than that in which I took a firm position on ground where what influence I might possess could be exerted, directly or indirectly, in the promotion of the best, the highest interests of the colored race. Hundreds of thousands of this race, redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, and brought into his fold by the instrumentality of the missionaries of the Cross, will join in anthems of everlasting praise, (with their pastors and teachers) to the infinite riches of grace."

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

SECULAR PURSUITS INCOMPATIBLE.—The Canada Christian Advocate questions whether any man can travel a circuit, preach to ten or twenty congregations, look after as many societies, perform the requisite amount of pastoral visiting, minister to the sick and poor within his bounds, attend to baptism, marriages, funerals, etc., and give that attention to reading and study which will be requisite, in order that he may "show himself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth;" and at the same time have his attention devoted to worldly pursuits, such as farming, merchandizing, etc! The idea is preposterous. The Church never meditated a worse policy, to say the least, than getting rid of the burden of its ministry by a total or partial secularization. The celebrated Dr. Emmons says, "it is very easy to preach, but very hard to preach well. No other profession demands half so much mental labor as the clerical profession." And we may add, no other profession involves half the responsibility of this. Hence the necessity that the Christian minister should be a man of one work, and devote all the energies of his soul to that work.

The editor draws close lines around one to whom, in this peculiar sense, a "dispensation of the gospel" has been committed:

"Happy is that servant of God who does not quit the field until the Lord calls him out of it. He did not appoint himself to the work of the ministry, nor has he authority to discontinue the divine call: if he ceases to preach without permission from above, he does it at his peril. The gifts and calling of God are without repentance; the Lord does not call a man to-day to the work of the ministry, and change his mind to-morrow, or when a good opportunity offers for entering into business. It is not for him to say when his call expires; when that time comes it will be indicated in a manner too plain to be misunderstood; till then he is bound to devote himself wholly to the work, no matter what may be his difficulties or trials, his opposition or persecutions: whether he be well or poorly paid—whether he 'abound' or 'suffer need;' he must labor on in the fear of God, in all things approving himself as a minister of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labors, in fastings; by pureness, by knowledge, by love unfeigned, by the Holy Ghost, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, by honor and dishonor, by evil report and good report—as a deceiver and yet true—as unknown, and yet well known—as dying, and behold he lives—as chastened and not killed; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing—as poor, yet making many rich—as having nothing, and yet possessing all things." It is not for us with him whether he preach or let alone, whether he continue in the work, or cease it for a more lucrative calling; he is bound by the most solemn of all obligations, the divine appointment, to continue in the work until discharged therefrom by the same authority which called him to it."

Give not thy tongue too great liberty, lest it take thee prisoner. A word unspoken is like the sword in the scabbard—thine. If thou hast thy sword is in another's hand. If thou desire to be wise—be so wise as to hold thy tongue.

The General Minutes of the Methodist Episcopal Church give an aggregate membership of 728,700, an increase for the year 1851-52 of 6896 members.

OBITUARY:

DIED—At his residence in Rankin county, Mississippi, on the 4th February, 1853, after a short illness, REV. JOAB EVANS, in the thirty-ninth year of his age.

The deceased was a native of Mississippi. Possessed of an ardent temperament, he was, before he embraced religion, as much devoted to the pleasures of the world, as he was afterwards to the cause of the Redeemer.

In 1837 he embraced religion, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1842 he began to preach, and having joined the Mississippi Conference, commenced in 1843 the work assigned him. Owing to his ill health his ministerial labors were partially limited for a few years, and the late Conference added his name to the list of superannuated ministers.

He was truly a self-made man. His early advantages were extremely limited; yet, before his marriage, and as soon as he felt constrained to preach the gospel, he began to study assiduously that he might qualify himself for an efficient discharge of his ministerial duties. His improvement soon became known, and he became a useful and an efficient minister.

His loss to the Church where he held his membership is very serious. No one was so active in getting up meetings and aiding in building up the support of the preacher. The Christian friends who knew him intimately before, and since his conversion, bear unanimous testimony to his worth as a Christian and a minister. ✠

MADISON, Feb. 19, 1853.

DIED—In Fayette county, Alabama MRS. ELEANOR, consort of John McClure, in the 73d year of her age.

She was taught in early life to fear God and keep His commandments, but did not receive the spiritual adoption into the family of God until a short time before her death. She was one that loved the Methodist doctrine and discipline, and used all the means she could to bring her children under the influence of the same. During her life she was a strong supporter of the Church, but could not see her way clear before her heavenly Father. About this time a copy of Dr. Bangs's Songs of Zion was put into the hands of the family, which were sung with much faith. While the songs were singing she listened with a great deal of attention. At the close of one, which I do not remember, she said: "Now I understand that it is a truth that it is to be received." The next time Brother Horn returning to see her, he asked her if she was satisfied yet; she answered him in the affirmative. A few days after she was visited again by Brother H., and the same questions asked her, and if she was ready to die. At this she laughed, and said that death was her friend, her treasure. She died happily, and has gone to God.

General Intelligence.

Punch, in estimating the fortune of the Empress of France before marriage, puts down several Chateaux en Espagne, (Castles in the Air.)

It is reported that the Rev. Dr. Hawks, of Calvary Church, NewYork, is to succeed to the vacant Bishopric of North Caroline.

The Bigbee river, says the Mobile Tribune, is within two feet of being as high as it was ever known to be. The account is from Aberdeen.

Vice President King, it is stated, expects in return to Washington by the first of April. Senator Clemens has received a letter from the commander of the steamer Fulton, at Havana, stating that the health of Mr King was much improved. He takes exercise on foot daily.

TEMPERANCE IN DELAWARE.—A bill has been introduced in the legislature of Delaware prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors on the Sabbath, and fixing the license to retail at $100 per annum. Fine and imprisonment is to be the penalty for a violation of the law.

IMMIGRATION.—It is calculated that since the date of the last census, (June 1, 1850) the population of the country has been augmented by immigration, and the natural increase of population, upwards of 11 per cent. The increase from all sources is set down at 2,489,000. In two years and seven months, viz: from June 1, 1850, to December 31, 1852. The number arrived at NewYork alone during the last two years, is 967,621.

VALENTINES.—It is estimated that about 20,000 valentines were dispatched in Boston, on the 14th, about one quarter of that number having passed through the Post-office. At Wheeling, Va., 5000 or 6000, and at Norfolk 1500 passed through the Post-office.

LIBERAL SUBSCRIPTION.—A gentleman from New York has subscribed $400,000, the whole amount required, to build a railroad from Fayetteville, N. C., to the Deep River Coal Mines, in the same State.

A bill has been introduced into the Missouri Legislature appropriating $5000 and appointing an agent to collect specimens of the minerals of the State, to be sent to the World's Fair.

A French savant, whose name we regret to have forgotten, says of the ocean telegraph: "The idea of extending an electric cable connecting Europe and the United States, across the whole Atlantic appears to me to be attended with insurperable difficulties. The only route by which the two worlds can be connected telegraphically, is to pass by Behring Straits, which, with the islands that divide it, presents no greater impediments for a submarine cable than the British Channel."

NEW JERSEY AND THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.—A bill for the incorporation of an "Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company," we see, has just been introduced into the New Jersey Legislature. It embraces a large number of corporators, who are prominent men in that and other States. The capital is stated at $70,000,000, with the privilege of $150,000,000."

A TUNNEL UNDER CINCINNATI.—It is stated that it is seriously contemplated by the directors of the Cincinnati and St. Louis railroad to cut a tunnel under the city of Cincinnati, to connect with the Hillsborough and Parkersburg road, or some other direct eastern route. The Enquirer says the tunnel will be commenced near the foot of Sixth street and run through into Deer Creek Valley, by this means furnishing a sufficient quantity of dirt to fill up the whole valley. The top of the arch will be some feet below the bottom of Longworth's wine cellar on Sycamore street.

A SICKLY CITY.—The amount paid out for liquors, to supply the agency to Lowell, Mass., from the time of its opening last Summer to the 1st of January last, or about six months, was about $3,164.67. The receipts from sales during the same period, for medicinal or mechanical purposes, were $4,896 25. The exponses of the agency were $661.04. There was, however, a stock of liquor on hand the 1st of January, worth $962.18. The agency would seem to be doing a good business—that is, disposing of liquor for medicinal purposes, at the rate of nine or ten thousand dollars per annum.

DEFEAT OF THE RUSSIANS IN CIRCASSIA.—The latest accounts from Circassia, generally suppressed in the Russian journals, are to the effect that the Russians have lately met with several severe checks at the hands of the Circassians, having been obliged to abandon many of the strong places in that country which they had captured last year. The Circassians had also broken the blockade of the Russian fleet of the Circassian sea, and several vessels had arrived at Dagdad and Constantinople with cargoes of slaves.

A NEW STATE.—A correspondant of the St. Louis Democrat very warmly urges, through the columns of that print, the propriety of forming a new State to be called Washington, after the Father of his country, with the following boundaries. Its says: "Let us form beyond Missouri a great central State. Let its boundary leave Missouri at Fort Scott, and traverse west four hundred miles along the southern rim of the Kansas Basin; thence north to the Platte; thence down the Platte to its mouth; thence by the Missouri river to the starting point."

LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE IN EUROPE.—The imprisonment of the Maldia family in Tuscany, for exercising the natural right of man to freedom of thought, is by no means the only instance of religious persecution which might be cited in proof of the assertion that religious toleration is not yet universal. Letters from Genoa state that a trial has taken place in that city similar to that of the Madias in Tuscany. The name of the accused is Daniel Mazzinghi, twenty-five years of age, and a surgeon by profession. The trial took place with closed doors, but it is said that he was charged with having, in company with Capt. Packenham, of the British Navy, preached against the religion of the State and in praise of Protestantism. He was sentenced to be imprisoned for three years by virtue of the 24th article of the penal code.

Subscriptions have been raised to the amount of $21,000, and scholarships to the amount $21,000 have been raised for the North Alabama College, which is to be located at Huntsville, Ala., a healthy and beautiful town. The charter granted last session by the Alabama Legislature, requires that before active operations can be commenced, the subscriptions for the erection of the building, etc., shall reach $30,000, and the scholarships for the endowment to the amount of $60,000. The sum of $9,000 is still to be raised for subscriptions to the first amount, and the trustees have sent out the Rev. J. N. Bradshaw, of Lauderdale county, Tenn., to solicit aid.

THE DERELICT SHIP ITALY.—Capt. Lorett, of the Kotch Brothers, at Charleston, reports a derelict ship, which he passed on the 13th inst., in lat. 30 45, long. 79 50, about 125 miles from the Charleston bar. From his description (as the Standard) she is supposed to be the ship Italy, of Bath, lately laden at NewOrleans, with 2700 bags of cotton, etc. She was injured on some of the Florida Keys, and was got off by the wreckers, but broke loose and was lost in the attempt to take her into Nassau. Since then, about a month, she has been floating at the mercy of the waves, without crew, mast or rudder. Her cargo is probably worth $100,000, and the ship, if not too much injured, $15,000 or $20,000. The steamer Carollua, of the Florida line, has been sent in search of her.

INTERESTING EXPERIMENT.—A very interesting experiment was tried at Chicago, a few days ago, to ascertain the amount of oxygen necessary to support life. Six hundred persons were placed in a hall in one of the hotels, all the doors and windows were closed and the experiment began. During the first half hour nothing special was observed except a universal drowsiness, which was warded off as long as possible by an ingenious device of the experimenter in the shape of an eloquent lecture. During the second half hour several sank into a deep sleep, from which it was impossible to rouse them, and a few fainted. At the end of the third half hour it was deemed unsafe to continue the experiment longer, and the fact was considered established, that under those circumstances, life would not become extinct within the space of ninety-five minutes.

ARREST OF A BOARDING HOUSE THIEF.—A few evenings since, John M. King, a boarder at the house of Mrs. Dunham, in Cincinnati, proposed to a room mate, named R. C. Randall, to treat the boarders of the house to egg-nogg drugged with morphine, and while under its influence enter their bed chambers and rob them of their money. Randall assented to the arrangement with apparent good will, but after the departure of King, for a file and a pair of nippers, and the morphine, he revealed the matter to the boarders, who agreed to remain silent and allow the thing to go on, with the only difference in the arrangement that Randall should, by some means or other, substitute a paper of flour for that of morphine. The egg-nogg was furnished, the deception practised, and at the usual hour all hands retired, but not to sleep, as they determined to watch King. The latter, about one o'clock, awoke Randall, and the two proceeded to ransack the house, until the boarders rallied, rushed in, and knocked King down. He soon confessed his guilt, and was held to answer. It is said he was engaged to be married to one of the young lady boarders.

HERMETICALLY SEALED PROVISIONS.—The business of putting up provisions in hermetically sealed cans, has become quite an important one in our city. There are five large establishments engaged in it. Beef, mutton, lamb, lobsters, clams, meats and sheep's tongues, with green corn, green peas, green beans in their season, etc., etc., are put up in immense quantities. But a small portion of the articles put up are used in the city—much the greater quantity being sent to New York and Boston, where they are sold to vessels going to California, and on other long voyages, and likewise for home consumption. When taken from the cans, they are generally in excellent order, and retain much of their original flavor, although months and even years may have elapsed since they were sealed up. [Portland (Me.) Advertiser.

EXPRESSES.—We clip the following from an Eastern exchange:

THE LAST ARRIVAL PER "EXPRESS."—The American Express Co. "delivered in good order" in this city, a few days since, twenty-one soldiers—"Forwarded" from Detroit "per express." The same well known Express Co delivered in this city some time since, "a blind boy" and a deaf and dumb girl. They also brought Mr. Derr's celebrated trained horse Morgiana, from away out West. Who says the express men can't do any thing and every thing? Send them an elephant or a paper of pins, it's all the same; they will take good care of 'em and deliver them "as agreed."

We expect that few are aware of the multiplicity of facilities which the express system presents to the public. We were shown the last way-bill sent out from the office of Harndee's Express, in this city, and were really amused at the strange medley of items it presented. Barrels of sugar and molasses, cotton carpets, kegs, boxes, bales, demijohns, with sums of money ranging from five to fifty dollars, addressed to parties at the most divergent compass points, were brought together with strange bed-fellows—like travelers in a stage, awhile in company, then taking their separate courses by other expresses, from the NewYork office, never to meet again. Nestled among bales and barrels, recorded on the way-bill, with sugar on one side and molasses on the other, appeared the following entry:

"One young lady, as per telegraphic order—charges $169 08, freight $80."

On enquiry we learned that the express had been employed, by telegraphic message, to find this lady's residence, pay all her outstanding debts, and forward her without delay, and had fulfilled the commission to the letter. We submitted to the agent of the express the difficulty of securing the payment of the charges on such movable freight; but he pointed to the mysterious letters, C. C. D., appearing on the margin of the way-bill, signifying "Collect on delivery," and hinted that in the event of difficulty with the consignee, the express might legally detain "the baggage."

THE SPIRITUAL BANK.—We have already announced the closing of the Spiritual Bank at Chicago. We here the following additional particulars:

The managers, it is said, affected to have communications to regard to its management from the spirits of the departed, and a commission of lunacy having been issued in case of its President, Mr Eddy, the "Medium" took the matter in charge, and avowed that the "Spirits" counseled resistance, even unto death, and for that purpose arms were provided, which resulted in arrests—the holding of Messrs Arnold, Pilgrim, Drysdell, and Mrs. Herlick to bail, and the lodgment of Seth Paine in jail.

The bank was mainly managed through the dictation of Mrs. Herrick, a Medium, with whom Mr. Paine or Mr. Eddy was in the habit of retiring to a back room several times a day, and professing to hold conversation with the spirits of Franklin, Washington, Gen. Jackson and others, who directed how the affairs of the bank should be carried on. Mrs H. at times stood behind the counter and pointed out, by spirit influence, who should have their notes redeemed and who not. Mr. Eddy was completely under their control. Most of the persons arrested are Mediums. It came out, in the examination that Paine had little or no capital in the bank—that all the stock amounted to some $4000 or $5000, deposited by Ira B. Eddy, and about $20000 by other persons. Mr. Eddy disclaimed being a partner in the bank, and said he had only deposited money there the same as any other person. The bank belonged to "Seth Paine & Co.," and appears to have been a spirit swindling shop in good earnest.

MERCHANTS AND SHOP-KEEPERS IN HAVANA.—Mr. Fuller, of the NewYork Mirror, in one of his letters from Havana, says:

It is a well-known fact that nearly all the merchants and shopkeepers of Havana are native Spaniards, and they are not only contented, but fanatically devoted to the Spanish Government. A large proportion of this class come to Cuba as adventurers, and began life as clerks on small salaries. After accumulating five hundred dollars, they would purchase a share in a joint stock slave trading company, and in the course of a year or two, receive a profit in the shape of a dividend, amounting to ten thousand dollars, which sum, re-invested in the same business, soon made them millionaires. These nabobs then generally return to Spain to spend their ill-gotten fortunes, leaving a crop of clerks to follow in the footsteps of their illustrious predecessors. It is, perhaps, not generally known that some of our NewYork "merchant princes," whose sudden wealth has been attributed to the sugar business, have derived their largest revenue from capital slyly invested in the slave trade. Persons who are curious in such matters, may learn further particulars by making inquiries in Havana.

The London Times has the following utilitarian notions upon the poultry mania which seems to rage in England as fiercely as it does in this country:

"A fowl, after all, is not materially the more precious for being 'gold' or 'silver pencilled,' 'white crested' or 'double-combed,' though 'double-breasted,' if procurable, might be an eligible quality to introduce. One variety, we see, styled 'dumples' or 'bakies,' attracted great admiration for the extraordinary shortness of their legs; but we scarcely understand the advantage of the feature, unless, indeed, they will go into a smaller saucepan.

"The end, in short, of all such exhibitions as that now open, should be the improvement, not of private collections, but of the public stock, and the breed deserving the prize is not that with the largest comb or the rarest plumage, but with the best promise of general usefulness. Five years months hence, eggs should prove better, chickens cheaper and all poultry more abundant than now, we shall be the first to acknowledge the benefits of the Baker street show; but, if the result is confined to the monstrosities of private collections, there will be little credit gained by the notoriety of this week's display."

MAIL FROM NEW ORLEANS TO SAN FRANCISCO.—The New York Express says:

A contract to carry the mail from NewOrleans to San Francisco, by the way of Vera Cruz to Acapulco, it is said, has been signed, giving about $500,000 for the job. The contract, however, is to go before Coegress. The successful biddare are Mr. Rankin, of Poughkeepels, taking much of it nominally to behalf of parties in NewYork city, Mr. Charles Morgan, of NewYork, and Mr. Aspinwall, the latter on the Pacific, the former from New Orleans to Vera Cruz. The parties from Vera Cruz to Acapulco are said to be Simeon Draper, of NewYork, Coleman & Stetson, and some others. The "bidding" was not open, but was confined to these parties.

A VERY PARTICULAR MAN.—A gentleman passing a house in the upper part of the city the other evening, was accosted by a lady at the door, who desired him to go into the back yard, and see what a strange man who had entered there, was about. The family were very much alarmed at his proceedings. The gentleman accordingly entered the yard, where he found a man crouched down, in the act of pulling on his stockings. Inquiring his business, the fellow replied that, as he was changing his stockings, for he put the right one on the left foot in the morning, and he could endure the discomforts consequent thereon no longer. [Portland (Me.) Transcript.

THE ERICSSON.—The NewYork Times says: We understand that an offer has been made to the Government, on behalf of her owners, to construct two or more vessels of the largest class for government service, on the minimum rate of expense for steamers of the same class, to warrant their making ten miles per hour with a consumption of not over eight tons of coal per day, guaranteeing that all their machinery shall last four years—as long as the boilers of a steamship, and offering bonds in any required amount for the fulfillment of the contract in all its parts. The proposition has been very favorably received by the President and the Secretary of the Navy, and it is for the purpose of giving them an opportunity for personal inspection, that the ship has been summoned to Norfolk. She will go thither direct, and probably thence to Washington.

ADVICE OF AN OLD LADY.—Now, John, listen to me, for I am older than you are; I couldn't be your mother. Never do you marry a young woman, John, before you have contrived to happen at the house where she lives at least four or five times before breakfast. You should know how late she lies in bed in the morning. You should take notice whether her complexion is the same in the morning as it is in the evening, or whether the morning wash and the towel have robbed her of her evening bloom. You should take care to surprise her, so that you may see her in her morning dress, and observe how her hair looks when she is not expecting you. If possible, you should be where you can hear the morning conversation between her and her mother. If she is ill-natured and snappish to her mother, so she will be to you, depend on it. But if you find her up and dressed neatly in the morning, with the same countenance, the same smiles, the same neatly combed hair, the same merry and pleasant manners to her mother, which characterized her appearance and deportment in the evening, and particularly if she is lending a hand to get the breakfast ready in good season, she is a prize, John, and the sooner you secure her to yourself the better.

A CHEMICAL.—A distinguished medical lecturer in a neighboring state, once described a glandular swelling as being "as large as an apple." One of the students audibly whispered, "as large as a piece of chalk." "It was about the size of a large apple," continued the lecturer. "A large piece of chalk," repeated the wag in an under tone. "It was as large as my fist," thundered out the indignant lecturer, at the time clenching it convulsively, and shaking it at the obnoxious and terrified studeots.

MISSOURI STATE CENSUS.—The total population of Missouri, as shown in the printed returns of the census taken in 1852, is 710,787—of which 87,762 are slaves and 2537 free blacks. The white males exceed the white females more than 30,000. In St Louis county, the excess in favor of white male is 13,893. Among the slaves, the excess is on the side of the females. The number of deaf and dumb amount 259; of the blind, 116.

Arrival of the Steamship Albatross

IMPORTANT NEWS.

The steamship Albatross arrived in port Sunday afternoon, from Vera Cruz, which port she left on the 15th inst., at 12 o'clock m., bringing a letter mail from California for NewYork, and passengers through from San Francisco, with dates to the 1st February. The California mail, as well as a mail from the city of Mexico, was brought through by the Ramsey contract under charge of Mr. Farnham.

MEMORANDUM OF IMPORTANT MEXICAN NEWS.—Mr. Wilson O'Meliee, late Superintendent of the telegraph lines in Mexico, has kindly furnished us with the following hasty but important memorandum of Mexican news:

Steamer Albatross sailed from Vera Cruz on 15th. Revolution continues in Mexico. The late President Juan N. Cebellos resigned on the 8th, and Sr Lombardini, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, took the seat by Constitution of Mexico. Cebellos resigned on account of the arrival of General Urega at the capital, who differed with him, and who is said to be in favor of the return of Santa Anna and the plan of Jalisco. It is believed by many that General Urega will declare himself dictator, he having at present the whole of the Government forces under his command.

In Puebla there has been a recent "pronunciamento," on account of which, Dr. Juan Mugica, Governor of the State, has resigned and Dr. Cosme Furlong has been proclaimed Governor in his stead.

A Commissioner left Vera Cruz on or about the first of the present month for the purpose of inviting Santa Anna to return to Mexico.

It is rumored that in many of the States the people will oppose his reinstatement at the head of the Government.

Commercial affairs are quite on the decline, and all business generally depressed, owing probably to the present disunion of the States throughout the country.

The Tehuantepec question has finally been settled. The contract has been given to Mr. Stowe, and several Commissioners have been dispatched to the isthmus.

The telegraphic line between Mexico and Vera Cruz suffers continual interruptions from the "pronunciados" on the road. Highway robberies are frequent on the road between Mexico and Vera Cruz, and the only security for travelers, is to go well armed.

The Italian Opera Company of Max Maretzek has arrived in the Albatross, and will continue to New York.

The Boundery Commissioners on the part of the Mexican Government also come in the Albatross, and will continue to Matamoros, where they expect to meet the American Boundery Commissioners.

Synopsis of the contract between the Mexican Government and the Sloo Company:

First article provides that the communication is to be by water as far as the Guatzocalcos river is navigable.

2. A plank road to be commenced from the head of navigation, within one year, and completed in three years. A railroad to be commenced at the end of three years, and to be completed in the course of the four following years.

4. Company shall make docks, etc., at the ports of the termini, which are to be designated by the Government of Mexico.

5. Government grants the lands necessary for plank road and railroad, and for buildings, etc.; owners of private property taken to be indemnified according to law.

6. The Company may use public lands en route gratis, and also that of private individuals with indemnity, etc.

8. The Company to have exclusive right of transit for passengers, freights, etc., at rates to be approved by Government. Government to levy any contribution on the property, etc., of the enterprise, at any time, but it reserves the right to impose a duty not exceeding 12½ cents per passenger and package transported by the Company's route.

9. The Company may import, free of duty, of all materials etc., for the road, with the sanction of Government; also such provisions, etc., for workmen as cannot be procured on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec.

10. The Company subjects to rules established by Government; no sales of goods, etc., to be made on the route.

11. The Government will open two ports at the termini of the road, it being understood that Ventosa shall be used only for the reception of passengers and merchandize by the Company. The other port is Vera Cruz.

13. Government protection is assured to the Company and its employees during the twenty years of its existence.

14. Guarantees payment by the Company of $300,000 in silver at once, and $50,000 in monthly instalments until $600,000 is paid.

15. The Company is to carry the Mexican mails without charge, and all goods for Mexican Government at one-fourth of the regular rates; all Mexican troops, officers and Government agents to pass free. All moneys, ores and other products of the country to be transported at one-fourth less than the regular rates.

16. For fifty years the Government is to receive 20 per cent of the profits of the road. All privileges stated are guaranteed during the twenty years to the Company; but at the end of that time the road is to be turned over to the Government, nevertheless the delivery at the end of that time, by a deposit of 10 per cent of the profits for the last ten years of the contract.

17. The Company to build light houses, etc., at designated points; and will appropriate 2½ per cent. of the net profits of this road to that object.

18. Inspectors to be appointed by both parties to overlook their interests along the road.

19. The Company is to construct no forts, introduce no armed troops, shall not admit on the road any more persons than necessary to do their necessary work. The Company to assist in preventing smuggling.

20. Foreigners employed by the Company to have only the same rights as Mexican citizens. All questions to be decided by Mexican tribunals.

21. Transit free to all nations; but 25 per cent to be added to the charge for transporting merchandize of other nations who have no treaty with Mexico.

22. Offices for the sale of Bonds are to be opened in the City of Mexico and London, and for the first six months one third part of the shares are to be kept at the disposal of Mexican citizens.

23. Foreign mails may be carried over the road by the Company; but always seated, and not passing through under proper inspection.

24. No sales of shares to be sold for lands appropriated for Indians, etc.

25. All the articles of the convocation of July, 1852, not conflicting with those stated above, are to be binding on the Company.

NAVIGATION ARTICLES.—1. The exclusive privilege of navigating the Guatzocalcos is guaranteed; but Mexican vessels have right of navigation for the supply of the inhabitants along the bank of the river.

2. Government exempts from tonunge duty all the Company's vessels.

3. The Company is to supply a line of steamers under the Mexican flag, to transport merchandise from Vera Cruz to the Guatzocalcos.

4. All Mexicau mails are to be carried free of charge to all points at which the vessels of the Company touch, and all goods belonging to the Mexican Government at one-fourth part of the regular charge. All troops, agents of the government, etc., are to be free of transit; metals, products, etc., at 25 per cent. less than the regular rates.

5. Steamers on Pacific are to use the port of Acapulco as a depot for coal, and as soon as possible, they are to use the coal mines in the State of Guerero.

The contract is signed by the following: J. Miguel Arroy, Minister of Foreign Affairs; St. Payno, W. D. Lee, J. Joachin Pesado, Ramon Alarte.

From the Rio Grande.

By the arrival of the steamship Yacht we are in receipt of Brownsville dates to the 0th inst.

The Flag of that date says: The revolution mentioned in our last has terminated in favor of the revolted. Gen. Aralos, the former commandant of that important place, has been displaced and Colonel Valentin Cruz now fills his position. This change, we understand, was effected mainly through the instrumentality of Colonel Quintana, of Matamoros, who is said to have conducted himself bravely during the struggle, and humanely after its accomplishment. After the success of Col. Qualutana and his command, Gen. Aralos, taking alarm from some cause or other, fled across the river at night, and took temporary quarters under the hospitality of the officers of our army in Fort Brown. But the Matamoreuses were prompt in convincing the General that it was not the man, but the principle, they were contending for. A deputation from Matamoros waited upon him at his own quarters, and assured him there was no danger in person or property, should he return to Matamoros. Under this assurance he returned—remaining but a day on this side. On the 6th instant, he took up his line of march for Saltillo, having been furnished with an escort of above a hundred men.

Carvajal has published a proclamation, dated Ancalitos, Mexico, January 30, addressed to his subordinates and the people generally, and signed as "General-in-Chief of the Liberating Army." He calls their attention to the horrible crimes and murders committed by the army of the Government, who serve their masters for money, and whom he calls traitors to their country. He calls for revenge on the murder of Rodriguez and Leal. He says that the whole nation will see with abhorrence the crimes committed by the veterans, who, in Tamaulipas, pretend to support the Jalisco plans.

He tells the inhabitants of the frontier to open their eyes, to distrust the treachery of their oppressors; and to die rather than submit to the yoke which so many misfortunes and such dishonor have drawn over their country.

The occasion for this proclamation seems to have been a meeting of the officers to deliberate on the violent death of Rodriguez at Tampico, and the execution of one of Carvajal's men by an officer of Col Cruz, at Las Cuevas. An effort is made to throw the whole blame of the suffering in Tamaulipas and the execution of her citizens upon the military, who have seconded the plan of Jalisco. He asserts that Col Cruz, seconded by Casanova, at Tampico, is laboring to establish a system of military despotism, worse, if possible, than that imposed under the administration of Gen. Avalos, in his old regime. He complains that Col Cruz is prosecuting against him a relentless war which admits of no quarter, and, therefore, himself and companions swear anew to die with arms in their hands rather than succumb to such terms.

Congressional Proceedings.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19th

In the Senate to-day, the President's message relating to the Nicaragua affairs was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Army appropriation bill was taken up and referred. A bill granting right of way for a Railroad in the District passed. Pacific passed at last. (?)

In the House the civil and diplomatic bill was debated, and amendments were adopted, granting outfits for the different foreign Ministers, so as to enable the new administration to change the representatives abroad, providing for a full mission to Peru, and one for Central America; and creating the office of Charge d'Affaires for Switzerland.

London Money Market.

NEW YORK Feb 19

The steamer America reports a falling off in the bullion in the Bank of England of a quarter of a million pounds. The London money market was very dull with an increased pressure on the market.

Congressional Proceedings.

WASHINGTON, February 20.

In the Senate, yesterday, the Pacific Railroad bill continued under debate, and an amendment was adopted, which, if not taken out will insure its defeat, or if the bill should pass the amendment would destroy its value. The amendment provides that no money shall be expended for the construction of any part of the road passing through any one of the States of the Union. Mr. Weller gave notice that on Monday he would make a motion to re-consider the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

In the House the Civil and Diplomatic bill was discussed and amended in Committee of the Whole, reported to the House and then finally passed.

Three Days Later from Europe—Arrival of the Arabia—Interesting Intelligence—Revolt in Milan.

NEW YORK, February 23, 2:15 P. M.

The Cunard steamer Arabia has arrived here, bringing dates from Liverpool to the 12th instant; three days later than the accounts of the Pacific. The following is a summary of her news:

Liverpool Markets.

LIVERPOOL, February 12.

There has been a fair demand for Cotton in this market during the past three days at steady prices for the fine qualities; but a decline of nearly ⅛d. for the Middling and lower grades. The sales of the entire week are 50,000 bales, of which 20,000 have been taken for speculative and 3000 bales for export. The quotations, as fixed by the Board last evening, are as follows: For Orleans, 6¼d.; Middling Orleans, 5⅞d.; Fair Uplands, 6¼d.; and Middling Uplands, 5¾d. ℔ lb. [The quotations by the American and Pacific were: Fair Orleans, 6¼d.; Middling Orleans, 6d.; Fair Uplands, 6¼d.; and Middling Uplands 5¾d. ℔ lb—Eds.]

Flour has been without further change of moment, and is quoted at 26s. for Western Canal, and 27s. for Ohio brands. The closing rate for Mixed Corn is 32s. 6d. ℔ quarter.

The Provision Market has been animated, an active demand having prevailed for Beef, Pork and Bacon. Lard is quoted at 60s. ℔ cwt., and continues dull. Rice has gone off heavily at prices rather in favor of buyers, but without quotable change. Sugar has been in active request at previous rates. Coffee has been dull and the rates easier, without a positive decline.

Insurrection in Milan.

An insurrection broke out at Milan on the 6th, concerning which there are very contradictory reports by the different parties interested. The Austrians say that the revolt was quelled with the loss of only five lives on the side of the authorities. The patriots state that the number of killed reached three hundred. It is reported that the patriots attacked the garrison and massacred the soldiers that composed it, and at the same time proclamations signed by Kossuth and Mazzini were posted up throughout the city. Massini has gone to Switzerland.

Lombardy and Rome.

Austria and France are sending more troops into Lombardy and Rome.

England—Meeting of Parliament—Protection Given Up.

Parliament met on Tuesday the 8th inst., but so far nothing of importance has been done. The Protectionist Society has been dissolved.

India Mail.

The India mail has arrived bringing advices of the formal annexation of Pequ to the British territory.

China.

The rebellion in China has received a check, and a considerable number of the rebels captured. Of these, one hundred and twenty were hanged.

The Great Indian Rubber Case Decided.

WASHINGTON, February 23.

The Commissioner of Patents has to-day announced his decision in the great India Rubber case which has so long been in contest between Charles Goodyear and Horace H. Day. Perhaps no decision of equal importance in the country at large has ever been rendered in the Patent Office. There is no appeal from the decision, as the law of 1845 gives power to the Commissioner to decide finally in such cases. The interests involved amount to more than five millions of dollars.

The case came before the Commissioner by an application to extend Goodyear's patent for the manufacturing of certain descriptions of India rubber goods, for seven years. The application was opposed by Horace H. Day, who, in the examination of the case, proved by thirteen witnesses that he was the prior inventor of the method claimed by Goodyear. The application was consequently dismissed and the public will hereafter have the free use of the invention. From a careful perusal of the decision it appears that the precedent is likely to carry with it the subsequent patent, as that is immediately dependant upon this, inasmuch as sulphur is indispensable in both patents.

Charleston Cotton Market.

CHARLESTON, February 26.

There has been a moderate demand in the Cotton market during the past week; with sales of 8000 bales. Prices are without any material change since last Friday, and Middling is still quoted at 9 cents per lb. The receipts at this port since the 1st September, compared with those of the corresponding period last year, show an increase of 30000 bales. Freights have advanced about 1-16d. for Cotton to Liverpool, and the quotation is now ½d.

Mobile Cotton Market.

MOBILE, February 26.

The Cotton market here has been inactive during the past week, and the sales reach 22,000 bales. Prices have been rather firmer, and close at 8½@8¾ cents for Middling. The receipts of the week embrace 29,000 bales, and the stock on hand this evening is 148,000 bales. The market to-day has been rather quiet, and only about 2000 bales have changed hands at the above quotation.

The civil marriage of the Emperor took place at the Tuileries at 8 o'clock on Saturday evening, with all the papers express it, "nohts simplicity." Eight hundred persons were present. The religious ceremony took place on the following day, at Notre Dame, and was celebrated with great pomp and splendor. The populous turned out en masse, and the ally was decorated with flags, etc. In all directions the streets were lined with military, and the scene was of the most imposing character.

The service was performed by the Archbishop of Paris, and every thing passed off well. Three thousand political prisoners of 1851 were pardoned on the day of the marriage. The Empress refuses to allow the Senate to settle any donation upon her, and this, coupled with her previous refusal to receive jewelry from the municipal council, had produced a most favorable impression. LINES....By H. Cowles.

Hark! 'tis the stillness of the midnight air,
Where sounds are there which seem to rise and swell
Over the wide world, new-born and free from care.
Like the low-breathing of a deep-toned bell?
It is the mighty heralds of Time,
Ringing the changes of its solemn chime!

As the hour of life's short day is past;
Another moment of its hour has fled;
Another turning of the wheel, which fast
Rolleth our life-car onward to the dead;
And we have more on-ward there appears
Another milestone in our path of years.

Another year! O Boating, Fleeting Time!
How speed'st thou on thy unreturning track,
Bearing away our pleasures in their prime,
Yet coming not again to bring them back.
And if so pause awhile we then implore,
Thou bear'st on heavy on thy pinions more.

The lonely sea-bird o'er the trackless deep,
When evening shadows gather round her way,
May sink on some distracted ship to sleep,
Until the darkness shall have passed away;
But on thou goest through the night and storm,
Finding no wreck on which to rest thy form.

And thou, Old Year, whom we are called to mourn,
Hast fled forever from our fond embrace;
And though the changing seasons may return,
We shall not gaze again upon thy face:
But on thou go'st up the ever-widening sea,
We weep our farewells on the shore for thee.

Thou hast brought changes in thy circling flight,
Among young hearts which had not learned to bow;
Stealing the glances from the eye of light,
And deepening the wrinkles on the thoughtful brow;
Blighting fond hopes, and scattering brighter dreams,
As morning scatters dew-drops where it gleams.

And Death, the grim Destroyer, on his way,
O'er the broad earth hath poised his sable plume,
And laid his finger on the young and gay,
Whispering the beautiful unto the tomb;
And pressed his cold hand on the weary heart,
Until its aching current ceased to start.

We daily around the old familiar hearth,
Where we have gathered in the days of yore;
But some are gone who mingled in our mirth—
Their beaming smiles are best on us no more.
And as remembrance fills the vacant chair
We mutely gaze upon each other there.

Sometimes we start to hear the well known words,
On which we loved to dwell in olden times.
Of those we lost, who went like autumn birds,
Winging their way to calmer, brighter climes:
But oh! we only start and list in vain,
We shall not hear them on the earth again.

Where have they gone? O whither have they fled?
Ask of the clouds that sweep above their graves,
Ask of the winds that moan around their bed,
Or the low, voices of the chanting waves.
Whither? alas! none 'tis only known,
That they were with us once, but now are flown.

You silvery moon trims her bright lamp on high,
And pours her sweet effulgence o'er the earth,
The stars undimmed wheel through the vaulted sky
And rise and set at their time of birth;
But in the spirit's west, the stars that set,
Return no more to shine on our regret.

Yet time speeds on, waving his restless wings,
O'er the dark waters of the solemn sea;
Summer and changes in his flight to bring,
And bear us onward to our destiny.
But shall we mourn while on his wings we rise,
Where pain is not and pleasure never dies?

O may our years as one by one declines,
Bring good results as day by day departs;
Each old one leave us wiser in our minds,
Each new one find us better in our hearts;
Performing well the duties life doth give,
And learn to die in learning how to live.

Then might he hasten o'er the ocean's foam,
Nor stay his flight until its depths are crossed,
While hurrying on conveys us sooner home,
To reunite us with the loved and lost;
To bring an end to all our cares and fears,
Beyond the changes and the flight of years.

AN EMBARRASSING POSITION;

OR, CAUGHT IN A STRANGE CHAMBER.

I will tell you all about an affair—important as it proved to me—but you must not hurry me. I have never been in a hurry since then, and never will. Up till that time, inclusive, I was always in a hurry; my actions always preceded my thoughts; experience was of no use; and any body would have supposed me destined to carry a young head upon old shoulders to the grave. However, I was brought up at last "with a round turn." I was allowed a certain space for reflection, and plenty of materials; and if it did not do me good, it's a pity!

My father and mother both died when I was still a great awkward boy; and I, being the only thing they had to bequeath, became the property of a distant relation. I do not know how it happened, but I had no near relations. I was a kind of waif upon the world from the beginning; and I suppose it was owing to my having no family anchorage that I was in the habit of swaying to and fro, and drifting hither and thither, at the pleasure of wind and tide. Not that my guardian was inattentive or unkind—quite the reverse; but he was indolent and careless, contenting himself with providing unhandsomely for my schooling and my pocket, and leaving every thing else to chance. He would have done the same thing to his own son if he had had one, and he did the same thing to his own daughter.

But girls somehow cling wherever they are cast—anything is an anchorage for them; and as Laura grew up, she gave the care she had never found, and was the little mother of the whole house. As for the titular mother, she had not an atom of character of any kind. She might have been a picture or a vase, or anything else that is useless except to the taste or the affections. But mamma was indispensable. It is a vulgar error to suppose that people who have nothing in them are nobody in a house. Our mamma was the very centre and point of our home feelings; and it was strange to observe the fervent care we took of a personage who had but two ideas in her head.

It's no wonder that I was always in a hurry, for I must have had an instinctive idea that I had my fortune to look for. The governor had nothing more than a genteel independence, and this would be a good deal lessened after his death by the lapse of an annuity. But sister Laura was thus provided for well enough, while I had not a shilling in actual money, although plenty of hypothetical thousands and sundry castles in the air. It was the consciousness of the latter kind of property, no doubt, that gave me so free-and-easy an air, and made me so completely the master of my own actions. How I did worry that blessed old woman! how Laura lectured and scolded! how the governor stormed! and how I was forgiven the next minute! and we were all as happy again as the day was long!

But at length the time of separation came. I had grown a great hulking fellow, strong enough to make my bread as a porter if that had been needed; and so a situation was found for me in a counting-house at Barcelona, and after a lecture and a hearty cry from sister Laura, a blessing and a kiss from mamma, and a great sob kept down by a hurricane laugh from the governor, I went adrift.

Four years passed rapidly away. I had attained my full height, and more than my just share of inches. I already enjoyed a fair modicum of whiskers, and had even made some progress in the cultivation of a pair of moustaches, when suddenly the house I was connected with failed. What to do? The governor insisted upon my return to England, where his interest among the mercantile class was considerable: Laura hinted mysteriously that my presence in the house would soon be a matter of great importance to her father; and mamma let out the secret, by writing to me that Laura was going to "change her condition." I was glad to hear this, for I knew he would be a model of a fellow who was Laura's husband;—and, gulping down my pride, which would fain have persuaded me that it was unmanly to go back again like the ill sixpence, I set out on my return home.

The family, I knew, had moved to another house; but being well acquainted with the town, I had no difficulty in finding the place. It was a range of handsome buildings which had sprung up in the fashionable outskirt during my absence; and although it was far in the evening, my accustomed eyes soon descried through the gloom the governor's old-fashioned door plate.

I was just about to knock, really agitated with delight and struggling memories, when a temptation arose in my way. One of the area-windows was open, gaping as if for my reception. A quantity of plate lay upon a table close by. Why should I not enter, and appear unannounced in the drawing-room, a sun-burnt phantom of five feet eleven. Why should I not present the precise and careful Laura with a handful of her own spoons and forks, left so conveniently at the service of any area-sneak who might chance to pass by? Why? That is only a figure of speech. I asked no question about the matter; the idea was hardly well across my brain, when my legs were across the rails.

In another moment, I had crept in by the window, and, chuckling at my own cleverness, and the great moral lesson I was about to teach, I was stuffing my pockets with the plate.

While thus engaged, the opening of a door in the hall above alarmed me; and, afraid of the failure of my plan, I stepped lightly up the stair, which was partially lighted by the hall-lamp. As I was about to emerge at the top, a young girl was coming out of a room on the opposite side. She instantly retreated, shut the door with a bang, and I could hear a half-suppressed hysterical cry.

I bounded on, sprang up the drawing-room stair, and entered the first door at a venture. All was dark, and I stopped for a moment to listen. Lights were hurrying across the hall; and I heard the rough voice of a man, as if scolding and taunting some person. The girl had doubtless given the alarm, although her information must have been very indistinct; for when she saw me I was in the shadow of the stair, and she could have had little more than a vague impression that she beheld a human figure.

However this may be, the man's voice appeared to descend the stair to the area-room, and presently I heard a crashing noise, not as if he was counting the plate, but rather thrusting it aside en masse. Then I heard the window closed, the shutters bolted, and an alarm-bell hung upon them, and the man re-ascended the stair, half scolding, half laughing at the girl's superstition. He took care not with standing to examine the fastenings of the street door, and even to look it, and put the key in his pocket. He then retired into a room, and all was silence.

I began to feel pretty considerably queer. The governor kept no male servant that I knew of, and had never done so. It was impossible he could have introduced this change into his household without my being informed of it by sister Laura, whose letters were an exact chronicle of every thing, down to the health of the cat. This was puzzling.

And now, that I had time to think, the house was much too large for a family requiring only three sleeping rooms, even when I was at home. It was what is called a double house, with rooms on both sides of the hall; and the apartment, on the threshold of which I was still lingering, appeared, from the dim light of the windows, of very considerable size. I now recollected that the quantity of plate I had seen—a portion of which at this moment felt preternaturally heavy in my pockets—must have been three times greater than any the governor ever possessed, and that various pieces were of a size and massiveness I had never before seen in the establishment. In vain I bethought myself that I had seen and recognized the well known door plate, and the area from which I entered was immediately under. In vain I argued that since Laura was about to be married, the extra quantity of plate might be intended to form a part of the trousseau, I could not convince myself.

But the course of my thoughts suggested an idea, and pulling hastily from my pocket a tablespoon, I felt, for I could not see, the legend that contained my fate. But my fingers were tremulous; they seemed to have lost sensation—only I fancied I did feel something more than the Governor's plain initials. There was still a light in the hall. If I could but bring that spoon within its illumination! All was silent; and I ventured to descend, step after step, not as I had bounded up, but with the stealthy pace of a thief, and the plate growing heavier and heavier in my pocket. At length I was near enough to see, in spite of a dimness that had gathered over my eyes; and, with a faintness, I beheld upon the spoon an engraved creet—the red right hand of a baronet!

I crept back again, holding by the banisters, fancying every now and then that I heard a door open behind me, and yet my feet no more consenting to quicken their motion than if I had been pursued by a murderer in the night-mare. I at length got into the room, groped for a chair and sat down. No more hurry now. O, no! There was plenty of time, and plenty to do in it, for I had to wipe away the perspiration that ran down my face in streams.

What was to be done? What had I done? O, a trifle, a mere trifle. I had only sneaked into a gentleman's house by the area-window, and pocketed his table-spoons; and there I was, locked and belled in, sitting very comfortably in the dark and alone, in his drawing-room. Very particularly comfortable; what a capital fellow to be sure! What an amusing personage! Wouldn't the baronet laugh in the morning? Wouldn't he ask me to stay to breakfast? And wouldn't I eat heartily out of the spoon I had stolen? But what name is that? Who calls me a housebreaker? Who gives me in charge? Who lugs me off by the neck? I will not stand it. I am innocent except of breaking into a baronet's house. I am a gentleman, with another gentleman's spoons in my pocket. I claim the protection of the law. Police! police!

My brain was wandering. I pressed my hand upon my wet forehead, to keep down the thick-coming fancies, and determined, for the first time in my life, to hold a deliberate consultation with myself. I was in an awkward predicament—it was impossible to deny the fact; but was there any thing really serious in the case? I had unquestionably descended into the wrong area, the right hand one; but was I not actually the relation—the distant relation—the very distant relation—of the next door neighbor? I had been four years absent from his house, and was there any thing more natural than that I should desire to pay my next visit through a subterranean window? I had appropriated, it is true, a quantity of silver plate I had found; but with what other intention could I have done this than to present it to my very distant relation's daughter, and reproach her with her carelessness in leaving it next door?

Finally, I was penned, caged, trapped—door and window had been bolted upon me without any remonstrance on my part—and I was now some considerable time in the house, unsuspected, yet a prisoner. The position was serious; but come, suppose the worst, that I was actually laid hold of as a malefactor, and commanded to give an account of myself.

Well, I was, as aforesaid, a distant relation of the individual next door. I belonged to nobody in the world, if not to him; I have but an indifferent reputation in regard to steadiness; and, after four years' absence in a foreign country, I had returned idle, penniless, and objectless—just in time to find an area-window open in the dusk of the evening, and a heap of plate lying behind it, within view of the street.

This self-examination was not encouraging; the case was decidedly queer; and as I cast mine pondering in the dark, with the spoon in my hand, I am quite sure that no malefactor in a dungeon could have envied my reflections.

In fact, the evidence was so dead against me, that I began to doubt my own innocence. What was I here for, if my intentions had really been honest? Why should I desire to come into any individual's area-window instead of the door? And how came it that all this silver-plate had found its way into my pockets? I was angry as well as terrified; I was judge and criminal in one; but the instincts of nature got the better of my sense of judgement, and I rose suddenly up, to ascertain whether it was not possible to get from the window into the street.

As I moved, however, the horrible booty I had in my pockets moved likewise, appearing to me to shriek, like a score of fiends—"Police! Police!" and the next instant I heard a quick footstep ascending the stair. Now was the fatal moment come! I was on my feet; my eyes glared upon the door; my hands were clenched; the perspiration had dried suddenly upon my skin; and my tongue clove to the roof of my mouth. But the footstep, accompanied by a gleam of light, passed—passed; and from very weakness I sat down again, with a dreadful indifference to the screams of the plate in my pockets.

Presently there were more footsteps along the hall; then voices; then drawing of bolts and creaking of locks; then utter darkness; then silence—lasting, terrible, profound. The house had gone to bed; the house would quickly be asleep; it was time to be up and doing.

But, first and foremost, I must get rid of the plate. Without that hideous corpus delicti, I should have some chance. I must, at all hazards, creep down into the hall, find my way to the lower regions, and replace the accursed thing where I found it. It required nerve to attempt this; but I was thoroughly wound up; and after allowing a reasonable time to elapse, to give my enemies an opportunity of falling asleep, I set out upon the adventure.

The door creaked as I went out; the plate grated against my very soul as I descended the steps; but slowly, stealthily, I crept along the wall; and at length found myself on the level floor. There was but one door on that side of the hall, the door which led to the area-room—I recollected the fact distinctly—and it was with inexpressible relief I reached it in safety, and grasped the knob in my hand. The knob turned; but the door did not open; it was locked; it was my fate to be a thief; and after a moment of new dismay, I turned again, doggedly, reached the stair, and re-entered the apartment I had left.

It was like getting home. It was snug and private. I had a chair there waiting me. I thought to myself that many a man would take the trouble to break into such a house. I had only sneaked. I wondered how Jack Sheppard felt on such occasions. I had seen him at the Adelphi in the person of Mrs. Keely, and a daring little dog he was. He would make nothing of getting down into the street from the window, spoons and all. I tried this; the shutters were not even closed, and the sash moving noiselessly, I had no difficulty in raising it.

I stepped out on the balcony, and looked over. nothing was to be seen but a black and yawning gulf beneath, guarded by the imaginary spikes of an invisible railing. Jack would have laughed at this difficulty; but then he had more experience in the craft than I, and was provided with all the necessary appliances. As for me, I had stupidly forgotten my coil of rope. The governor's house, I found, had either no balcony at all, or it was too far apart to be reached.

Presently I heard a footstep on the side walk, a little way off. It was approaching with slow, and measured pace; the person was walking as calmly and gravely in the night as if it had been broad day. Suppose I hailed this philosophical stranger, and confided to him, in a friendly way, the fact that the baronet, without the slightest provocation, had locked me up in his house, with his silver spoons in my pocket? Perhaps he would advise me what to do in the predicament. Perhaps he would take the trouble of knocking at the door, or crying fire, and when the servants opened, I might rush out, and so make my escape.

But while I was looking to see if I could not discern the walking figure, which was now under the windows, a sudden glare from the spot dazzled my sight. It was the bull's eye of a policeman: and with the instinct of a predatory character, I shrunk back trembling, crept into the room and shut the window.

By this time I was sensible that there was a little confusion in my thoughts, and by way of employing them on practical and useful objects, I determined to make a tour of the room. But first it was necessary to get rid, some how or other, of my plunder—to plant the property, as we call it; and with that view I laid it carefully, piece by piece, in the corner of a sofa, and concealed it with the cover.

This was a great relief. I almost began to feel like the injured party—more like a captive than a robber; and I groped my way through the room, with a sort of vague idea that I might perhaps stumble upon some trap door, or sliding panel, which would lead into the open air, or, at worst, into a secret chamber, where I should be safe for any given number of years from my persecutors.

But there was nothing of the kind in this stern, prosaic place; nothing but a few cabinets and tables, and couches and arm chairs, and common chairs and devotional chairs; and footstools, and lamps, and etatuettes, and glass-shades, and knick-knacks; and one elaborate girandole, hung round with crystal prisms, which played such an interminable tune against each other when I chanced to move them, that I stumbled away as fast as I could, and subsided into a fauteuil so rich, so deep, that I felt myself swallowed up, as it were, in its billows of swan's down.

How long I had been in the house at this time, I cannot tell. It seemed to me, when I looked back, to form a considerable portion of my life-time. Indeed, I did not very well remember the more distant events of the night; although every now and then the fact occurred to me with startling distinctness, that all I had gone through was only preliminary to something still to happen; that the morning was to come, the family to be astir, and the housebreaker to be apprehended. My reflections were not continuous. It may be that I dozed between whiles. How else can I account for my feeling myself grasped by the throat, to the very brink of suffocation, by a hand without a body? How else can I account for my sister Laura standing over me where I reclined, pointing to the stolen plate on the sofa, and lecturing me on my horrid propensities still she grew black in the face, and her voice rose to a wild, unearthly scream, which pierced through my brain?

When this fancy occurred, I started from my recumbent posture. A voice was actually at my ears, and a living form before my eyes; a lady stood contemplating me, with a half-serene smile on her lips; and as I moved she would have fallen to the ground, had I not sprung up and caught her in my arms. I laid her softly down on the fauteuil. It was the morning twilight. The silence was profound. The boundaries of the room were still slim and indistinct. Is it any wonder that I was in some considerable degree of perplexity as to whether I was not still in the land of dreams?

"Madam," said I, "if you are a vision it is of no consequence; but if not, I want particularly to get out."

"Offer no injury," she replied in a tremulous voice, "and no one will molest you. Take what you have come for, and begone."

That is sooner said than done. The doors and window below are locked and bolted; and beneath those of this room the area is deep, and the spikes sharp. I assure you I have been in very considerable perplexity the whole of last night;" and, drawing a chair, I sat down in front of her. Whether it was owing to this action, or to my complaining voice, or to the mere fact of her finding herself tete-a-tete with a housebreaker, I can not tell; but the lady broke out into a low, hysterical laugh.

"How did you break in?" said she.

"I did not break; it is far from being my character, I assure you. But the area-window was open, and so I thought I would go in."

"You were attracted by the plate! Take it for heaven's sake, thou desperate man, and go away!"

"I did take some of it, but with no evil intention—only by way of amusement. Here it is;" and, going to the sofa, I drew off the cover and showed her the plate.

"You have been generous," said she, her voice getting quiverous again; "for the whole must have been in your power. I will let you out so softly that none will know. Put up in your pockets what you have risked so much to possess, and follow me.."

"I will follow you with pleasure," said I, "were it all the world over;" for the increasing light showed me so lovely a creature as the morning sun ever shone upon; "but as for these, I never stole anything before, and, please Heaven, I never will again!"

"Surely, you are a most extraordinary person," said the young lady, suddenly, for the light seemed to have made a revelation to her likewise; "you neither look nor talk like a robber."

"Nor am I. I am not even a robber—I am nothing; and have not property in the world to the value of these articles of plate!"

"Then, if you are not a robber, why are you here? why creep in at the area-window, appropriate other people's spoons, and get locked up all night in their house?"

"For no other reason than that I was in a hurry. I had come down from Barcelona, and was going into my guardian's, next door, when your unfortunate area-window caught my eye, with the plate on the table inside. In an instant, I was over the rails and in through the window like a harlequin, with the intention of giving the family a pleasing surprise, and my old mistress, sister Laura, a great moral lesson on the impropriety of her leaving her plate in so careless a way."

"Then you are Gerald, my dear Laura's cousin, so lonelingly expected—so beloved by them all—so"——Here the young lady blushed celestial rosy red, and cast down her eyes. What these two girls could have been saying to each other about me, I never found out; but there was a secret, I will go to death upon it.

She let me out so quickly that neither her father nor the servants ever knew a syllable about the matter. The Governor swept down another ash with another gaffaw; mamma bestowed upon me another blessing, and Laura was so rejoiced, that she gave me another hearty kiss, and forgot to give me another lecture. My next four years were spent to more purpose than the last. Being less in a hurry, I took time to build upon flourishing business in partnership with Laura's husband. As for the baronet's daughter—for we must get every body into the concluding tableau—why, there she is—that lady cutting bread and butter for the children, with as matronly an air as Werter's Charlotte: she is my wife; and we laugh to this day at the oddity of the first interview which led to so happy a denouement.

"MODEL DWELLINGS FOR THE INDUSTRIAL CLASSES."—Large four story edifices, styled as above, have lately been erected in New York city. In front they resemble substantial private houses. One block in 37th street, consisting of two distinct buildings, each 25 feet front by 100 feet deep, is highly spoken of by the Tribune, being represented as constructed in the most thorough manner. Each consists of twenty suites of apartments, each suite comprising a parlor, with an alcove for a bed, a bed-room, a kitchen, a pantry and a coal bin. The rooms are airy, lighted with gas, etc. The plan seems requisite for New York, where room is scanty and rents exceedingly high.

From an article in Putnam's Monthly, entitled "The Best Society," we take the following:

MRS. POTIPHAR'S BALL.—We went to the brilliant ball. There was too much of every thing. Too much light, and eating, and drinking, and dancing, and flirting, and dressing, and feigning, and snirking, and much too many people. Good taste insists first upon fitness. But why had Mrs. Potiphar given this ball? We inquired industriously, and learned it was because she did not give one last year. Is it then essential to do this thing biennially? inquired we with some trepidation. "Certainly," was the reply, "or society will forget you." Every body was unhappy at Mrs. Potiphar's, save a few girls and boys, who danced violently all the evening. Those who did not dance walked up and down the rooms as well as they could, squeezing by non-dancing ladies, causing them to swear in their hearts as the brusque broadcloth carried away the light outworks of gimze and gossamer. The dowagers, ranged in solid phalanx, occupied all the chairs and sofas against the wall, and fanned themselves until supper time, looking at each other's diamonds, and criticising the toilets of the younger ladies, each narrowly watching her peculiar Polly Jane, that she did not betray too much interest for any man who was not of a certain fortune. It is the cold, vulgar truth, Madam, nor are we in the slightest degree exaggerating. Elderly gentlemen, twisting single gloves in a very wretched manner, came up and bowed to the dowagers, and snirked, and said it was a very pleasant party, and a handsome house, and then clutched their hands behind them and walked miserably away, looking as affable as possible. And the dowagers made a little fun of the elderly gentlemen among themselves as they walked away.

Then came the younger non-dancing men—a class of the community who wear black cravats and waistcoats, and thrust their thumbs and forefingers in their waistcoat pockets, and are called "talking men." Some of them are literary, and affect the philosopher; have, perhaps, written a book or two, and are a small species of lion to very young ladies. Some of the blase kind; men who affect the extremest elegance, and are reputed "so aristocratic," and who care for nothing in particular, but wish they had not been born gentlemen, in which case they might have escaped ennui. These gentlemen stand with hat in hand, and coats and trowsers most unexceptionable. They are the "so gentlemanly" persons, of whom one hears a great deal, but which seems to mean nothing but cleanliness. Vivian Grey and Pelham are the models of their ambition, and they succeed in being Pendennises. They enjoy the reputation of being "very clever," and "very talented fellows," "smart chaps," etc., but refrain from proving what is so ungeneously conceded. They are often men of a certain cultivation. They have traveled, many of them, spending a year or two in Paris, and a month or two in the rest of Europe. Consequently they endure society at home with a smile and shrug, and a graceful supercilliousness, which is very engaging. They prefer to hover about the ladies who did not come out this season, but are a little used to the world, with whom they are upon the most friendly terms, and who criticise together very freely all the great events in the great world of fashion.

These elegant Pendennises we saw at Mrs. Potiphar's, but not without a sadness which can hardly be explained. They had been boys once, all of them, fresh and frank-hearted, and full of a noble ambition. They had read and pondered the histories of great men; how they resolved, and struggled, and achieved. In the pure portraiture of genius they had loved and honored noble women, and each young heart was sworn to truth and the service of beauty. These boyish instincts clung to whatever was lovely, and rejected the specious snare, however graceful and elegant. They sailed new knights upon that old and endless crusade against hypocrisy and the devil, and they were lost in the luxury of Corinth, nor longer seek the difficult shores beyond. A present smile was worth a future laurel. The ease of the moment was worth immortal tranquility. They renounced the eternworship of the unknown God, and acknowledged the deities of Athens. But the seal of their shame is their own smile at their early dreams. Youths, whose younger days were fervid with the resolution to strike and win, are content to eat and drink and sleep well; to go to the opera and to the ball; to be known as "gentlemanly," and "aristocratic," and "elegant;" and to cherish luxurious and enervating indolence. The end of such men is evident enough from the beginning. They are snuffed out by a "great match," and become an appendage to a rich woman; or they dwindle off into old roues, men of the world in sad earnest, and not with elegant affectation, blaze; and ne they begun Arthur Pendennises, so they end in the Major. But, believe it, that old fossil heart is wrung sometimes by a mortal pang, as it remembers those squandered opportunities and that lost life.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS ON THE HONDURAS QUESTION.—Mr. Mason, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the United States Senate, has made a report on the Central American question. The report argues against the right of Great Britain, under the treaty, to extend the limits of her settlements in Honduras. It says that what is now the extent of claim or pretension on the part of Great Britain, either in regard to the territory or dominion on the Gulf of Honduras, the committee have been unable satisfactorily to ascertain. In the unsettled condition of the country, pending hostilities between Spain and the colonies, it is very manifest that, whether with or without the sanction of the British Government, the settlers there pushed their occupancy far beyond the southern limits assigned to them by treaty, and it now appears that a right is asserted to maintain such occupancy, as it stood in 1821, when the colonies were dismembered from Spain. These are questions properly belonging to the respective powers, who claim on the one hand or contest on the other—that is to say, of Great Britain and the Spanish Republics. But the extension of dominion is of a different character, and it is one in the disposition of which this Government can never be indifferent. Whether it shall ultimately be determined that the English settlements in the Honduras are in Mexico or Guatemala, the question remains the same as regards the United States; and as connected with this inquiry, the committee have deemed it incumbent to express an opinion as to the character of the tenure by which these settlements are enjoyed by British subjects.

The report proceeds to say that the anomalous character of these English settlements is well illustrated by the legislation of Great Britain concerning them, and alludes to certain statutes herein it is clearly admitted that they are not within the dominion of Great Britain, it having been necessary to provide by special legislation for the punishment of crimes committed there by British subjects. The report quotes the law of third George in 1817, and says:

"But this act could not be carried into effect at the Belize, because it was found that there was no island there in the dominion of his Majesty, nor dependation, colony, dominion, fort or factory to which the King's commission could be directed, and of course it was found necessary, by an amendatory act, passed in 1819, to substitute a special tribunal, created thereby at Belize, for the trial of offences, the same being rendered necessary, as recited in the act, because of the great delay and difficulty of removing offenders in Honduras for trial to England, or to any of his Majesty's islands, plantations, colonies, forts, or factories, such crimes do oftentimes escape punishment." These statutes clearly showing that as late as the year 1819, the Parliament of England did not claim or recognize the British settlement at Belize as being within the dominion of Great Britain; and, secondly, that England had no established authority there, even of the grade of plantation, fort or factory."

The report then goes on to give the opinion of the committee, as follows:

"On the whole, the committee therefore report as their opinion to the Senate: That the Islands of Roaton, Bonacca, Utilla, Barbant, Helena, and Morat, in and near the Bay of Honduras, constitute part of the territory of the republic of Honduras, and therefore form a part of Central America, and, in consequence, that any occupation or colonization of those islands by Great Britain would be a violation of the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850. The committee, from the information before them, entertain a decided opinion that the British settlements at Belize, as defined by the treaties with Spain, lie within the territory of the republic at Guatemala, and so equally constitute a part of Central America. Should such be the fact, whilst the committee are not prepared to say that the engagements of the treaty of 1850 would require that those settlements shall be abandoned and discontinued on the part Great Britain, yet this Government would have just cause of complaint against any extension of the limits of these settlements beyond those prescribed by Spain, or as further allowed by the republics where they may be found; and that in any manner to enlarge or change the character of these settlements by any mode of jurisdiction, would be in violation of said treaty."

THE SILVER COINAGE.—The House of Representatives having passed the bill which passed the Senate at the last session, amendatory of the existing laws regulating the coinage of half dollar, quarter dollar, dime and half dime and providing for the coinage of three dollar gold pieces. Without amendment it requires only the signature of the President to become a law. As the subject possesses general interest, we now insert the provisions of the bill at length, as follows:

Sec 1. That from and after the first day of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, the weight of the half dollar or piece of fifty cents, shall be one hundred and ninety-two grains, and the quarter dollar, dime, and half dime, shall be respectively, one-half, one-fifth, and one-tenth of the weight of said half dollar.

Sec. 2. That the silver coins issued in conformity with the above section, shall be legal tenders in payment of debts for all sums not exceeding five dollars.

Sec. 3. That in order to procure bullion for the requisite coinage of the subdivisions of the dollar authorised by this act, the Treasurer of the Mint shall, with the approval of the Director, purchase such bullion with the bullion fund of the mint. He shall charge himself with the gain arising from the coinage of such bullion into coins of a nominal value exceeding the intrinsic value thereof, and shall be credited with the difference between such intrinsic value and the price paid for said bullion, and with the expense of distributing said coins as hereinafter provided. The balances to his credit, or the profit of said coinage, shall be, from time to time, on a warrant of the Director of the mint, transferred to the account of the Treasury of the United States.

Sec 4. That such coins shall be paid out at the mint in exchange for gold coins at par, in sums not less than one hundred dollars; and it shall be lawful, also, to transmit parcels of the same from time to time to the assistant treasurers, depositaries, and other officers of the United States, under general regulations, proposed by the Director of the Mint, and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; provided, however, that the amount coined into quarter dollars, dimes and half dimes, shall be regulated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sec. 5. That no deposits for coinage into the half dollar, quarter dollar, dime, and half dime shall thereafter be received, other than those made by the Treasurer of the Mint as herein authorized, and upon account of the United States.

Sec. 6. That at the option of the depositor, gold or silver may be cast into bars or ingots of either pure metal or of standard fineness, as the owner may prefer, with a stamp upon the same, designating its weight and fineness, but no piece, of either gold or silver, shall be cast into bars or ingots of a less weight than ten ounces, except pieces of one ounce, of two ounces, of three ounces, and of five ounces, all of which pieces of less weight than ten ounces shall be of the standard fineness, with their weight and fineness stamped upon them; but in cases when the gold and silver deposited be coined or cast into bars or ingots, there shall be a charge to the depositor, in addition to the charge now made for refining or parting the metals, of one half of one per cent. The money arising from this charge of one-half per cent, shall be charged in the Treasurer of the Mint, and from time to time, on warrant of the Director of the Mint, shall be transferred into the Treasury of the United States; provided, however, that nothing contained in this section shall be considered as applying to the half dollar, the quarter dollar, the dime and half dime.

Sec. 7. That from time to time there shall be struck and coined at the Mint of the United States, and the branches thereof, conformably in all respect to law, and conformably in all respects to the standard of gold coin now established by law, a coin of gold of the value of three dollars, or units, and all the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of gold dollars and double eagles," approved March third, eighteen hundred and forty-nine, shall be applied to the coin herein authorized, so far as the same may be applicable; but the devices and image of the three dollar piece shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sec. 8. That this act shall be in force from and after the first day of June next.

THE CHOLERA.—This disease, which preceded the cholera in 1832, and which since is supposed by some to be a herald of the cholera, is now prevailing extensive in Paris and London. A Paris letter, (January 24,) to the New York Journal of Commerce, says:

"It over the epithet dismal could be applied to the weather, it was never more so than that of our last week or month. The Medical Gazette informs us that, in London, every third or fourth person has the grippe, and that in our capital there is scarcely a dwelling without a patient.

EDUCATION.

PICKENSVILLE
FEMALE INSTITUTE.

INSTRUCTORS:

R. BRADSAW, A. M. PRINCIPAL..... MRS. E. BRADSHAW, Superintendent of Domestic and Social Duties.
PROFESSOR C. F. YEAGLE, Instructor in Music; Piano, Guitar, Violin, Harp, etc.
Assistant Teachers: MISSES ANNIE E. RIACH, C. VIRGINIA SMITH, AGNESS B. RIACH, LIZZIE M. BRADSHAW.

The PICKENSVILLE FEMALE INSTITUTE is now, with a very full corps of experienced teachers, in successful operation. The Misses Riach, whose names appear with the other instructors, though native Americans, were both educated in England. These ladies are not only finished scholars but experienced teachers. The Board of Trustees would, with confidence, recommend this school as worthy the patronage of an enlightened public. In point of merit they consider it second to no other similar institution in the South.

They would also assure the public that there has not been a death, nor a case of protracted sickness, in the school for the past three years.

☞ The next regular session of five months will commence the 1st day of MARCH. Pupils, however, will be received at any time, and will be charged only from the time they enter.

☞ Catalogues containing every necessary information respecting TERMS, etc., can be had by applying to the Principal.

A commodious and splendid brick edifice has just been completed—ninety-seven by forty-seven feet, three stories—which for stability, convenience of arrangement, and for number, size and comfort of private and school rooms, is not surpassed by any similar one in the country. The Principal resides in the building, and with his lady and competent female assistance, superintends the Boarding Department. A lady will reside in the Seminary, who faithfully discharges the duties of Matron, Nurse and Governess, so that at all times, pupils will find the comforts, kindness and attentions of home. The Principal, with the aid of female teachers, who also live in the Seminary, diligently guard and form their morals, manners and habits of the pupils. Being under his charge at all times, they are constantly exercised under a wholesome system of regulations, requiring neatness, order, punctuality, economy and regularity, calculated to give a safe and vigorous development to character. The appliances of home and family are thus secured by this arrangement, but perpetuated and strengthened.

The ensuing scholastic year will commence on Thursday the 23d of September, 1852. Pupils can enter at any time during the year, chargeable from the time of entrance. No deduction will be made but by special arrangement with the Principal.

Boarders study at night under a teacher. They are required to retire by o'clock at night, and rise early in the morning at a given signal, and to take frequent and wholesome exercise.

Private rooms are large, conveniently and comfortably furnished. Pupils are required to keep their wardrobes and private apartments in neatness and order. A proper officer weekly takes charge of their clothing, inspects its condition, and every Saturday morning instructs them in plain sewing and necessary repairs of clothing. Every article of clothing must be marked with the owner's name.

Bi-monthly reports are sent to patrons, which are a faithful showing of the scholarship and deportment of pupils.

Pupils are not allowed to attend parties, balls, dancing classes, or any amusement calculated to interfere with their studies.

Visitors are not received by pupils except with suitable introduction to the Principal from patrons.

The Principal must have certain information respecting every correspondent. Pupils are required to attend Church and Sunday School on Sabbath.

No accounts will be opened in Marion but with the [Selected by the Rev. A. M. Box, from the "Sainted Dead" by Harbaugh.]

We speak of the realms of the blest,
That country so bright and so fair!
And oft are its glories confessed,
But what must it be to be there!

We speak of its pathways of gold,
Its walks decked with jewels so rare,
Its wonders and pleasures untold,
But what must it be to be there!

We speak of its freedom from sin,
From sorrow, temptation, and care;
From trials, without and within,
But what must it be to be there!

We speak of its service of love,
The robes which the glorified wear,
The church of the first born above,
But what must it be to be there!

Thou Lord, 'midst sorrow and woe,
For heaven my spirit prepare!
And shortly I also shall know,
And feel, what it is to be there!

BISHOP GREEN ON THE IVES CASE.

The last Church Herald contains an apologetic explanation of the causes of the perversion to Papacy of this ex-Bishop, from the pen of the Right Rev. W. M. Green, D. D., Bishop of the (Episcopal) Diocese of Mississippi.

We hardly know what to make of the letter; it takes us by surprise. It does so because of its singular and striking discrepancies. Bishop Green seems to be taken by surprise himself at the change of Bishop Ives' church relations; and, I suppose the case so, as Bishop Otey had stamped the mere rumor as utterly false in the secular journals of Tennessee. But why surprised? Was not Bishop Green known that Ives was a heart a Romanist for several years? And why should any High Churchman wonder at his brethren for carrying out the Popish views that now characterize that party, or sect, in the Episcopal Church, and adhering to Rome! No Low Churchman, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, or out-side observer, is taken by surprise. Consistency will force men into strange extremes; and if any body, Bishop or layman, feels astonished at Bishop Ives, and the hundreds of English Episcopal Clergymen, whom consistency has carried to Rome, they must be greatly behind the times, or to say the least, be very easily astonished. For ourselves we are not surprised, but if this is not the droppings before a plentiful shower, we shall be. If all the inflated and preposterous pretensions of the Episcopal Church, (the least numerous of all denominations that have a national extension,) and her impertinent imitations of the over-lordings, self-importance, and exclusiveness of her holy Mother, do not lead her back into the Old Lady's lap, why, then, may we expect that effect will no longer follow cause. But I am neglecting the Bishop's letter.

The design of the letter, evidently, is to parry the blow the change of Ives's church relations is calculated to strike. "Bishop Green, however, wishes it distinctly understood that he admits Ives's right to do as he has done, and he "will have nothing to do" "with the unkind and unreasonable practice" of some who, in such cases, would "rend him without mercy." But, then, lest the flight of a chief shepherd should draw along any portion of the flock, or open the eyes of the spectators who watch with some solicitude these Rome-antic proceedings, he, notwithstanding the loving protestations of his introduction, soon lets you know that Ives was no great things, and never was. Indeed, the first thought that occurred to me after reading it was, that the letter was a real torpedo—a hot and ragged thunder-belt, done up in a lamb's skie, whose wool was soft as cider down.

He begins with an extract from "a pious and intelligent layman," a North Carolinian, as follows:

"To-day's mail (Jan. 28,) brings us intelligence from Italy that Bishop Ives has formally abjured Protestantism. This has been expected for some time, and the result proves that the Bishop has either been playing the Jesuit and the ——, or that he is a deranged man. I have charity enough to believe that his mind has been affected for some years. If it were not so he would not, within the last ninety days, have drawn from his diocese six months' salary in advance, to defray the expense of his trip to Europe."

The author of the above extract has "charity enough to believe that his mind has been affected;" wonderful stretch of charity to be sure! But if his charity was so voluminous as to cover the Bishop's crimes with a mantle of derangement, why did not his spleen and vindictiveness cool themselves in that holy virtue "enough" to leave out "the Jesuit and the ——," a concealed weapon, honed for the fat of the fifth rib?

Bishop Green takes his cue from the letter; the extract is its key note. "The unsettled condition of Bishop Ives's intellect, or rather his moral judgement, has been a growing source of pain," etc. It is clearly his opinion that Ives is not mentally, but morally deranged—deranged in his "moral judgment," by which, of course, he means his conscience. Well, if there is any meaning in words, he gives us to understand that the ex-Bishop is, and long has been a corrupt man. And this appears, from the letter, to have long been the opinion of his diocese. For, had his intellect been shaken humanity, and the ordinary dictates of common prudence, would have required that like "the Osaerdonks, he should have been superceded, or at the least had an assistant appointed to relieve the menaced Lemon of its incessant bile.

But no, when these things were "on more than one occasion" hinted at, the bold champion of Puseyism would come forward and blanch the "moral judgment," confess that he had gone too far, and by "earnest entreaties, and repeated recantations," prove that wherever the "moral judgment" might be, the intellect was sound enough. Bishop Green shows no inclination to adopt the notion of mental insanity, in whole or in part, for he says he will "pray that the erroneous creed which he (Ives) has chosen, may not prevent him from making his calling and election sure against the last day."

Now, surely, the good Bishop of Mississippi does not believe God will hold an insane man responsible for the sort of creed, erroneous or orthodox, he may, in the tumultuous obnlitions of a bewildered reason, choose? Not he. He does not thus vainly pray. But he prays that the corrupt conscience, which has thrown him into "the spiritual dangers which now surround him," may be washed and purified "against the last day." It is true the author says he has not "regarded him as a responsible man" for some years past, though his choosing an "erroneous creed," seems to show so much method in his madness, and the proclivities for that choice dating back just about as far as the period of his dawning irresponsibleness, have wrung from the mortified pretender to prelatical preeminence, and priestly exclusiveness, a sad exhibition of chagrin, and an endeavor to hide from the public eye the Romeward tendencies of the High Church party in the Episcopal Church.

Or, if he really supposed Ives's reason impaired, why should he pursue him with such bitter and burning words as these: "As to the probable effect of the apostacy of Bishop Ives upon the diocese which he has so insulted and deserted." Insulted—deserted! A man smitten of God, not "regarded as responsible," guilty of insult and desertion! I have seen a husband, in a fit of derangement, deny, disown, and desert his wife, but she did not charge him with "insult," nor accuse him of "desertion," but was compassionate and tender, and felt that returning reason would prove he loved and honored her as his wife. But poor Ives has been in a "high state of nervous excitement" about religious matters, and has got his "moral judgment" deranged; and he is held up before the world as guilty of "insult and desertion." Besides, Bishop Green tells us that in passing through Bishop Ives's diocese, in North Carolina, recently, he "was grieved at heart to see the general disaffection of the diocese towards their Bishop on account of his many inconsistencies of conduct. All confidence was gone, and the wish was openly expressed that he would resign, and thus open the way for the return of that soundness in the faith, and that mutual love," etc.

Now, if that is a fair exhibition of High Church hospitality and Christian kindness, or to say the least, of North Carolina humanity, why, then, from all such people "good Lord deliver us."

Poor Bishop Ives is not deemed "a responsible man;" has been suffering under "a high state of nervous excitement;" his mind has been "singularly affected," and when he needs in his grey old age, and "many infirmities," the tender care, Christian forbearance, gentleness, and brotherly love and sympathy, of those he has so long served in "word and doctrine"—when the hand of God is upon him, and derangement usurps the throne of reason—when more than at any other period in his life, he needs the affection of the Church, we find only a "general disaffection of the diocese toward their Bishop—all confidence gone." Well, if ever we get insane, may Heaven save us from a residence in, or a visit to the State, where its "living apostle," and the only Bishop of the Church has met with such evidences of unfeelingness and inhumanity.

It is true, no doubt, that Bishop Ives has been petting a favorite idea about "Church unity," but if that be evidence of insanity, and madam rumor be not more false than false can be, then the highly distinguished Diocesan of Mississippi, need not wonder if at no very remote period he should find himself catalogued among those who are characterized by a "nervous excitement," and a mind "singularly affected." But is it strange that a man, who for several years past has been so home-sick as to earn the rebukes of his brethren for showing himself unweaned, should, in a paroxysm of adolescent love, fly to his mother's bosom the moment he got out of the nursery? He doubtless tried the recipe of the Puseyite, over the waters, that we must "forget our Mother;" but as the "course of true love never did run smooth," he found it more difficult, the more he tried, till at last, like a famishing child that seizes its nurses thumb, and tries to draw life and nourishment therefrom, you see Bishop Ives prostrate at the feet of the Pope, with his big toe in his mouth, and sobbing, like a long lost child, that weeps for joy at having found his mama.

Well, now that he has gone, the way is open for the return of "soundness in the faith." What a state of things! Orthodoxy absolutely fled from the presence of the poor crazy Bishop! Well, if it produces the same effect on Rome, we may hope to see her heresies, like the Spirits of Legion, soon betake themselves to the depths of the sea. But there is ground of fear, it would seem, lest this epidemic derangement that would not let "soundness of faith" stay there, may not not let it return home so soon after all. But we shall see what we shall see. Thus far it is the first time I ever heard of a single case of clerical insanity producing so remarkable a result as to drive orthodoxy and "mutual love" out of a great and intelligent State. We have heard of a minister who, after preaching several years, found out that himself had never been converted, born of the Spirit of God, and it so awakened him that for a while some thought him "insane"—deranged. But it was remorse and repentance, and when he sought the Lord with a broken heart, he found himself restored to his right mind, more sane than ever before. And it would not much surprise us if with the absurdities of Puseyism, baptismal regeneration, confession and sacramental grace, the Bishop had lost sight of the blood of Christ, which alone can cleanse us from sin, and under powerful awakenings, a sense of guilt, remorse, and unpardoned transgression, he had betrayed what is sometimes scornfully termed "animal excitement," and aroused the suspicion of insanity among his unconverted priests and parishioners. However, it may be that as the legal fraternity, for several years past, has so successfully hamboozled courts and juries with the doctrine of "insanity," and "derangement," the Church intend to take their share of the spoils in order to account for the constant perversions to the bosom of the "Mother of Harlots." If so, we shall soon hear of the "singularly affected" mind, or "moral judgment" of the Bishops of London and Exeter, Dr. Pusey and Bishop Doane, and some of his associates, and many others. But after all the good old truth still stands, "ye shall know a tree by its fruits." We have read, somewhere, the words following: "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall;" and if it ever was, or will be shown to be God's word, and applicable to men, as we believe it is, it meets a most striking illustration in the Heaven-speaking rebukes with which the pride, pretension, exclusiveness, and haughtiness of the Episcopal Church has been, and is being visited.

The names of several of her most eminent and pompous Bishops have become bye-words and synonyms for lewdness and intemperance, and others bid fair to swell the catalogue very soon with the equivalents of Jesuitry and "moral" insanity. The lesson—at least one lesson we hope that Church may learn, viz: that she has enough to do to take care of herself—take care of her "singularly affected" children and fathers, and let other Christian denominations alone. Instead of preaching, writing, and sneering, about Presbyterian "Societies," Methodist "Societies," "Lay Preachers," "want of authority," "true administrators," "unordained usurpers of the office of the Ministry," and other like endeavors to throw odium upon the most honored and most useful branches of Christ's Church, where He delights to dwell and display the verity of his promise of being with his ministers always, let them attend to their own "deranged" and deplorable affairs, and see to it that they "give no offence" to the "little flock" of the Lord Jesus.

Since penning the above, Bishop Ives's letter of resignation has come to hand, and it shows the whole working of his mind, and proves that it was Puseyism that tormented him. He was trying to reconcile the claims and pretensions of High Church Episcopacy with the admitted rights, powers, and privileges of Romanism. The Bishop discovered that according to the dictum of the Episcopal Church, she was herself a schismatic "Society;" that he was no Bishop—not even a preacher of right; nay, more, that he was not a member of a Christian church. And I have come to the conclusion that Puseyism is a "derangement" of the "moral judgment," per se, and will produce sooner or later the same effects on all its miserable and unfortunate victims.

Look, for instance, at the fact that the editors of those four rabid Roman Catholic periodicals, the Catholic Herald, the Shepherd of the Valley, the Pittsburg Catholic, and the Freeman's Journal, were once connected with the Protestant Episcopal Church of this country.

LONDON, February 3, 1853.

As to home politics, and Wesleyan intelligence, the past month has been singularly barren of interest. The Aberdeen-Russell Cabinet are, it is to be presumed, incubating over their measures. Meantime, however, this process goes on in silence, and no sound or token reveals what are likely to be forms which their legislative schemes, when fully hatched and fledged, will take.

The Earl of Clarendon, it seems, is in a few weeks to take the office of Secretary for Foreign Affairs, which, since the formation of the Cabinet, Lord John Russell has provisionally held. Lord John will then be a member of the Cabinet without the special cares of office, and leader for the Government in the House of Commons. The Earl of Clarendon, some twenty years ago, as the Honorable, or Right Honorable George Villers, discharged with great ability the functions of Ambassador, at the Court of Spain, in connection with the Whig Ministry. He has since been constantly in high office when the Whig Ministry has been in power, and, as is well known, during their last tenure of office occupied with singular ability and success the very difficult post of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. From the antecedents, therefore, of this nobleman, whose talents are universally acknowledged, it may be presumed that he is eminently competent for the office which he is about to fill. It is, however, well understood that, though a man of honor and integrity, he is a mere politician. It will not be expected that he should be guided in his administration by the highest principles of right—the dictates of Scriptural religion—which are also the truest and surest guides in regard to real expediency. In one word, Lord Clarendon is understood to be a mere worldly statesman, and if the endowment of Popery should appear to him to be advisable, on grounds of political expediency, no scruples of conscience are likely to restrain him. On similar principles of lax expediency we may expect our foreign affairs to be conducted. Yet the Earl of Clarendon is not the man dishonorably to truckle, or suffer the national political interests of Britain to be infringed.

My foregoing remarks have suggested that which is likely to be the great political danger and difficulty of the present Cabinet—the question of Popery. They have taken into office some of the leading and most violent members of what was called the Irish Brigade, or the Pope's Brass Band; and these men, in accepting the bait offered, have broken all their engagements, and forgotten all their boasts. This transaction honest men of all parties cannot but feel to be almost equally discreditable to the Cabinet which offered and to those who have accepted office. Men, whose language had been violent even to sedition, and whose aim had been to trample upon the Protestantism of the Empire, should never have been invited to take office by a Ministry careful of its character. For a Conservative Ministry, however liberal, to do this was also glaringly inconsistent: and, although to silence these men in such a way may be a present convenience, it must ultimately be an injury, and speedily prove a source of weakness to the party which has done it. In Ireland the names of the traitors, as they are called, who have been bribed to join the Ministry, are loaded with execrations. Nor are the Ministry the better liked at all by the disloyal party for this transaction, while the loyal party have felt themselves wronged and insulted by it. Surely, the late leaders of a violent and disloyal faction, were not the men to be preferred to all others as the legal advisers and agents of the Crown in Ireland. It is to be hoped the late Lord Lieutenant, the Earl of Clarendon, had no share in this business.

Here, then, we have a Ministry in which Lord Aberdeen, Mr. Gladstone, and Sir James Graham, three of the ablest of its members, are notoriously, as to the matter of Popery, and its political influence, or social development and progress, either theoretical and practical indifferentists, or, as is generally believed in the case of one of the three, disposed rather to favor than to disfavor Popery. It will not be forgotten that Mr. Gladstone has publicly slurred Protestantism, as a merely negative form of religious belief. And all three of these statesmen, as I stated in my last, opposed themselves twenty months ago to the almost unanimous feeling of the country, and to the immense majority of their co-Senators, in the matter of Lord John Russell's Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. They have always supported the Maynooth grant, and will assuredly oppose all the weight of their influence to any proposed inquiry into the condition and influence of that mischievous Popish college. Lord Palmerston, again, is in all such matters a mere liberal and patriotic politicinn—guided, not by religious feelings, but by considerations of national expediency. Lord John Russell, it is true, is from historical research, and religious conviction, decidedly anti-Popish. But what can he do against such counter-influence, especially now that the Ministry has admitted the representatives of the Popish Band to high and confidential office? Sir W. Molesworth, again, is a mere secularist; and others of the Ministry are anything-arians, or nothing-arians, whichever you please to call them.

I should not be at all surprised if the present Cabinet should, not perhaps this session, feel their way towards proposing an endowment of the Irish priesthood. The grant to Maynooth will certainly be kept up, if it is not increased; and it is probable that the project of instituting diplomatic relations with Rome, which the Earl of Aberdeen entertained when last in office, and to which a large proportion of the Cabinet have committed themselves, will be renewed, in a year or two at any rate, should the present Ministry continue in office.

In other respects I have great confidence in this Ministry. As political economists, and financiers, never was there so able a Ministry. In the matter of Parliamentary reform they are likely to be, at the same time, liberal and conservative, bold and cautious, progressive and safe. As Parliamentary debaters, expositors of principles or policy, for weight and ability, they surpass all parallel. Never did any Cabinet possess such an array of and combination of statesman-like intellect, brilliant Parliamentary talent, and official experience. And the coalition of different parties is not only perfectly honorable, but highly creditable, to those who have coalesced, except so for as regards the Irish section. Let it be remembered that the objection to the Irish section is not that they are Roman Catholics, but that they have proved themselves to be bigoted and rabid Papists, and disloyal factionaries. There are Roman Catholic lawyers and gentlemen, in Ireland, very competent for office, who are as loyal as any British Protestant can be. I am as little of an alarmist, especially about Popery, as any one can well be. Yet, certainly, the tendency of Popish politics on the Continent is not such as to permit one to forget the ancient and unchanging character of Popery, or to prevent a feeling of shuddering fear at the thought of even the remotest possibility of its again acquiring predominance in the world. On the Continent, at any rate, it has regained very much of its former ascendancy, being probably as powerful now as it has ever been since the middle of the Sixteenth Century. And, in resuming its ancient power, it has equally resumed its characteristic persecuting rancor and cruelty. Never, even in the darkest ages, did it show more of this than it has lately done—especially in Italy. The case of the Madiai is but a sample of a class of cases which every month is increasing in number. The last case of which we have heard, is that of Mazzinghi, at Genoa, which is now included in the territory of Piedmont. The accused is twenty-five years of age, and a surgeon by profession. The trial took place with closed doors, but it is said that he was charged with having, in company with Captain Pakenham, of the British Navy, preached against the religion of the State, and in praise of Protestantism. He was sentenced to imprisonment for three years, by virtue of the CLXIVth Article of the Penal Code.

But it would seem, in fact, that Piedmont, which has so long, as the Italian citadel of political and religious liberty, bravely sustained a close seige on the part of Rome, Austria and France, which have beleaguered her on every side, has at length been compelled to give way to a pressure so disproportioned to her strength. For I see it is announced in the papers that the Intendant General of Chambery has published a decree prohibiting the introduction into Savoy of the Bible bearing the name of de Saey; and that the Piedmontese Gazette contains an official article calling upon the conductors of journals to abstain from severe reflections upon foreign Governments and their chiefs. This latter announcement indicates, of course, the influence of the despot of France upon the liberty of the press in Piedmont.

As to France, of course the Emperor's last evolution has absorbed universal interest. Finding himself disappointed of a Princess as consort, who might have added security and dignity to his power—and he had negotiated with not a few—the Emperor very prudently made a virtue of necessity, with a proud humility owned himself a parvenu—a newcomer—among the Princes of Europe, and declared his determination contentedly to accept that position, and not degrade himself by seeking any longer alliances which "dynastic prejudices" would not permit him to obtain, unless of such a secondary class as rather to injure than aid his position, but to please himself, and follow the dictates of reason, by marrying the woman he loved. This magnanimous manifesto would have been worth more if the Emperor had previously shown himself somewhat less anxious to propitiate, and gain to his own side, "dynastic prejudices." The following summary of the Emperor's disappointments is taken from the Morning Chronicle, one of the best informed and ablest journals in Britain, the organ of the Peelites and Puseyites:

"You are aware," writes the correspondent of the Chronicle, "that for some time past Louis Napoleon has in vain sought to find a lady of the rank of Princess, combining all the qualities desirable in a person to be raised to the preeminent position of Empress of the French. The qualities required are—suitable rank, suitable age, the Catholic religion, and willingness to accept Louis Napoleon as lord and master. The number of Princesses combining the first three of these qualities are very rare—so rare, in fact, that in the whole of Europe they may be limited to half a dozen. But it is the last requirement which has been the principal obstacle to Louis Napoleon's wishes; for as the marriage of Princesses is not a marriage of choice, but of State policy, Sovereigns and Governments are the 'mamas' who have to be consulted, and whose consent is required. The Emperor of the French has accordingly found, wherever he addressed himself, that his has been subjected to the humiliation of having his suit rejected with as little ceremony as if he were an ordinary mortal. Every one has heard of the visit paid by Louis Napoleon to Baden, of the almost official announcement made that the Princess de Wasa, who was the object of that visit, was to be his partner on the Imperial throne; of the subsequent interference of Russia and Austria to prevent the marriage; of the promise of the Czar to find the young lady a suitable husband; and of her final betrothal to Prince Albert, the heir presumptive to the throne of Saxony. But this, though the most notorious, is neither the first nor the last instance in which Louis Napoleon played the part of a rejected suitor. It is well known that unsuccessful overtures were made to the daughter of the Duchess of Braganza, who was considered an eligible choice, as the descendant of Prince Eugene, and consequently in connection of the Benaparte family. Similar overtures were made for the daughter of the King of Sweden, who has the recommendation of being of French extraction, and being a distant relation of his own, through the Clarys. Since then a sister of the King of Spain has been spoken of; and very lately Prince Lucien Murat made a winter journey to Dusseldorf, for no other purpose than that of demanding the hand of a very young Princess, the daughter of the mediatized Prince of Hohenzollern-Sigmarigen. But wherever he addressed himself some difficulty was started. The Brazilian Princess was more nearly connected with the Orleans family than with the Bonaparte family; the Swedish Princess was refused to him because the King, her father, was in dread of the anger of his powerful neighbor—the Czar; and her Highness of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen was pronounced by her relations, if not by herself, as 'over young to marry yet.' In short, wherever he turned, Louis Napoleon found that there were obstacles in his way, and it became at length clear to himself, as well as to others, that the great Powers of Europe were determined if possible to prevent him from finding a wife at all. Louis Napoleon has determined to get over the difficulty by a species of coup d'etat, which does not appear to have been guarded against by the Northern Powers. He has laid aside all idea of hunting after Princesses, and has determined to raise to the throne a young lady whose principal qualifications for that high rank, are her beauty and the admiration with which she has inspired his Majesty in the course of a personal acquaintance of some months' standing."

Louis Napoleon, however, in his manifesto on the subject of his marriage—which I need not tell you was solemnized at Notre Dame last Sunday—committed one serious imprudence. For him to refer respectfully, and affectionately, to the amiable Josephine, his grandmother, was graceful and sure to be popular, but to refer injuriously to Marie Louise, his Imperial Uncle's second consort, was a gratuitous insult to the Court of Vienna. Besides it is the reverse of true that the Austrian Princess, or her family on her behalf, intrigued to bring about the marriage with Napoleon. Fallen, as at that time, were the fortunes of the House of Hapsburg, they were never reduced to this pass. And there is sufficient evidence that it was only with the greatest reluctance, and with a sense of degradation, that they consented to the alliance of one of their daughters with one whom they feared and hated as their conqueror, and loathed as an upstart Dictator among the thrones of Europe. It is said that this imprudent expression of the Emperor's has embarrassed the diplomatic relations between France and Austria; and even previously to this, the print of Louis Napoleon had been ordered to be removed from the windows of the book and print shops in Vienna, and the editors of journals advised that they would do well to give the Emperor no other name than Louis Napoleon.

As to the internal affairs of France—the extension of Jesuit influence, the more and more vexatious restrictions put upon all forms and manifestations of free religion, the precarious position of our own missionary operations, which subsist only by sufferance—you will no doubt receive full information from your Paris correspondent.

In Birmah we have gained fruitless victories—wasted precious time, lives and treasure—on what principles, or according to what policy, nobody knows. That was a most just and needful war—undertaken because negotiation had proved fruitless, and British merchants and residents were daily and most insolently maltreated and oppressed; but the manner in which it has been conducted is incomprehensible. Instead of marching on the capital, our troops have thrown away their time and every thing else in making an inroad upon a frontier Province of the Empire; and this Province, with a vast and very assailable margin, it has been determined to annex to our immense Indian Empire. It may be doubted whether the gain of Pegu will not turn out a loss. For these results, however, neither the Government at home, nor the Governor General of India, can be held responsible.

Sentence has been at length pronounced in the case of Achilli vs. Newman. The defendant, Newman, is sentenced to a fine £100. This is almost laughable, considering that the trial has cost him £10,000. The severest part of his punishment, however, was the judgment of Mr. Justice Coleridge, preceding the sentence. With tender fidelity the Judge showed Doctor Newman from what he had fallen. Doctor Achilli has gained his suit, yet not vindicated his character. Indeed, it was impossible, opposed to all the force and subtlety of Popery, and having lived nearly all his life in Italy, that he could be in position to do this. X. Y.

P. S. The good news is come from Italy that His Majesty, of Piedmont, has immediately and fully pardoned Mazzinghi, and that a measure will be introduced to do away with the Religious Penal Code.

FEMALE EDUCATION.

Oak Bowery College—Its Resources in East Alabama—Relative Importance of Female Education—Endowments, etc.

MR. EDITOR: The resources of this institution must form the staple of this number—in medias res. They are permanent; railroads and telegraphs can't so much interfere with them as to disturb the advantages of our position. We command the outlet to a country rich in material, and must continue to command it. Look at the map; how can we be cut off from the North and West?

But we have ample material in Chambers county, itself. Its heavy and thrifty Methodist population ought to furnish, and will furnish us, one hundred pupils annually.

Then, what better can Russell county do than send us her daughters? What better the upper part of Macon! What better can Tallapoosa, Benton, Cherokee, Randolph, or Talladega?

If we are faithful to our trust there will, with the help, the partial help of the Alabama Conference and the blessings of Providence, be ample material for us. All we want is just a little of encouragement, and our own people stirred up to this vital interest. I thank God and take courage. There is some movement in this direction; the dry bones begin to rattle. In a late letter from my dear old college friend, Professor S—— of Emory College, Georgia, he asks: "What all this stir about the education of our daughters is to come to?"

I am proud that Eastern Alabama is moving; and I, with all due modesty, claim that Oak Bowery was the first in this harvest-field. Ours was the first movement, and if we go down, let it be inscribed on our monument we fell "martyr to this glorious cause," the right education of the daughters of our Church.

Brother Sasnett thinks it is half alarming that the Church is educating two or three young ladies to one man. Let it be so. A family may get along with a plain, hardy, industrious, uneducated man, to push its fortunes, provided the mother at home is well, thoroughly, piously educated.

Another consideration: the wife oftener elevates and ennobles the husband, than the husband the wife. If either must be advanced more rapidly than the other in social power, let it by all means be the wife; virtue has more to gain by it. Educate this generation of girls and it requires no prophet to foretell that the next generation of boys will be educated. Hundreds of millions have been expended in the past history of our own Anglo-Saxon race on the education of man, while thousands, only, have been expended on the education of woman. What has been the result? Society has moved with an unbalanced burthen on its shoulders. The progress has been tardy and painful; one wheel of the wagon has been to heavy for the other. Let things now be equalized; this is the prevailing sentiment.

What has all this do with the Oak Bowery Female College? Simply this: It shows that the present phase of society reveals an element of more enlarged and progressive interest in the matter of female education, and that as this development goes forward, Chambers county, itself, ought to support a female college—has the requisite number of pupils—I mean the requisite number of Methodist girls—children of Methodist parents—who must prove false alike to the best interests of their Church, their country, and their children, or give these girls collegiate opportunities.

But what of pecuniary resources? We have money enough to enlarge our houses, supply apparatus—pianos, library, etc.—enough to spare our girls from hard labor that they may be educated, and when it is necessary to board them do so; enough to buy books and stationery, and to pay tuition fees.

Have we an endowment? None, and want none. It is "an obsolete idea"—belongs to dark ages; it is no more necessary to the cause of American educational success and progress, than it is to the success of American agriculture. If half the zeal and capital, which have been expended in vain attempt to endow literary institutions in our state of society, had been expended in the right direction, we should have been a century in advance of our present position. Give us a constituency that shall understand the nature and necessity of education, as a means of happiness and usefulness, and the work is done. Adapt your education to the right ends, and carry it out to the masses; willing hearts and hard hands will take hold of it: make it up in packages to suit the strength of individual wants, and it will soon be borne on broad shoulders, by active steps, to the mountain tops, where your lumbering old fogy wagons can never be driven. All we want is a field to work in. If we cannot sustain ourselves, let us perish, as we shall deserve to do.

What endowment had Methodism when she first unfurled the banner of the Cross on the American Continent? What endowment had liberty when she first waked the almost unbroken stillness of these solitudes with her sublime "Declaration of American Independence?" Endowments were the offspring of an age of despotism, of exclusiveness, of darkness, of impotency. They are a part of the machinery by which kings and priests, in the Old World, managed to delude, to degrade, to brutalize the masses for successive centuries. Education became the property of Princes. Mr. Wesley said a young man might learn four times as much in one year, of useful knowledge, as he could acquire in several years, perhaps by a whole course in Oxford. He was an conservative, no fogy, no exclusive. If he were now living, and you should put him on one of your visiting committees, he would report. It seems to me the whole, dark, cavernous empire of conservatism, trembles at the very thought of his apparition.

Another element of our resources, is a habit of patient endurance. We "bide our time"—we know ourselves—hope one of these days to have ourselves understood. Our objects are right—our motives right; we war on nobody—feel kindly disposed to all our neighbors. We expect to work—we want to work—'tis our destiny and glory. We hope to succeed—we expect to succeed. Why should we not succeed? We laid the foundation of our enterprise broad and deep; it may not go up as rapidly as Washington's monument, but go up it will. Our hands are weak, but our faith strong. The coral bed grows despite the currents of the sea. We take the lesson; slowly, painfully it may be, but we shall make progress. The Oak Bowery Female College will yet lift herself from the bed of the ocean, and spread far and wide, tossing the verdant beauties of her island fertility high above the tide, a guiding point, a rendezvous, a grace and a glory to the whole continent of Southern Methodism.

In this work we have a will—guided, we humbly trust, by the word of God—sanctified by His Spirit—strengthened by the hopes of the Gospel.

Such are our resources, human and divine. They are not likely to fail. Humbly, resolutely, prayerfully, we commit ourselves to their promise, and to the prayers of our Zion, content to "deserve" success and despising the—

"Momentary buzz of vain renown."

Respectfully, WM. F. SASNETT.

SUNDAY WORK.—At the meeting of the stockholders of the South Carolina Railroad, recently, the presentation of a memorial from the South Carolina Conference, on the subject of running freight trains on Sunday, led to a protracted and interesting discussion. After which the following resolutions were adopted; the first with no dissenting voice, and the second with only two or three in opposition:

Resolved, That it is expedient that one day in seven should be a day of rest from labor and from business pursuits.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that all Sunday labor on the South Carolina Railroad and its branches should be discontinued, except as regards the carrying of the public mail and other cases of emergency, and that the directors be requested to effect this desirable end as far and as soon as practicable. [S. C. Advocate.

There is a voice of warning in the following to which the young, especially, should give earnest heed. "But one false step, one wrong habit, one corrupt companion, one loose principle, may wreck all your prospects, and all the hopes of those who love you."

A DONATION DIRECTED TO A GOOD CAUSE.

* * * *

"Dear Sir: I am desirous to contribute to God's service something of the treasure he has committed to my charge, and not being in a position to become acquainted with many objects of real charity, I beg of you to bestow the enclosed twenty dollars on poor, and needy, and worthy disciples of Christ, if any such are known to you: if not, please apply it to some good cause that may be blessed and sanctified by the Head of the Church."

The above is a copy of a note (anonymous) we have received the past week enclosing a twenty dollar bank bill. The poor we have always with us and everywhere. There are never wanting poor, and needy, and worthy disciples. But we use the privilege, given us by this unknown Zacheus, to direct his donation elsewhere. There is an object dependant on Christian benevolence, which is just at this time very much in need—suffering; and perhaps as its claims are not so well known and sympathized with, as some other objects, it may not stand so fair a chance of being helped: it is truly "a good cause" that may be, and is, and has been blessed, and sanctified by the Great Head of the Church, for good both to the souls and bodies of men. We mean the publishing and stereotyping of a fine collection of Sunday School Books, now compiled and prepared for the press by the Book Editor of the M. E. Church, South. Dr. Summers calls for donations of $20, $30, $50, $75, and $100, to stereotype such books as Wesleyan Catechisms; A New Sunday School Hymn Book; A Question Book on Genesis; Heart Blossoms and Bible Gleanings, by Mrs. Cross; A Life of Wesley, for Children, and many other suitable books.

Our Church is lamentably deficient in a Sabbath School Literature. We have just none at all—the Visitor excepted. And this at a time when all are feeling and confessing the importance and power of Sabbath Schools. We do not enter a Sabbath School Room without being struck with the want—of what? teachers—pupils?—No: but of books, suitable books. We cannot use, wholesale, the books of the American Sunday School Union. Many of them teach doctrine we do not believe in. The Sunday School Library of the M. E. Church, North, is objectionable in many of its volumes, not on account of doctrines, but allusions to our domestic institutions that are not worth being paid for. In the Pittsburg Sabbath School we learn that Uncle Tom's Cabin has been introduced! And out of this mass, some good, some bad, and all suspicious, until searched through, purged and endorsed by a competent editor, we are at present making up our Sunday School Libraries. Sometimes even going outside and introducing miscellaneous books, according to the taste and judgment of the teachers. And teachers are not always competent to this task of selection. Neither have they the time for the critical examination requisite; nor the means of remedy. They must often lose a whole volume that is excellent, but for an objectionable paragraph or two. Moreover, supposing these selections for our Sunday School Libraries safe, and judicious, and sufficiently various—(a thing not to be expected as at present selected) then there would be a sad lack of that uniformity and connectionalism that should obtain in these nurseries of our Church.

A little over two years ago occurred, in our knowledge, a case in point. A large Sabbath School had raised over three hundred dollars to buy them a library. The money was entrusted to the best hands that could be selected for the purchase. A pile or heap of books was purchased—we will not call it a Sunday School Library—a heterogeneous mass of tales, travels, and doctrines: much of it not fit to entertain, much less to educate and mould religious youth. One gentleman took away his son from the Sabbath School, and talked about prosecuting the superintendent. For what? Why John, his son, had brought home a reading book from the Sunday School and, as was the father's custom, he read it. Lo! it was one of Chambers' Series; among other things and persons, Miss Martineau freely figured in its pages. Here were her letters on Southern Slavery, presenting in its most insulting form the worst abuse our enemies have ever published. The school teachers were not a little astonished when John brought back his book with the leaves turned down by his father, and the places marked. They had never read the book. They had dealt out that volume, as they had others, not knowing what was the particular nature of the article. This is not a solitary case. Under the circumstances it must be, and is so, that our Sabbath School Libraries are in a bad fix. We need, and pressingly need, volumes of suitable size and on suitable subjects, every word of which has been carefully read over and been endorsed by an editor appointed by the M. E. Church, South, for that purpose. Such volumes we have now, both original and compiled, ready for the press. The Editor has been busy, and done his part of the work. But these volumes must go through the press, and be put in shape, to supply our destitute Sabbath Schools. Money is needed. The Book Agent is waiting for it. The Conferences have resolved well, and promised to raise money for this object and send it on. We hope each pastor will attend to it immediately. And if our anonymous friend, who sends $20, has any more that he is at a loss to dispose of, we should like to have the responsibility of directing it for him to this "good cause" till its wants are met.

RELIGIOUS BOOKS FOR TEXAS.

Daniel Ayres, Esq., of Galveston, Texas, passed through our city, Thursday last, returning from the North, where he has been to make arrangements for an unofficial Book Depository in Texas. Our Texas friends will be pleased to learn this, and we congratulate them.

Mr. Ayres informs us he will offer for sale at Galveston all the Books of the Methodist Catalogues, North and South. Terms, cash. Prices the same as those charged at New York, Louisville, Charleston, or Richmond, with the addition of freight and insurance to Galveston.

We take Mr. Ayres to be the very man for this business, and the facilities offered for circulating our Church publications will doubtless be readily and extensively appreciated and used by those for whom they were intended.

NO PRIDE IN HEAVEN.

None, because the proud cannot enter there. The proud were once cast down from it, into hell. Every one that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord. How say some that a certain degree of pride is allowable, proper even? They either call some allowable thing by a wrong name, or else they say wrong. If some degree of pride, then, some degree of covetousness, hatred, envy is allowable, proper even! But that would not bear a statement.

Often and strongly do the Scriptures insist on humility, lowliness of mind, meekness, and commend those of this temper. Much of the providence that rules our lives aims at the promotion of it. Those possessing it are in the way of true exaltation. The proud nobleman who was seeking a religion "fit for a gentleman" may have found it; many have found it and rest complacently therein. The religion that is fit for a sinner, that can exalt a worm into a saint, and a saint to God, lies in quite another direction.

The Family Journal tells a story of the Duchess of Buckingham, noted for her inordinate pride. Alas! what slight cause had she to be troubled, and yet she was much troubled during her last sickness, for she would be obliged to mingle in the society of those in heaven whom she tauntingly termed "the common people." She at length sent for a clergyman, to whom she proposed the question, "whether in heaven some respect would not be had for a woman of such birth and breeding as herself!" When the Rev. gentleman informed her that with God there was no respect of persons, that he was equally the father of the rich and the poor, for they were all the work of his hands, she said with a heavy sigh: "Well, if it be so, this heaven must be, after all, a strange sort of a place!"

CITY CORRESPONDENCE.

Top of St. Patrick's.

"Far from the top of the rocks I see Him, and from the hills I behold Him."

This is a dizzy height—one hundred and eighty feet above the human tide whose currents and counter currents are swooping through the streets and alleys. Here we are above confusion. The rattle of carriages and drays, the hum of thousands of voices, and the bedlamic din of all noises, and all sounds, is nearly hushed. It reaches us only in the subdued murmur of a distant ocean. Within our look not less than one hundred and fifty thousand souls live and move. Far beneath us, in the dusty and thronged streets, we see them hurrying here and there, but we neither hear their tread, nor come in contact with their haste.

The chartered limits of New Orleans are but a small part of the prospect. The city seems to be just beneath you; if you look abroad, you look beyond it. An old resident could identify all the streets, and call them by name. The prominent buildings appear to have gathered at your feet, within a stone's throw, apparently. The Odd Fellows' Hall, that magnificent monument of liberal benevolence, and artistic taste, is so near by you might think of Sam Patch, and leap upon its dome if it were not roofed with glass, and if it were not so far below. I would suggest, that as this dome is the chamber of the fraternity's highest secrets, they have need of sky-curtains as well as sky-lights. The City Hall, from this point, appears to be about half its real dimensions, but it presents a handsome aspect with its white marble front and stately colums. The colonade of the St. Charles Hotel shows to the greatest advantage, and so of the few really fine buildings which ornament various localities. The Churches, those that have steeples, can all be seen without exception. Those that have no steeples are lost and confounded with the brick and mortar mass. Is there not reason in steeples? By them these sacred edifices stand aloof from all secular masonry. They confess the faith and preach the Gospel silently; tell the stranger where to find a sanctuary, who else might inquire for one in vain. Surely, in a large city, your devotional country friends need way-marks and guide posts. The theatres and opera houses hang out their flags; so do the exchanges; and many, very many, are deluded into them, who, if they knew where to go, would swell the number of your congregations. The Churches, then, should have steeples, not simply to show which way the the wind blows, but to guide and invite to the mercy seat. And most of them have. They rise up, all about us, on every hand glittering in the light, and to the street gazer piercing the heavens; but to us, only trying to do so. One versed in steeple-ology might describe them entertainingly; for there is a science here, and philosophy too.

Drawing near the parapet, over which we look with great caution, the well known Church of Dr. Scott meets our view. This is more like the New England than is usual here in the South. It is of no barbarian order of architecture, but plain, spacious, and solid. The steeple shows Northern raising; just such as I have seen lifting its spire amidst the picturesque beauties of a New York village. There is policy and good in such a style. The youthful adventurer, from the land of the Puritans, will shed a tear when he sees it, and the overflowing associations of home, and home prayers, will constrain him to come within the sanctified influence of its pulpit and altar. A careless observer would not fail to remark three distinct species; the architectural names he might be ignorant of, but the denomination he would recognize. The Papal host, more numerous than all the rest, have that ordinary mark of the beast—the Gothic hand with various degrees of distinctness and and purity. The Protestant forces are entirely dissimilar in structure, blending in some instances every other order of architecture, save that appropriated by the Papists. Besides these, there are several which appear to be a cross of both. They look neither decidedly Roman nor Protestant. They seem to blend them both in one, the former usually predominating, sometimes so much so as to absorb and hide the latter. This idiosyncracy in architecture has a parallel and explanation in theology. This mongrel breed of steeples defines the position of the High Church. It has a few dying Protestant affinities, but stronger sympathies for Rome. These steeples are the embodiments of Puseyism, of apostolic succession, and the Church nonsense. Very slight alterations would make both steeples and doctrines harmonize with the mortar and mortality of St. Peter.

Crescent City is rather fanciful. We have a perfect view of the river for miles, and we look in vain for the moon-shaped Levee. The horns are certainly gone—perhaps washed away, or filled up. The Mississippi describes a channel nearly in the shape of the letter S, coming in view above Carrollton, and disappearing below the United States Barracks, and measuring in all a distance of more than fifteen miles. The city proper, with its suburban attachments, occupies about half of this space—the middle of the S.

It is only here that we have a complete view of the harbor. The centre is reserved for steamboats, and the wings are occupied by the shipping. This arrangement gives effect to the scene. The long line of masts bristle along the bank, on either hand, like files of mammoth sodiers carrying arms with fixed bayonets, and their flaunting colors remind you of an army with banners. Between these imposing flanks the thousands of steamers, which bear the commerce of the West, find wharfage. Some are arriving and others departing. The whole extent presents a busy scene. Looking just across the point, where the town of Algiers is situated, we may see a considerable fleet of gallant ships, moving majestically up against the current, with sails all furled and lashed tight, as if in expectation of a storm. These are not spectators, and the spirits of the waves are not yoked to those keels. As they near us, the secret is revealed. A little iron-nerved tow is in their midst, which seems, for aught we can see besides, to bring them along by dint of coughing. Huge lungs those tow-boats have, for we hear their hoarse respirations even here. There is one creeping cozily along-side yonder unbroken bulwark of broad sides. If one were to lurch, in the least, she would be as easily swamped as a nut-shell in a gale. Now, her strong cables and hawsers grapple a staunch three-master, and now her prize swings lazily out into the stream, and with her hand of steel and heart of fire, she leads the proud old copper-bottom sea-ward, which but for her would never ride the billows again. Three steam-ferries ply from different points, between this and the opposite side, and sail-boats and skiffs, innumerable, manned with oyster-men and fishermen, make up the picture.

And, now, about-face! Where are the points of compass! Exactly the reverse of of our geographical instinct. The main course of the river, within the compass of this description, is nearly North; it should be South, so you think, or did think when a school-boy, but it is not. The river, then, as nearly as we can come at the matter, bounds the city on the East, that is where we look for sun-rise. The swamp lies in the rear to the West and North. In this direction the view is wholly different. A low, dismal woods, hung with mossy festoons, defines the improvements of the city in this quarter. Some of the streets have penetrated nearly through to the Lake, but most of them terminate in less than two miles from the Levee where they begin.

Directly in the rear of the position we occupy is the town end of the Shell Road, of much celebrity at home and abroad, and the Canal, which accompanies it all the way to Lake Pontchartrain, distant about six miles. The eye can follow them from the toll-gate to the Firemen's Cemetery, mid-way the distance, and then on almost to the Lake House and Pontchartrain wharf. They look like silver lines drawn out, here and there lost in the swamp, and then appearing again. Beyond, and above all, the blue waves of the Lake are seen filling a narrow space between the tree tops and the horizon, and belting the whole with a dark cerulean zone of wild and transcendant beauty.

Such is a bird's-eye view of the city. Many points of interest we have purposely left unnoticed, which are rich in historical associations. In this suggestive place much might be written to clothe this scanty outline with additional attractions. These will occupy your attention, and claim your courtesy hereafter. This is, as we have thought, a desirable preparation for those who are strangers to New Orleans, but who are acquaintances of this Advocate, and of your quondam rustic correspondent.

Weather and Roads—Great Suffering—How a P. E. in California Travels his District—Taken for a Gambler—False Alarm—A Strange Ferryman—A Scientific Ferry—Prayers in the Family—Reflection.

Sonora, January 27, 1853.

Dear Brother McTyeire:

When I bid you adieu in the mountains, in the midst of snow and ice, rain and mud, it was with a very imperfect conception of the duration and extent of the sufferings in California then alluded to. For two months it rained almost incessantly. It seemed, at times, that the fountains of the great deep were broken up. The clouds lowered, and steadily poured their thunderless contents upon us. From the countless peaks of surrounding mountains it accumulated, and came roaring and leaping over crags and cliffs, until the vallies and plains beneath were submerged. Branches and slues became rivers. On the larger streams bridges were washed away, ferries torn loose, fences, and even houses swept off, gardens desolated, and stock drowned. The loss of property in stock, alone, is almost incredible.

Stockton, Sacramento, Marysville, and Nassa, were under water for a time, and if not under, at least deeply in the mud ever since. The people of Sacramento have perhaps been the greatest sufferers of any of the cities, but they not only survive the calamities of fire and flood, which followed each other in rapid succession, but retain that energy characteristic of Californians. To meet present emergencies they have temporarily moved out, about six miles, to a high point of land on the American river, now obtaining some notoriety under the very euphonous soubriquet of "Hoboken," where they are doing a brisk business.

In San Francisco there has been considerable destitution and suffering among the newly arrived;—landing without means, and unable to get employment. But those in the interior, and mining regions, remote from navigation have been the greatest sufferers. Many of these were just in the country, and had not the means to supply themselves with provisions before the severe weather set in. Merchants, and others who had the means, were prevented from doing so by a vainly entertained hope that breadstuffs would soon be cheaper. But they were not only mistaken as to the fall in the price of provisions—the snow became so deep, the roads so bad, the streams so swollen, bridges and fences gone, that provisions could not reach them even on pack mules.

As an instance of the rate of travel, when the roads are good, the stage usually runs from Stockton to Sonora in ten hours, but for weeks during this weather it required three days to carry the mail between the same places on horse-back. Hence the condition of hundreds was deplorable in the extreme. In places flour sold for one dollar per pound, in others for any price the owner might ask; and in others still, it could not be had for love or money. A very melancholy occurrence is related of two men who attempted to relieve their suffering friends, in the Northern mines, by packing flour to them on their backs, but both perished in the cold, and when found had each a sack of flour, fifty pounds, lashed across the shoulders.

It is stated that the high price of provisions, especially flour, arises not from the scarcity of the articls, but from a combination of moneyed speculators, whose avarice has prompted them to unite and control the market, and are thus filling their own coffers by wringing tears from the eyes, and anguish from the hearts, of the widow and orphan, and destitute of the land. If so, no virtuous man will envy them their ill-gotten gains. But enough of this gloomy picture, especially since the rains have ceased, the clouds dispersed, and the sun again shines with all his wonted brightness, imparting life and cheerfulness to all around. Lift up your eyes and look forth upon the thousand hills, scattered all around and thickly covered with a beautiful carpet of green oats, exhibiting all the freshness and beauty of spring itself, and you will conclude that it is April instead of January.

I hope the past may be profitable to all in future; and, yet, that this will be the case, to the extent that might be reasonably expected, is doubtful. Indeed, experience seems to be really of less value here than in other places, so far as my own observation extends—less assurance of hitting the mark by adhering to the old adage: "judge the future by the past," especially in business matters. That there will be no rain in the summer we are confident: that there will be rain in the winter is equally certain, but whether there will be a flood, or only the gentle showers of spring, the future alone will show—the past season being no criterion by which to be governed.

But, Mr. Editor, when I last wrote you, I was in Sonora. Do you feel at all curious to know how I got away from there! The account will be more amusing than edifying, but may give some of your readers an idea of our modes:

The time for the Quarterly meeting was rainy; but few in attendance. Tuesday morning, 21st December, came with increasing gloom—snowing rapidly; stages all stopped—no conjecturing when they would run again. Said I, to myself, the distance from here to Stockton is seventy miles when the weather and roads are good, but, now, nearly a hundred! But to set down and wish for sunshine, dry roads, and stage coaches, is unprofitable, or, as Californians say, "will not pay." So, after depositing my saddle-bags at the "Express," to be sent down, I bid Brother M. adieu, took my cloak and umbrella, and set out on foot, without however any definite calculation as to how far I would travel in that way—hoping, meanwhile, that I should overtake, or be overtaken, by a stage that would convey me on. A short walk brought me to Woods's Creek. Of a miner, at work close by, I made some inquiry as to the best method of crossing, who informed me that he had ferried several over that day. A bargain was soon made for my transportation at twenty-five cents. I mounted his back, and he walked slowly into the stream. The current was strong, and rushed over the rocks with force; but for the constant and serious apprehension of being precipitated over his head, and on my own, into the stream, I should make no particular objection to that mode of crossing streams. At any rate, I was safely landed and payed my ferrage without reluctance. The road crosses the same stream seven times in a distance of six miles, but by continuing around the mountain slopes I avoided crossing any more. Twelve miles brought me to Oak Springs, where I had spent a night and a day on a former round, and was kindly entertained. The hospitable proprietor urged me to remain over night, but after a rest of an hour I continued my journey six miles further, rain, instead of snow, falling very heavily, and stopped for the night at Green Springs. Supper over and dry, a comfortable bed was appreciated. I had scarcely fallen asleep, when the whole house was thrown into excitement by an alarm of a grizzily bear—that fearful monster of the mountains. Such a mustering of guns, pistols, swords, knives, and other implements of warfare! But it was a false alarm.

Next morning the ground was white with snow. At an early hour I was on the road: but very soon another stream to cross, and not even a miner near to be employed as ferryman; there was only one alternative. Only a few miles further and another, wider and deeper than any hitherto encountered, was before me, with the same facilities for crossing as at the last. Another, and yet another, is to be passed in the same way. Rather wet this!

About noon I reached Night's Ferry, on the Stanislaus river, and for the first time saw the current of a river made to carry the boat, however heavily ladened, back and forth across the stream. The river was much swollen, and the impetuosity of the current almost incredible. One large cable rope crosses the river, to this the boat is secured by a smaller cord, at each end, working on pulleys to prevent friction. When crossing the cord at the bow of the boat is shortened, while that at the opposite end is lengthened, thus bringing the current obliquely against the side of the boat; on the principle of the parallelogram of forces, it is impelled forward with sufficient rapidity.

Here I met the stage going up, three days from Stockton, and yet twenty-nine miles from Sonora. I learned from the driver that if the stage from Sonora reached there that night, they would start to Stockton next morning, but when they would get there he did not pretend to know. These were the best assurances he could give me, so I would continue on foot a little further.

At the "Mountain Brew" I paid a man fifty cents to ride behind him, on his horse, across the slue. But where is the use of paying to cross one stream, when you have to wade a half dozen others, just as formidable, in going as many miles? That night I spent at the Wisconsin House.

The following day was one of the most disagreeable, cold and stormy, that I ever experienced. As to personal comfort there was but little difference between wading, swimming, or standing still in the mud under the pelting of the merciless storm. I had walked some six miles, and was approaching an inn, called the Farm Cottage, when the storm increased in severity, and caused me to seek shelter. Here an amusing interview occurred, but not complimentary to my personal appearance. There were two persons in the room when I entered—a traveler on his way up just stopped, and was taking a drink, and the bar-keeper in his place preparing the grog. I deposited my cloak in a convenient place, and seated myself by the stove. Soon the traveler approached the fire, and very courteously interrogated me as to my point of destination, and method of traveling. When I told him I was on foot, the bar-keeper heard it. Stopping short, and looking at me, he exclaimed, rather vehemently, "You're a gambler!" I smiled. He repeated, with an oath, "You're a gambler; I'll bet fifty dollars you're a gambler!" "Sir," said I very seriously, "I am a Methodist preacher." "You're not!" said he, "I can preach a better sermon than you can, and advance better doctrine." "That may all be true, sir, but I am a preacher, nevertheless, and no gambler." Finally, being convinced that I was a preacher, he bid me welcome, urging me, especially, to spend the night with him, telling me that he had been religiously trained, had a pious father and relatives in Georgia. This joke was much enjoyed by some of my brethren, especially as they had predicted, on my way up, I would be taken for a gambler.

After traveling seventeen miles, with the usual routine of wading, and ferrying in boats, ox wagons, and on mules, I put up at the Fourteen Mile House, and glad enough was I to reach it—I was acquainted, and at home. One of the proprietors, Mr. Ferguson, is a member of Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and though a hotel keeper in California, since 1849, has not forgotten his former professions to religion, nor its claims upon him. Here met two ladies, with children, who had just landed and joined their husbands. One of them assured me that by Divine aid she intended to live a Methodist here, as she had for many years done in Missouri. These, with many boarders, at a suitable hour, all assembled around the fire-side, while we read the word of God, and invoked the blessings of Heaven.

The next day was Christmas Eve, and I congratulated myself on being favored with a ride from thence to Stockton, fourteen miles in an ox wagon. "All things hang upon comparison."

I found Stockton, but much deeper in the mud than I had before seen it. Here I will close my travels for the present. I feared sickness from this trip, but never enjoyed better health than during, and since that time.

Life, or happiness, consist not in the abundance of our possessions. Often have I waded deeper sluces, climbed higher mountains, and been submerged in thicker gloom, while in an easy chair and comfortable study, with a fine church, tall steeple, well arranged pews, and carpeted aisles and pulpit. Yours,

W. R. Gober.

CALIFORNIA EXCHANGES.

The Observer, of the 26th January, was received by last mail. It announces the arrival at San Francisco, on the 19th ult., of Bishop Ames, who goes to attend the California and Oregon Conferences. Bishop A., on the day of his arrival, issued circulars appointing the 3d February for organizing the Conference of the M. E. Church, North. About forty preachers are expected to be in attendance.

The Observer brings a traffic to view which it justly stigmatizes as foul and abominable:

"It is true our State Constitution excludes the institution of American slavery, and the Legislature has refused to admit foreigners, who may be brought hither under contruct; in other words, refused to recognise and enforce such contracts; and the cry is lusty against all traffic in the article of human flesh; and, yet, in our great commercial mart; not only are these chattels bought and sold, but bought and sold for the sole and abominables purpose of prostitution.

"Who could believe that ship loads of women—young women—could be imported to an American city, and sold out at remunerating prices for so foul a purpose! We can scarcely think or write of this subject without utter disgust and loathing, for everything in connection with it. Can it be that a practice so offensive to God, and disgusting to every pure minded man, will be suffered to continue in our very midst! What the consequences must be on society, and every thing that is lovely and good, requires no prophet to foretell."

A correspondent of the California Christian Advocate congratulates the Methodists and public that the Book Committee have secured the services of C. H. Pierce, late of Boston, as Book Agent in San Francisco. He says:

"Our share in the business of supply is responsible, and ought to be a very large one. It calls for an agent of capacity and experience beyond the common style of endowments. Mr. Pierce, if I have not mistaken his character, fills the measure. I seem to see for him, in his connection with the Book Depository, a career of successful and highly useful enterprise.

"I notice, with pleasure, that the Agent intends to keep a full stock of the books demanded by the times. Thus miscellaneous orders can be filled at the Depository on terms which, I feel quite sure, will make it for the interest of the public to patronize that establishment."

"A lick forward" this for our Northern brethren. The arrival of the Bishop was matter for real joy. He was to spend the next Sabbath in Santa Clara and San Jose. Of his farther movements the Advocate says: "The Bishop will sail for Oregon soon after the Conference. He will administer the affairs of that Conference, and then return to spend a few weeks more in California before returning to the Atlantic States."

Now, if plain Mr. Ames, as he was only a year ago, had gone out into California, would it have made such a sensation, collected such crowds, inspired such hope, and renewed such energy among preachers and people? It is the Bishop that does it. Strange that the Church does not extend her Episcopal policy, and have Bishops to go here and there over its territory, organizing and encouraging, and putting in order the Churches—tarrying among the people, learning the physical and moral geography of the country, and taking to the hustings of gospel propagandism at protracted and camp-meetings. Our Bishops are too scarce for the great good uses they subserve.

What to do, and how to do it.—The remark of Rev. John Newton, below, deserves to be written on the tablet of every heart: "I see in this world," he observes, "two heaps—one of human happiness, and one of misery; now, if I can take but the smallest bit from the second heap, and add to the first, I carry a point. If, as I go home, a child has dropped a half-penny, and if, by giving it another, I can wipe away its tears, I feel that I have done something. I should be glad, indeed, to do great things, but I will not neglect such little ones as this." These little things are what we all can do, and we should encourage ourselves with the one thought, that—

"The drying up a single tear, hath more
Of honest fame than sons of gore."

An Ecclesiastical Reform League has been formed in the English Church, to be composed of influential clergymen and laymen, for the purpose of effecting a reform in the church. It is proposed to abolish deans, chapters, etc., church rates, marriage and baptismal fees, Easter offerings, sinecure offices, sale of livings, duplicate livings, absenteeism of clergy, attendance of bishops on the House of Lords, etc. It is further proposed that the affairs of the church shall be managed entirely by a board of laymen appointed by the government; that the kingdom be divided into one hundred dioceses, each consisting of four districts, presided over by an archdeacon as assistant bishop, to have annual diocesan conventions, as in the United States, and the salaries of the high prelates to be greatly reduced.

Some people fancy that royal children live on "pound cake," and have the air of heaven distilled in the nursery while playing on beds of gold made soft like feathers. The following is given by a London paper as the routine of their duties in England. It were well if some untitled children were kept so much and so well employed: Rise early, breakfast at eight, and dine at two. First hour after breakfast, the classics; next, the modern grammatical instruction, being also carefully given; next, military exercises for the boys; then music and dancing; then the riding-school; music and drawing for the girls; then the carpenter's shop, and, occasionally, the laboratory; then shooting in the royal gardens, then supper, then prayers, and then to bed. Such are the daily occupations of these young people.

A PILGRIM AT REST.

The following historical obituary is republished, by request, from the Natchez Courier:

Departed this life, on the 9th of December, in the town of Washington, Adams county, Mississippi, Lavinia Lewis, widow of the late Robert Ford, of this county.

The deceased was born of respectable parentage in the State of Connecticut, in the year 1775, seized with the adventurous enterprise of his countrymen, Mr. Lewis her father, emigrated to what was then called West Floridu, and located near the spot where the town of Grand Gulf now stands. He no doubt formed one of the colony brought here by Gen. Lyman, who had received a large grant of land from the British Government for services rendered in the old French war. The family of Mr. L. consisted of several children, the eldest of which, a son, had just reached maturity. The settlement was made in a dense cane brake, and after toiling for a few months the sickly season came on, and both of the parents, within a short time of each other were removed by death. The forlorn children, the subject of this notice being the fourth, and then about thirteen years old, came to the resolution to seek some more inhabited region. They embarked, probably on a flatboat, which even then was not uncommon on the Mississippi river, and went to Iberville, or Bayou Manchack, the lowest point on the river of the British possessions. This was a town of some importance in those times, it being the commercial depot of the English trade with West Florida. It was then approached, not by the mouth of the Mississippi, but through Lake Borgne and Pontchartrain. Here the children attempted to keep together, finding some employment which promised a living. But in a short time the eldest brother, now the protector of the family, was drowned in the Mississippi. This broke the family up, and they found a refuge in that pity, which the God of the orphan has planted in every human breast. These children had bequeathed to them an inestimable legacy, not in lands or money, but in the pious example of their parents, the incipient moral and religious principles inculcated in them, and the prayers and blessing of a dying mother. Strange to say, in a country affording almost no means of education, without wealth or friends, all the survivors of the family became among the most respectable and cultivated in the community in which they lived. Seth, then a little boy of ten years old, was afterwards the late Supreme Judge of the Mississippi Territory, and long an ornament to the Judiciary of Louisiana, and one of the most eminent Christians of any age or country. One of the sisters was married to Major Guion, the first military commander of this State. His urbanity of manners, highly cultivated mind, and Christian character, is well remembered by all the older inhabitants of Adams county, though she has been many years dead. She was the mother of Gov. John I. Guion of Mississippi, and of Hon. George S. Guion, of Louisiana.

The subject of this notice was married late in life, and was only the foster-mother of one for whom she felt a mother's affection, and had the tenderest filial regard in return. From her youth she loved and read the Bible, and though reared in a Roman Catholic community, she was an unswerving Protestant. Her creed she made from that blessed volume, and when the early Methodist Missionaries visited this country she found them preached the very doctrins she had already embraced. She early attached herself to this branch of the Church, of which she continued an unswerving member, and bright ornament to the day of her death. Her husband was a member of the Baptist Church, but they gave as fine an illustration of the possibility of unity of feeling, with diversity of opinion, as we ever remember to have seen. For about seven years befors her death she was a cripple, not able to walk one step, from an injury received by a fall. In this condition, though of a large frame and quite corpulent, she seldom failed to be at the house of God on every pleasant Sabbath when she was in health. What a reproof to the lukewarm! Her mind was highly cultivated, and she was gifted above many in conversational powers. Her knowledge of history was peculiarly fine, and to the last of life she kept up with the literature of the day—read almost all good books, and could give an sound a judgment on their merits, as any one of my acquaintance. She had none of the croaking of old age, was generally cheerful, and remarkably happy in religion. Several times I have visited her when apparently on the verge of the grave, and her chamber seemed like the ante-chamber of heaven. On one of these occasions I administered the Lord's Supper to her, and two worlds seemed to come as near together as they are wont to do in these low grounds of sorrow. Her joy seemed to be full. Her desire was more ardent to depart and be with Christ; yet she was willing to remain. She was ninety years old the 22d of October before her death. Her conscious illness was very short, but she remained in a state of insensibility for several days before her death, breathing as sweetly as a sleeping infant, and without the slightest distortion of countenance, till she breathed her soul into the hands of a faithful and gracious Creator. Her pilgrimage was long, but her rest is all the sweeter. How joyful the greeting which has taken place with the sainted Judge Lewis, Mrs. Guion, and our sainted Friend. May we be permitted to join that goodly company of the redeemed. Ames.

Magnolia Springs, Jan 18, 1853.

Archbishop Hughes having intimated in his late letter to the Freeman's Journal that the Roman Catholic Church is not hostile to the circulation of the Scriptures, Anson G. Phelps, Esq., of New York, comes out in a card offering to pay for the printing of as many copies as the Roman Catholic, or any other version, as the Archbishop may choose to circulate.

Eighteen French Catholic missionaries have taken their departure within six months, for different points of the globe, as follows: seven for China, two for Cochin China, one for Thibet, four for Pondicherry, two for Tonquin, one for Siam, and one for Meysour.

An honorary testimonial is about to be presented by the New York merchants, to Lieut. Maury, of Washington, for his eminent services in the cause of nautical science. Few men in any age or country have achieved, as a private citizen, greater results in the same department of knowledge.

A pew was recently sold at auction in Franklin Street Church, Boston, and was bid off by a woman at $40. This woman has for many years been known as an apple seller on Long Wharf.

There are 400,000 Indians West of the Mississippi.

General Intelligence.

We are indebted to Mr. H. Vanderlinden for the following report of the Charity Hospital for the month of February: Admissions, 928; discharged, 805; deaths, 97. Weekly report for the week ending yesterday—Admissions, 208; discharges, 221; deaths, 20; remaining, 917.

CHARITY HOSPITAL.—The report of this institution for the week ending Saturday, is as follows: Admissions, 225; discharges, 207; deaths, 10.

FIREMEN'S CELEBRATION.—The sixteenth anniversary of the New Orleans Fire Department was celebrated yesterday with fitting ceremonials. The day was clear and cool, and was rendered only slightly disagreeable by the dust that was at times stirred up and whirled about by the wind. Notwithstanding the fact that the members of the department, during the last forty hours, had been engaged in active conflict with the devouring element, battling with and subduing the most destructive conflagration that had ever held our city in its consuming embrace, and in spite of the fatigue consequent upon such continued exertion, they brushed off the cinders of the fiery conflict, and came out in full force in their holiday attire, as ready to take part in the festival celebration as they were efficient in performing their duty in the perilous hour. Though worn in body, and blackened by the showering cinders in the previous day's encounter, their engines tarnished by the smoke of burning timbers, they made their appearance rejuvenated and refreshed, with burnished machinery, flashing back the sunlight, with steps elastic, and with decorations and uniforms as orderly and spotless as was fitting this notable occasion.

Between nine and ten o'clock the several companies could be seen emerging from different quarters of the city, dressed in their brilliant uniforms, bearing banners, preceded by bands of music, while the different lines were brought up by the brightly burnished engines, tastefully decorated with garlands—all marching to the gathering point, Canal street.

Shortly after 10 o'clock all the different companies had assembled, and Canal street made one of the most busy and animated sights witnessed for many a day. On both its sides, from St. Charles street extending East and West in long lines of brilliant uniforms with tastefully decorated engines; citizens in holiday dresses, ladies in the balconies—living garlands warm from the hand of luxurious nature—it presented a scene not soon to be forgotten

AWFUL CONFLAGRATION!—Seven Lives Lost! Destruction of an Immense Amount of Property!!!—At half past 5 o'clock Wednesday afternoon a fire broke out in the Alabama Cotton Press. In the vicinity of the bales, which at the time of our reaching the scene, had completed the destruction of the press, and five or six yards, in which cotton to the amount of nearly twenty thousand bales were stored, as also the large log house adjoining, both the property of Mr. Charles Genois. The Alabama Press is situated between the Louisiana Cotton Press on the West, the Orleans Independent Factory and Union presses on the East, to the two latter of which, owing to the direction of the wind, which was from the West, veering occasionally to the North-west, the attention of our indefatigable fire department was more particularly directed. The falling of the southern wall of the Alabama into Basin street gave us informed by officer Hayes, who was present—is supposed to have caused the death of four out of six negroes who were using their endeavors to save the cotton, as also, that of three white men similarly engaged.

The fire, as we stated in our last notice, was kept within bounds, but it was only by the unwearied attendance of the firemen throughout the entire night, that the ultimate spread of the fire was prevented. How the boys may look to-morrow in their festival equipments, is not of moment to the community, so long as they appear as men that have, and are equal to, doing their duty against all odds. The estimate of the property destroyed varies, as coming from several sources, but from our own personal observation, we imagine it cannot fall short of ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS. As we have stated above, we will, after repairing to the spot to-day, furnish a statistical (as near as can be ascertained) statement of the amount of property destroyed. Whether the loss falls on individuals or corporations it is to be considered a calamity to our city. Since the destruction of the St. Charles Hotel, in the great fire of the 18th of January, 1851, our city has not been the scene of anything approaching the devastation of last night.

THE OLD PETER FUNK STORY.—A "green un," rejoicing in the name of Robert Little, yesterday appeared before recorder Genella and gave his honor to understand that being a stranger in this city, and journeying from the river to the ferre he went into an auction store at the corner of Bienville and Levee streets. Being there, he saw a man named Moses Meyer offering for sale a lot of shirts. Another individual named Sydney Bedford represented to complainant that he wanted to buy half of the lot, and for (complainant) being under the impression that the shirts were ordered by the lot, bid one dollar on them. They were immediately knocked down to him, and pulling out his purse he was about paying the dollar, when the sum of $25 was snatched from his hand by the aforenamed Moses Meyer. Complainant was then induced by the aforesaid Sydney Bedford to go to another auction store at the corner of Gravier and New Levee streets—said Bedford having represented to him that he would pay him the $25 when he got there and would also take the whole lot of shirts. Arrived at the store; the shirts were placed upon the counter, when another individual supposed to be named White, sustained the humbug of shirts and offered them at auction. Bedford then induced deponent to bid the sum of $10 on the shirts, assuring him that it was the only way to get back his money. At the same time a lot of watches were laying on the counter, and when complainant came to settle and pay a second time for the shirts he was told (much to his surprise and contrary to his own private opinion about the matter) that he had bid upon the watches and not upon the shirts. The accused, after examination, were committed for trial before the First District Court.

Registry Law.

An act to provide for the registry of the names of the legal voters in the city of New Orleans, has been introduced into the House by Mr. Paul E. Theard:

Section 1 provides that the Governor shall appoint four commissioners to take the census of the legal voters in the city of New Orleans, one for each District.

Section 2 provides that four months will be allowed to the said commissioners to make said census; that the names of the legal voters of each Precinct, Ward and District shall be registered in a book kept for that purpose, and that a copy thereof shall be furnished to the Inspectors of Elections at each precinct.

Section 3 provides a penalty of ten dollars for each name not registered by the Commissioners.

Section 4 provides a penalty of $30 on every person not answering the questions of the Commissioners.

Section 5 provides that no person shall be entitled to vote, unless his name has been registered by the Commissioners, or unless two worthy witnesses, being sworn by the Inspectors, shall certify that the voter is duly qualified.

Section 6 provides for the payment of the Commissioners, by the State, as follows:

First District, $2,000; Second District, $1,800; Third District, $1,500; Fourth District, $1,200.

Section 7 provides that this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. Hilriart, from New Orleans, moved the rejection of the bill, which motion brought Mr. Theard to his feet.

This gentleman, in defending his bill, contended that the Constitution (Art. 11) binds the Legislature to pass such a law. It was the wish of all honest citizens of New Orleans, whether whigs or democrats. The bill was not given as a portion and by the mover, but his intention was to have it referred to a committee to whom Mr. Lacey's and Mr. Hunt's bills should be also referred, in order to enable that committee to make out a good bill from the three submitted to them. It was necessary to put an end to the frauds which disgraced all elections in New Orleans.

Mr. Hilriart objected to the reference, because he saw no efficacy in the law, and it would certainly not prevent fraud. It was no more the duty of this Legislature than that of '54 or '55' to pass such a law.

The suspension of the rules, in order to make the reference, was refused. The bill lies over until it comes to its second reading.

SMALL NOTES.—The following act, prohibiting the circulation of small notes, was introduced in the State Senate by Mr. Kenner, was passed on the 23d ult., reported on favorably in the House by Mr S. F. Willson, Chairman of the Committee on Banks, read twice, and ordered to be printed:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Assembly convened. That from and after the promulgation of this act it shall be unlawful for any individual or association of individuals, authorized or not authorized, to carry on the business of banking, or for any body politic or corporate within the state of Louisiana, to make, emit, issue or cause to be issued, to pay out or receive in payment any bill of credit, bank note or promissory note, or issue within or without the limits of the State of Louisiana any other instrument of writing to be used as money or as a circulating medium, in a less amount or of a less denomination than five dollars.

Sec. 2. Be it enacted, etc., That any individual or association of individuals, or body politic or corporate, violating the provisions of this act, shall forfeit for each and every offence the sum of ten dollars, to be recovered, with costs of suit, in the name and for the use of any person who shall sue for the same, and prosecute such suit to judgment before any court of competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 3 Be it enacted, etc., That the penalty inflicted by the second section of this act shall not be enforced against any individual or individuals other than those issuing or causing to be issued said small notes, who shall pay out or receive in payment any note or notes as prohibited by the first section of this act, for and during the period of six months after the promulgation thereof.

THE WINTER IN HERRMANT.—The New York Tribune says the winter has been as mild and the weather as delicious along the Rhine as here along the Hudson. On the first of January almond trees were in blossom on the "Bergstrasse" in Baden—that is, on the Rhine valley, at the foot of the mountains of the Black Forest; from Freiburg, (also in Baden,) December 27, apple trees were in bloom, herdsmen were leading their herds to pasture, and the peasant women collecting green grass for their cows at home. At Tubingen, on the 26th of December, boys bathed in the Neckar. The Zeitung says, "we, here at Augsburg, plucked in our own garden roses and violets at Christmas, which had blossomed in the open air.

The majority in favor of the Liquor Law in Vermont, as officially reported, is 1121.

Another overflow has occurred at Augusta, Ga., and at Hamburgh, on the South Carolina side of the river. Not much damage, however, was done.

The Canadians have got the rail-road fever not less than the people of the United States, and are building rail-roads in all directions.

A new mode of advertising has been originated in New York—a number of firms having their address and places of business conspicuously painted on the interior of the omnibuses.

The new Empress of France had fifty-eight splendid wedding dresses made a few days previous to her marriage. Her pocket handkerchiefs, it is said, cost $2000 a piece.

GASEOUS MESSENGER.—The streets of Memphis were lighted up by gas, for the first time, on the night of the 22d.

Abd-el-Kader has been received very coldly in Constantinople, not only by the Sultan but by the Turks generally.

A rescript from the Pope has been received at Toronto, ordering the priests to pay one-tenth of their salaries toward the support of the Bishops.

The New Brunswick papers do not appear to be at all satisfied with the plan of the settlement of the fishery question and reciprocal trade, because as they allege, too much is conceded to the United States.

The new liquor law in Illinois provides that licenses for the sale of intoxicating drinks shall range from $50 to $300, and no liquor to be sold less than one gallon in quantity without license.

The frigate Constitution, "Old Ironsides," is fitting out for the Mediterranean, and will sail under command of Capt. Budd, from the Brooklyn Navy Yard, sometime during this week.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—The capital stock of the Crystal Palace Company has been increased by the issue of new shares to $3,000,000, the full amount allowed by the charter. It is expected that the building will be opened between the 4th and 10th of May.

Ex-President Van Buren, says the Albany Atlas, will start for Europe next month. He will accompany his son, Martin Van Buren, Jr., whose impaired health, it is thought, will be benefitted by the European tour. Mr Van Buren himself retains all his vigor of mind and body.

Foreign immigration from Europe to the United States has, it is thought, reached its climax during the year 1852, and will, in future, as it has already done during the months of the present year just passed, continue to decline, owing to the attractions of Australia, the improvement in the prospects of labor in Europe, and other causes.

Gov. Jones, of Virginia, in a message to the Legislature recommends to a favorable consideration, the New York World's Fair, and suggests that some measures be taken to arouse the citizens of the State to take an interest in its success.

GLASS PENS.—Pens are now made of glass, and it is said that they answer the purpose well. It is known that with a flux of lead, in combination with the silicon, in right proportions, glass can be made very ductile. These pens are now becoming not uncommon, and they are perfectly anti-corrosive by the most impure ink.

NEW PANTALOON STYLE.—Our fashionable tailors must be on the look out for the new fashions introduced in Paris, under the reign of the Emperor Napoleon. Ornamental cassimeres have been made with stripes of different colors, running round the leg below the knee, and plain above. Only think of a fashionable young man going to the opera in a pair of cork screws!

A ferocious wild cat was caught in a trap, by Mr. Jeremiah Stevens, in North Madison, C. a few days since. The trap had taken hold of the toes of one of its fore-feet, but in that situation it was more than a match for a large and fierce dog, which Mr. S. set at it. He had finally to take a club and knock it on the head. The animal weighed 16 pounds, and was supposed to be about two years old.

Among the items of news brought by the America is a statement in the London Morning Advertiser, that a packet of eighty letters has been stolen from the Emperor's private apartment, and suspicion rests upon Mrs. Howard Letters which duplicate the first men of France are also thought to be in her possession. A reward of 300,000 francs has been offered for their recovery.

One of the Washington correspondents describing men and things in Washington just now, remarks: "There are but few young men in the crowd now in Washington. Full three-fourths of the persons at the hotels, are men over forty-five years of age, and it is a rare thing to hear a man addressed except as 'Judge,' 'Colonel,' 'Major-General,' or, at least, 'Captain.'"

THE EMPEROR'S BRIDE CAKE.—The bride cake for the marriage of Louis Napoleon, was made by Messrs. Purssell, of Cornhill, London. It weighed 320 pounds, exclusive of the decorations. The following are the ingredients of the cake: Dorset butter, 21 pounds; loaf sugar, 84; currants, 30; raisins, 30; flour, 28; Jordan almonds, 42 pounds; 332 eggs; 40 lemons; of orange, lemon and citron rinds, 24 pounds; three bottles of brandy, and two of noyeau.

A SINGULAR MAN.—Reuge E. Price, a resident of Cincinnati, a gentlemanly and philanthropic individual, has made a proposition to the Legislature of Ohio, for a dissolution of his partnership with the State. He considers the notions of the Commonwealth antagonistic to those entertained by himself, and does not desire fellowship with it. He proposes to pay his portion of the State debt, which he estimates at $600, and he absolved from all allegiance.

A BOLD RASCAL.—A few days since a Mrs Palley was walking along Main street, Rochester, N. Y., near the New England House, when a runaway horse came along the sidewalk. She tried to escape, when a man seized her under pretext of protecting her from the danger, and robbed her of a gold watch, chain and pencil. In her consternation she did not discover the robbery until it was too late. This was done in open daylight, and is as cool a piece of rascality as was ever heard of.

AN EXHILARATORY MACHINE.—A machine is being exhibited at the Merchants' Exchange, Boston, invented by Dr. St. H. Fletcher, which, it is said, is kept in constant motion by the action of the tide, gifting the manner the following important information, viz: 1st, That he approaches land. 2d, What land or place. 3d, Whether the tide is on its flood or ebb. So says an exchange Wonder if the inventor could not extend and improve the arrangement, so that it would tell the mariner whether he was approaching New York or New Orleans.

DISCOVERY OF A DUARTE CITY.—The city of Sacckarch, about five miles from Cairo, has been exhumed, and a multitude of curiosities discovered by a French gentleman, who has obtained a grant of the spot from the Pacha. He has laid open a long buried street, sixteen hundred yards in length, and containing thirty-eight granite sarcophagi each weighing about sixty-eight tons. At Alexandria, has also been laid open very recently, the foundation of what is believed to be the once famous Alexandrian library, destroyed by the Caliph Omar.

It is said that the International Copyright Treaty is in danger, President Fillmore, it is said, being hostile to it. The same is said of the Reciprocal Fisheries bill; in relation to which, documents from the Department of State will be before the Senate, showing that the bill, if it become a law, must admit colored fishermen. British subjects, into the ports of the South, in violation or disregard of State laws, and that the probable or certain acquiescence would be forcible resistance to it.

SPANISH NOBILITY.—According to the Spanish law, daughters inherit titles of nobility, and preserve them not only while they retain their family name, but transmit them, in marrying, to their husbands. Thus Napoleon III will receive the title of nobility from the head of Emilio Montijo's family. If he accepts it, it will become his duty, by the terms of the law, to make a declaration of his acceptance to the chief of the Spanish nobility, who is now the Duke of Montpensier, son of Louis Philippe, who attained that distinction by virtue of his marriage with the sister of Queen Isabella.

COURT NEWSMONGERING.—We have never exactly understood the modus operandi by which the London press obtain reports of the daily doings of the Court of Victoria and her household—of her "walking on the slopes;" of her husband's taking "a day's shooting," and whom with; of the personages they have to dine with them, and the tunes the bands play during the dinner hour—and so forth, and so on—(including the other more delicate and personal matters.) We see it stated in a la la English print that it is one of the Lord Chamberlain's perquisites to supply this information. It is daily prepared, authenticated, and forwarded to him by the Equerry in writing; and, besides being allowed a liberal salary for its daily transmission to the newspapers, he receives a handsome douceur from the press for his valuable services.

FAMILY POISONER.—On Saturday morning last, says the Louisville Courier of the 21st ult., Mr. Bingly a teamster, residing in the lower part of the city, mixed a quantity of arsenic with flour in a tin pan, and placed it on a shelf near a rat hole, to poison rats. Soon after he left the house the servant woman took down the pan and used it for the purpose of making bread for dinner. He did not return till late, and his wife and the servant woman ate of the bread for dinner, and when he came in both of them were sick and vomiting. His wife died yesterday at 11 o'clock. The servant woman, it was thought, would recover.

Arrival of the Falcon.

The U. S. mail steamship Falcon, Lieut. Henry Rodgers U. S. N., commanding, arrived on Saturday evening last, from Aspinwall, bringing the California mails to the 1st instant, 250 passengers, and $250,000 on freight and in the hands of passengers. The Falcon sailed from Aspinwall at 9 o'clock on the morning of the 10th. The steamship Georgia sailed the same morning for New York, with 400 passengers and $2,500,000 in gold dust on freight. The steamer United States sailed for New York, via Kingston, on the evening of the 18th. On the afternoon of the 24th the Falcon passed a steamer, supposed to be the Daniel Webster, bound to San Juan.

The Panama Railroad is progressing very rapidly. The health of the Isthmus was good, and a considerable number of buildings were in process of erection. Many of them, however, were delayed for the want of lumber.

Arrival of the Pampero.

The steamship Pampero, Capt. Flanders, arrived on Saturday evening from San Juan, she having left that port on the 18th inst. She was detained twelve hours by getting aground in the river.

The town of San Juan was healthy. The British war steamer Geyser was in the harbor when the Pampero left

The passengers by the steamship Pacific report having met the steamship Columbus the 8th inst., about 40 miles above Acapulco. The Columbus had been despatched from Panama for San Francisco with the passengers who had through-tickets for the Winfield Scott, for which steamer they had waited twelve days at Panama.

Great suffering and loss of life had occurred on the Columbus, she having sprung a leak in the Gulf of Tehuantepec, and it was only by the unremitting exertions of the passengers and crew that the vessel was got into the harbor of Acapulco. For several days previous the passengers were without food, and up to the time the Columbus left Acapulco forty passengers had died, and a large number of those remaining were very ill.

The following is a list of passengers by the Pampero:

Important from San Juan.

SERIOUS DISTURBANCES THREATENED.

We learn through private letters received by the house of W. L. Cushing & Co., of this city, that at the time the Pampero left San Juan, disturbances of a serious nature were threatened between the citizens of San Juan or Greytown, and the Vanderbilt Nicaragua Transit Company As is well known, the depot of the Transit Company is located on a point across the mouth of the river from Greytown, and at this depot the Company has stores with supplies of all descriptions which are furnished to passengers going either way, thus completely monopolizing this branch of trade, and cutting off the citizens of the town from all participation in its benefits. Numerous complaints have been made, which have been unheeded, until at last the citizens have become exasperated and so strong has the feeling become, that unless the depot is removed to Greytown, open warfare is anticipated; indeed, cannon and ammunition had been purchased, and the determination was, to demolish the Company's buildings, unless the depot was removed.

Mr. Baldwin, agent of the Company, had been arrested and imprisoned for using threatening language against the peace of Greytown. He was, however released on Messrs T. L. Harper and H. L. Stevenson becoming security to stand trial.

We have learned that our own correspondent wrote us a long letter, giving full particulars of this affair, and other important news, but from some cause, perfectly inexplicable, it has not come to hand.

Later from Texas.

By the arrival yesterday of the steamship Texas, Capt. James Lawless, we have received dates from Galveston to the 25th, but our exchanges from the interior did not come to hand.

VIOLENT GALE.—The Galveston News of Friday, says: On Tuesday morning about 8 o'clock, a squall on severe gale set in at this place from the N. W. It moderated through the day, but towards evening it sprung up with tremendous fury, when some slight damage was done to our city. The large new store of Messrs. St Cyr & Lee, had its metal roof partially blown off. The new wharf of Mr Parsons, at which several vessels were lying, was carried away, and some two hundred tons of railroad iron, now belonging to the Harrisburg Company, and other merchandize lying on the wharf was precipitated into the water.

The steamer Farmer was blown aternwards on the flats, where she has since remained, as the low water consequent upon the Norther, left her nearly high and dry

We also learn that this violent gale extended to the head of the bay, the schooner Jenny Lind being compelled to throw some seventeen bales of cotton overboard. We are anticipating to hear of losses on the Gulf.

LARGE SALE.—Col. Kinney has sold one half of his interest in the town of Corpus Christi for $100,000.

THE RIVERS.—The Brazos and Trinity rivers are in fine navigable condition, and the steamboats are doing a brisk business.

INDIANOLA A CITY.—The bill to incorporate Indianola as a city has received the signature of the Governor and become a law.

INVITED TO LEAVE.—Three men were arrested in Galveston a few days since on a charge of burglary but the evidence was not sufficient to warrant their committal. The citizens, however, provided a small boat, sent them to the main land, and informed them that the climate of the city would prove very unhealthy to them should they return.

IMPORTANT DECISION.—The Supreme Court of the State has decided the long contested case of Du Leon vs. White, which involved a large portion of the land on which Indianola now stands. The decision was in favor of White. The Bulletin, speaking of it, says:

"That this important decision, though long deferred, is a source of joy among our people, (many of whom have their all upon the land,) is to be expected. The great drawback upon our city has been removed, and now, with a city charter and the Turnpike charter, the people will take hold and go to work with new life."

COUNTERFEITS.—The Indianola Bulletin says that counterfeit bills on the State Bank of Louisiana are in circulation in that city, but does not mention the denomination. They are dated 1850, and signed S. J. Peters, President.

DEATH.—Mr. Charles M. Creemer, Constable of Indianola, died on the 20th, from wounds received by the hands of Davis, an Indian who is now in jail awaiting his trial.

GREAT MORTALITY.—A strange mortality has been prevailing in Polk county for several weeks; some calling it black tongue, others typhoid pneumonia. The following are the names of those who died near Cold Springs alone:

Hon. Vernon H. Lea, brother-in-law of General Sam Houston, —Hilley, —Graves, (a new comer;) also Mr. Graves's daughter and two negroes, Mrs Rankin, aged about one hundred years, one of the few who had seen Gen Washington; Mrs. Frankey Hubert, aged about sixty, daughter of Mrs. Rankin; Anderson Hubert, son of A Hubert, sr., aged about twenty-three; Ann McComb, aged about fourteen, daughter of Samuel McComb; Jane Ainsworth, aged about twenty-four, lately married; John Saunders, who kept a small store at Cold Springs for some time past, on or Houston merchants; Mrs Butler, widow of Charles Butler, deceased; Wm. Fanebrough, who kept a doggery at Cold Springs; Isaac N. Williams, at Johnson's Hull.

A CONSIDERABLE RASCAL.—A man named Charles Jouns has been recently sentenced to the State Prison at Hartford, who appears to have been one of the most subtle and graceless rogues of the day. He originally belonged to Montpelier, in Vermont, but for three years or more has furnished about Connecticut. His general plan of operation was to effect great piety, and on all occasions to render himself remarkable for his attention to his religious duties. He kept a Prayer Book and a Bible about his person constantly, and frequently, as he made afternoon calls, or hung about the stores of his friends, spying out goods for the purpose of stealing them, he was seen to read these good books with much devotion. "He could beat a white crowd," as the Hartford Times, from which we get his history, says, "at the hollow ground." He had a long, sombre countenance, and when he cast down as he frequently did, his full, owl-like eyes, and puckered his oval lips, he was a splendid picture of devout wisdom. But to the close observer, his physiognomy presented that cold, wiry, selfish, and completely heartless appearance which marks the deliberate and calculating villain."

The fellow appears to have robbed every family into which he was admitted, and almost every person with whom he came in contact. At one time he set up as an Episcopalian preacher, thus:

He trimmed his pulpit with costly broadcloths and silk fringes which he had stolen at Dean's store, and with stolen goods he paid for a pulpit Bible, Prayer Book, Hymn Book, and a large armed chair. He hung some splendid French curtains in one corner of the room as a screen, behind which he dressed in his silk robe. He stole these curtains from Mr Dean, and also the silk for his robe; and he broke into St Peter's Church in Dublin, and stole Father Brady's robe, using it as a pattern from which the stolen silk was made up. He also stole the silver chalice and some other articles from the Church.

About this time, or a little later, he went to a Huguenot gallery, put on his stolen robe, placed the Bible, bought with stolen property, upon the table, rested one hand upon this holy book, and rolling his round dull eyes languidly upward, and pointing the forefinger of his upraised hand heavenward, he stood for his likeness. In this it was taken, and shown around among his friends as a fine thing. He paid for the likeness from money stolen from Mr. Dean, and he stole the outside case from another gallery.

But after a series of similar tricks and crimes he was discovered, tried, convicted and sent to prison for four years. When he was seized by the Sheriff, his duplicity did not desert him, and he feigned to be crazy. The account says:

"Deputy Sheriff Alden, just before his removal from the county jail to Wethersfield, found him in his bunk, dirty and playing 'possum. Alden directed him to get up and to wash and share himself. He made no reply, but rolled up his eyes, and looked up to Heaven. 'My eye,' said Alden, 'you can't play that game. It will be a bad job for you.' No living man believes you are crazy, and the hour that you arrive in Wethersfield, then Wells'n men will have you in such a pair of traces that you'll see stars the minute you look that way; but if you behave yourself and don't play 'possum, or pretend to be crazy, you will be treated as kindly as the nature of the prison discipline will permit. Now take your choice!' This little address had a wonderful effect upon him. He got up, talked fast enough, promised to behave, shaved and brushed up, and quit 'playing 'possum,' and went down like a rational rascal."

Goldsmith's old friend, Ephraim Jenkinson or Sam Weller's companion, Mr. Alfred Jingle, that used to pump up his tears so fast, were slow in comparison with the pious Charles Jones. [N. Y. Eve Post.

Gentlemen desirous of serving their beloved country in some official capacity, some wag in the Carpet Bag hits off thus:

"The office-holders are all in a sweat."
Said an office hoper, with exultation.
"True," said old Roger, "I never yet Saw such a General Fiscor-pation."

Later from Havana and Key West.

By the arrival of the steamship Isabel at Charleston, dates from Havana and Key West to the 22d inst. have been received—three days later from the former port than were brought by the Empire City. We make up the following summary of news from the Charleston Courier:

Among the passengers is H. Hamilton Jones, Esq., Private Secretary to the Hon. W. R. King who is bearer of dispatches from our Consul at Havana to Washington. We are gratified to learn from Mr Jones that the health of the Vice President elect is much improved. He is at present staying on the plantation of Mr. Jinks, four miles from Matanzas, that gentleman having politely tendered him the use of his house. Mr. Jones describes the place as being exceedingly beautiful, and says that Mr King seems thoroughly to enjoy himself there. Mr Jones left Mr. King on the 21st instant, and appears perfectly sanguine as to his speedy recovery. The sugar-house in Mr King's case, has proved very efficacious, affording him almost instantaneous relief. Mr. King is accompanied by two nieces and two nephews.

The telegraphic account published in the Courier on Thursday, of the misunderstanding between Mr. King and the Captain General, is quite unfamily correct. It is, however, definitely settled, although no interview took place between the parties.

We learn from another passenger by the Isabel that some excitement existed in Havana in consequence of the authorities having broken open the mails from Havana which were placed on board the U. S. mail steamship Empire City, Capt. Windle, for New Orleans, on the 19th inst., by the agents, Messrs. Drake & Co.

It is said that the authorities have adopted this course in order, if possible, to discover what Creoles in the Island are engaged in correspondence with the Filibusters of the United States. On the 21st inst., however, the U. S. Consul at Havana, Judge Sharkey, addressed a communication to the Captain General, protesting. It is said, in cheerful terms against the right of the Cuban authorities to search any U. S. mail steamship. Our informant further states that he believes no response had been received by our Consul, prior to the departure of the Isabel. The Isabel, however, was permitted to leave port without undergoing any examination; the communication therefore, of our Consul, seems to have had a desirable effect

K. K. Collins, Esq., the enterprising projector of the Collins' Line of Liverpool Steamships, also arrived from Havana in the Isabel.

From Rio de Janeiro.

Dates from Rio de Janeiro to the 26th of January have been received in this city. The arrivals of coffee up to January 12th had been more limited than during the month previous. The prospects of the growing crops were very discouraging. The stock in the market was generally of the ordinary descriptions. Of the sales effected, 50,000 bags for the United States, 15,000 for the channel and the north of Europe, and 5,000 for the Mediterranean. The principal purchases effected were at 2,950 to 4,000 for American assortments, 3,850 to 3,900 for assorted lots for the north of Europe. The general estimate is that the crop will not exceed half of the last one, but that as a considerable quantity of old will remain in the interior, the real deficiency will be, it is believed, about one-fifth or one-sixth, say 300,000 to 400 000 bags.

The Brazilian Government steam corvette Offouse was totally lost about ten miles west of Cape Frio.

The steamship Fanny, for New Orleans, was still waiting the decision of the Courts, before she could be sold to pay bottomries and seamen's wages. Of her passengers twenty-three died between the 1st and 25th December; the remainder had been sent forward to California and Australia by various vessels, upwards of 40,000 having been raised by private subscriptions to assist them. The Consul, not being able to afford any aid on Government account, had been obliged to do a good deal on his own.

The Caroline and Augusta, from New York for Australia, arrived in December, with 120 passengers, in a leaky condition. As the captain could not raise money on bottomry, he would probably have condemn and sell her, leaving many distressed passengers in a sickly port at the worst season.

The fever was chiefly confined to the shipping. The cases on shore were very few and of a mild type

The barks St. James, for Philadelphia, and White Wing, for New Orleans, sailed from Rio on the 10th January The bark Hermitage, from Baltimore, was spoken off Cape Frio on the 19th January. The ship Antelope, from California, arrived at Frio on the 15th January

THE INSURRECTION AT MILAN.—The London correspondent of the New York Tribune confirms the belief we have entertained, that the proclamation purporting to have been issued by Kossuth was a spurious document. He says:

"As to the movement, I can give you correct and detailed information. The insurrection took place against the advice of Kossuth, who wished to have it delayed until the probable rupture between Austria and Turkey should offer a fair chance of success; but the Italians were so much exasperated by the recent floggings and hangings, that they said they would rather perish in open battle than in the Austrian dungeons. When Mazzini saw that they could no longer be kept back, he wrote to them that, though he thought the outbreak premature, yet he would go to them. He was the worst person to do with them. On the 6th, proclamations were posted up on all the corners of the streets in Milan, with the names of Mazzini and Kossuth. A riot took place, and blood was shed, but the movement was put down.

"On the 8th, at dawn, some Italians introduced themselves into the arsenal and cut down a few Austrian officers, when the privates surrendered and gave up their arms. The communications were immediately interrupted, and we have no further details up to the hour. The Milanese have dually succeeded, this outbreak premature, yet they would go to them. On the worst grounds, to die with them. On the 6th, proclamations were posted up on all the corners of the streets in Milan, with the names of Mazzini and Kossuth. A riot took place, and blood was shed, but the movement was put down.

"On the 8th, at dawn, some Italians introduced themselves into the arsenal and cut down a few Austrian officers, when the privates surrendered and gave up their arms. The communications

FAR, FAR AWAY!

I love to look on the purple West,
In the gorgeous robes of the sunset drest;
With its crimson pomp and bannered shows,
Like the lordly state of a dying Queen;
The distant woods, with their crowns of gold,
And the hoary hills, Time's fastness hold,
While nephrys breathe their low, soft salutes,
We may only tell of the golden climes,
And that better land, in the realms of day,
Far, far away!"

I love to stand on the mountain height,
In the magic noon of a summer night;
While vale and meadow are fairy land,
And elves come out on the pebbly strand,
And fays are merry in moonlight doll,
And earth is wrapped with a seer-like spell,
And low the voice of the sounding sea,
Beneath to say, in its minstrelcy—
We only tell of the realms of dey,
Far, far away!"

I love to look on a young face fair,
With the sunny smile of childhood there;
To hear the laugh of its careless glee,
Like the glad come sheet of the summer sea,
For it seems to ray, as they float along,
With merry dance and the murmured song,
"The land!—the land by sunset sky,
Where tears are not, and we'll nomore die;
Oh! the old grow young, in that realm of day,
Far, far away!"

There, starry rivers are murmuring low;
To deathless flowers that by them blow;
And the zephyrs breathe, in their interlike tones,
And hymn the stars on their golden thrones;
The sun sings out; and there is no night;
And spirited ones, in robes of white,
Floating along upon azure wings,
Their rapture tell on their trembling strings;
"Oh! let us fly to that realm of day,"
Far, far away!"

Desperate Fight with a Panther.

The Helena (Ark.) Shield publishes the following, and vouches for its truth:

MR. EDITOR—Famous as Arkansas is for all that is marvelous; for its wild mnn of hnge dimensions; its Pete Whetsone tales of "Big Bear," and other tales equally wonderous. Yet I doubt if there has ever been recorded an incident more remarkable than a fight that occurred on the 10th of February, npon Beaver Bayou, in thie county, (Phillips, Ark.,) between Mr. Joseph Grimes and a large panther. I will give you the particulars, as they actually occurred, in an unvarnished tale.

On the 10th, Mr. Grimes had left hie hense during the deep snow that then lay on the ground, to procure some fire wood in the adjoining forest; leaving in the house a sick child, hie wife, and her mother. Attracted by the crying of the child (it is supposed) a large and fierce panther approached the door of the house. The imitative notes of a child crying drew to the door Mrs. Grimes, most fortunately, for alrendy was the nose of the fierce intruder thruet within the door. By an effori, she succeeded in closing the door and shutting out the panther. An alarm was then given by the ladies, which drew to the house Mr. Grimes, supposing his child to be ill; and little dreaming by how fierce an enemy his cabin was besieged.

Judge, then, of hie enrprise upon seeing coolly seated upon the step of his door a huge panther. Undannted and fired with fierce resolve, Mr. Grimes still advanced, nnd attempted to get possession of his gun, which Mrs. Grimes had, opening the back door, brought around to him; crouching, with tnil switching and eyee fiercely glaring, the panther watched every movement of Mr. Grimes. At the very moment that Mr. G. grasped his gun, and before he could use it, the panther made a spring at his throat. With great presence of mind, and almost miraculously, Mr. G. grasped the monster by the throat. Life was now et stnke, and long and bloody was tha fight. The panther had now the left arm of Mr. G. in hie month, and victory seemed to be with him. Every mnscle of Mr. G. was now called into action nnd strained to its ntmost; a long struggle ensued; the panther was thrown, and by pinching hie knee on its neck and still retaining the grasp he had on its throat, he succeeded in releasing from the jaws of the panther his left arm. They again rose from the gronnd. Mr. G. never abandoning his vice-like hold of its throat, had now both of its forelegs grasped in his left hand; he thue kept it at arm's length and prevented it from tearing him with its claws.

Victory was not yet with Mr. G., and he still might have met with a Waterloo defeat, had not the ladies, Blucher-like, come up with reinforcements.

A pair of tongs and a "battling stick" were brought to bear upon the panther. One blow of the tongs sent down his throat several teeth—for so tight was the grasp of Mr. G. that the animal's jaws were forced wide open. The heroines in this fight (Mrs. G. and her mother) continued belaboring the panther until a blow broke it down in the loins. Mr. G. kept his hold until the panther breathed his last—and firmly believes that he choked the panther to death, notwithstanding the aid given him by the ladies. When captured it measured 8½ feet from the tip of the nose to the end of its tail. Its skin now hangs on the outer side of his cabin, a trophy of a hnrd and bloody fight.

Mr. Grimes le now nuoh injured. So stiff is he in every muscle from his great exertions, that he is unable to get about. One arm is much swollen and badly sprained, the other pierced in several places by the teeth of the panther. The scars of this fight he will bear with him to the grave, if it does not become necessary to amputate his arm.

This, Mr. Editor, yon may rely upon as a true statement of all the facts connected with this remarkable fight.

Truly has old Phillips heroines as well as heroes within her borders. BEAVER BAYOU.

FEMALE HEROISM.—"One day," said Messena, "being at Bassenden, I perceived a young soldier belonging to the light artillery, whose horse had just been wounded by a lance. The young man who appeared quite a child, defended himself desperately, as several bodies of the enemy lying around could testify. I despntched an officer with some men to his assistance, but arrived too late. Although the action had taken place on the borders of the wood, and in front of the bridge, this artillery had alone withstood the attack of a small troop of Cossacks and Bavarians; whom the officer and men I had despatched to put to flight. His body was covered with wounds, inflicted by shots, lances and swords. There were at least thirty. And so you know, Madame, what the young man was?" said Messenn, turning to me.

"A woman."

"Yes, a young, and a handsome woman, too! although she was so covered with blood, that it was difficult to judge of her beanty. The latter was a captain of artillery; she never left him; and when he was killed, defended, like a lion, the remains of him she loved. She was a native of Paris, her name was Louis Belletz, and she was the daughter of a fringemaker, in the Rue de Petit Lied. [Memoirs of the Durhess Abrantes.

A STORY WITH A MORAL.—Some years ago, Mr. R., an American gentleman, having discovered some new process by which he thought money could be made in England, concluded to try his fortune in London. Very soon after his arrival, he presented himself at the office of one of the leading journals, and requested to see the editor. He was desired to give in his name and business, which he did, and an answer was speedily brought that the editor was engaged. By dint of great urgency, he at last succeeded in making his way to the room of the sub-editor, and, having never found any difficulty in obtaining a hearing from gentlemen of the press in his own country, where the time of an editor is considered almost public property, he proceeded at once to explain his discovery, supposing that it would be received as a favor, and duly glorified, as a matter of course, in next day's impression. Before he had fairly made his beginning, however, the sub-editor cut him short, politely but firmly, by saying he had no time to spare, and that he presumed his visitor's object was to have his discovery noticed.

"Why, yes, sir, I should like—." "It can be done, sir, without trouble; write whatever you like, and it shall go in; of course you will leave your name and address. The clerk in the office will arrange with you as to terms. Good morning, sir."

Finding himself bowed out, Mr. R. went back to the office, where he was furnished with pen, ink and paper; he sat down, and in the course of some twenty minutes produced an editorial paragraph of perhaps twice that number of lines. This he handed to the clerk, merely asking whether it would appear the next day.

"Certainly, sir. Editorial?"

"Yes, sir, in the editorial columns."

"I presume you would not wish it in the largest type used on the paper?"

"Why, yes, sir, I should prefer that."

"In that case, sir, the charge will be ten guineas; if in the smaller type, five."

Mr. R. took back his manuscript, and withdrew.

UNCLE TOM.—The foreign correspondent of the Newark (N. J.) Daily Advertiser, writing, from Dresden, Saxony, January 6, says:

"A few weeks ago, at the annual fair in Dresden, one of the greatest curiosities of the day was a negro woman with a large iron ring in her nose, represented as a fugitive from slavery. She was pictured upon the outside of the building chained by the ring, and a driver, holding a long whip in his hnnd, standing by. The admittance was about five cents U. S. currency. Thousands flocked to see her, in order to gather from life-an idea of American slavery. It was a good speculation for the exhibitor, whose name I was not able to learn. I understand the above forms a traveling exhibition, making a tour of the whole of Europe. This exhibition, pretending to represent the cruelties of American slavery, together with extreme piety, as represented in Uncle Tom; and the superiority of intellect, as represented in Eliza and George of Uncle Tom's Cabin, and the theatre, are creating a universal feeling of hatred among the masses of Europe against the republican government of the United States. And monarchists are taking advantage of it through the newspapers to add fuel to the fire, to overwhelm that spark of Independence which was kindled through the whole of Europe in 1848-'49."

The above is only additional evidence that the Tom-Cabin party in the United States are "the friends of every country but their own."

Steamers between California, China and Japan.

WASHINGTON, February 20, 1853.—A proposition of unusual interest, and one which is exciting the liveliest attention from the intelligent and leading members of Congress, has been submitted by Mr. Ambrose W. Thompson, to establish a line of steamers between the Western coast of our country and Eastern Asia. The line consists of six steamers of not less than 3000 tons; each steamer to be pierced and ready for mounting of the heaviest batteries for war purposes, but in times of peace to carry always four guns of the largest calibre. In the course of their voyages, they are to perform the naval service in the North Pacific. They will thus afford the most ample protection to the whaling and commercial marine in these seas, and completely relieve the Government from the necessity of keeping a naval squadron at that distant and expensive station. By careful examination it is found that this will be a saving of one and a quarter millions of dollars per annum in the Navy Department. This line is to make semi-monthly trips between California and China, touching in going and returning at the Sandwich Islands, and at some port in Japan so soon as communications are opened with that Empire.

For this service a contract is asked for ten years, the Government to allow the contractor to receive the amount of postage which may be collected from mailable matter transmitted by the steamers. To aid in the immediate establishment of the line, it is asked that one-half the amount which the Postmaster-General may estimate will arise from the postal service shall be advanced in bonds of the Government—payable at the end of the contract term—and one-half of the monthly receipts of the line are to go toward the payment of this advance by Government. The fairness of this proposition, its feasibility, and the practical manner in which it is put forth, together with the known ability of Mr. Thompson to carry out the project, are gaining friends rapidly to this most important measure, and there is now scarcely a doubt of the passage of a bill to effect the object by the present Congress.

Accompanying the proposals are statistics of the trade with China and the East, made up from official sources, which are somewhat startling. A period of sixty years is selected, ending with 1852. In that time the imports of teas into great Britain from China has been in the aggregate 1,945,682,857 pounds, and the present yearly report is about 56,000,000 pounds. From this trade the government have derived a revenue in the sixty years of $990,545,03d.

The present annual revenue of Great Britain, from the tea trade alone, is over twenty millions of dollars. The entire importations of all descriptions of goods from China to the United States in the same period of sixty years is only $258,858,283. Our exports in the same time have been 86,260,263, leaving to be paid in specie $172,598,149. The nourse of trade and the national balances are also shown, and it is seen that this amount of specie, $92,415,273 has been paid to England for bills drawn on China on account. These bills are caused by England in shipment of opium to China from her East India possessions, and the shipment of cotton goods. They bring China annually in debt to England some $20,000,000 while we are ent off from the shipment of our own cottons by want of proper facilities, and are therefore indebted to China annually from six to eight millions of dollars. The consequence is that England draws our precious metals and robs our industrial classes by her superior mail facilities. This is shown by a statement of one year's export of cotton from England and from the United States:

EXPORTS FROM ENGLAND TO CHINA.—Cotton goods—unbleached muslins, 1,762,321 pieces; bleached muslins, 6,389 pieces; twilled cottons, 176,140 pieces; calicoes or chintzes, 3,150 pieces; cotton handkerchiefs, 3,500 dozens; cotton yarn, 50,667 lbs. Woolen goods—broad cloths, 616 pieces; cassimers, 668 pieces; camicts, 1,658 pieces.

The amount of property afloat on the Pacific Ocean is also shown. It is put down at 1284 sail, aggregating 403,160 tons, employing 24,000 American navigators. The total value of this property would be but $19,000,000. In case of a war with England it would be swept from the ocean by her steamers in the East India and Chinese seas before any armament could be sent round Cape Horn for its protection. The statistics presented by Mr. Thompson, together with the map showing all the British mail lines, and the manner in which Europe, Asia and North and South America is surrounded by them, has afforded an amount of information which has never before been presented to Congress or to the American people. Nearly eight years ago Ambrose W. Thompson suggested this line to the administration of Mr. Polk. It was then favorably received, and but for the Mexican war, would have been established.

Since then, Mr. Thompson has steadily pressed forward the subject, regardless of the obstacles which have been placed in his way by that class of envious speculators who have not the ability to conceive, but who invariably rush in to compete for any thing which superior ability may point out. By that class Mr. Thompson has been constantly beset, and counter plots and misrepresentations have been placed before the committee and urged upon members. The energy and perseverance of the original proposer has, however, kept always in advance of them, and he has now fair and almost certain prospect of success. Should the line be established, mails and letters can be delivered in New York from China in forty days, by the present mode of conveyance from California, and if the railroad is made across the country, in twenty-four days. This will render all Europe dependent upon us for their mail facilities, as well as for the products of Eastern Asia. This is surely enough to cause every American to press on to the establishment of this through line.

CALIFORNIA THEN AND NOW.—In 1846 San Francisco had but 750 inhabitants. In April 1847, there were 375 besides a few Indians. In October '47, there were 800. In October '48, 150 votes were polled, and in December '48, 347. In August '49, there were 1,519 votes cast. In January '53, the city contained 30,000 people and about 16,000 voters. In March '47 there were only six vessels in port, and on the 18th of the following December only four, and no arrival for a week. In January, February and March, of 1848, there were but nine arrivals of vessels, four of which were from the neighboring ports of Monterey and San Pedro; and for the last quarter of 1847, the imports amounted to $49,000 and the exports to $53,600. From the 1st of January to the 31st of October, 1852, there were 827 arrivals, with an aggregate tonage of 376,345 tons, and in last month over 200 vessels in port. From January 1 to October 31, of the year 1852, the duties received at the Custom House amounted to $1,560,842 15, and the number of passengers arriving by sea during the same period was 58,851, while those who departed in the same manner were 19,575. The first brick building was erected in September 1848, and this was the second brick house in Upper California, there being at that date one in Monterey.

In the first two months after the discovery of gold, in December, 1847, the amount of dust brought into San Francisco was about $250,000, and during the next two months about 800,000. Now it is five millions a month. The first Protestant house of worship in California, was built by the Baptists, and was dedicated on the 5th of August, 1849. At the present time, there are eighteen churches, two of which are Catholic and the rest Protestant. January 1, 1853, there were five daily and seven weekly newspapers, twenty private banking houses, twenty-four auction houses, four bath houses, sixteen bakeries, seventeen barber shops, thirty-two blacksmiths, nine booksellers and stationers, thirty-three boot and shoe dealers, twenty-eight butchers, fifty master carpenters and cabinetmakers, sixty-two clothiers, nine dealers in crockery and glass ware, one hundred and thirty commission merchants, twenty-eight dry goods dealers, thirty-four druggists, nine furniture dealers, nine fancy dry goods dealers, twenty-seven hardware dealers, ninety-three groceries, six livery stables, twenty-six milliners and dress maker's shops, twenty-two house and sign painters, eight saddle and harness makers, nine ship chandlers, twenty-four stove and tin ware dealers, twenty-three tailor shops, eighteen upholsterers, forty-six dealers in watches and jewelry, about sixty physicians, and about one hundred and fifty lawyers. THE TEST TRIP OF THE CAPTAIN ERICSON.—This ship arrived at Alexandria on Monday afternoon from the mouth of the Potomac, where she had lain at anchor for twenty-seven hours during the late snow-storm and thick weather. Capt. Lowber weighed anchor at half past nine o'clock last Wednesday morning at Sandy Hook, and in pursuance of instructions, stood to the east in the face of a strong gale and heavy sea. He kept his course for eighty miles, when the wind shifted to the northwest. He then stood in shore again in the face of the gale. During these two gales the ship stood the test nobly, and though she pitched her bowsprit under water, with her lee guard immersed, her engines performed with the utmost regularity, the wheels making six turns and a half a minute, with entire uniformity. Not the slightest motion was perceptible in the frame work and bearing of the engines. After the ship and engines were thus fully tested, Capt Lowber shaped his course for the Chesapeake, and in going up the bay encountered a heavy snow storm.

On approaching the mouth of the Potomac, the weather became so that the pilot declined to go further, and the ship came to anchor at ten o'clock Saturday morning. The engines had often been in operation for seventy-three hours without being stopped for a moment or requiring the slightest adjustment, only one fireman having been on duty at a time during the whole trip. The consumption of fuel was under five tons in the twenty-four hours. Captain Sands, of the Navy, who was on board to witness the performance, is delighted with the result, and says that he would willingly go to Australia in her. Thus the great principle of the new motor is now a demonstrated reality. [Washington Republic, 27 ult.

THE MORMONS.—It is stated that a schism has already began to work among the Mormons. A party calling itself the "New Church" has sprung up and separated from the original Mormon Society. The "New Church" has appointed seven rulers, answering to the branches of the Golden Candlestick, and the authority descends from one to the other, so that it can never cease while one is left.

Thackeray is to deliver a course of lectures before the Mercantile Library Association of Charleston.

GREAT BRITAIN.

In the English funds there has been a marked improvement, and confidence has been considerably restored. The continental exchanges have generally become more favorable for London, and although the gold ships still keep out, it is known that large arrivals must take place at several points within a week or two.

The company lately mentioned, for cutting a canal through the Isthmus of Darien, at a cost of £15,000,000 sterling, or $75,000,000, has been advertised for the first time in London, with a list of directors, etc. One of the objects was to produce a rise in New Granada bonds, but the experiment seems to have been a failure.

A meeting had been held in London, which was attended by some influential public men, to petition the Government to use their influence toward putting an end to the occupation of Italy by French and Austrian troops.

A disposition to strike for higher wages seems to be generally prevalent in England. Some of the shipwrights have already struck, and even the farm-laborers of Wiltshire.

The first fat-market for the south of Ireland was opened at Cork with a good deal of ecremony on the 4th instant.

FRANCE.

On the night of the 5th inst., several parties were suddenly arrested in Paris, among them some correspondents of Belgian and German newspapers, charged with issuing odious and infamous libels on the French Government and the Empress Eugenie." Among them were Transil, of the Debats; Dupont, of the Union, and Meyer, of the Patrie. But a far more important arrest is that of Gen. de St. Priest, an eminent member of the late National Assembly, known to be in the confidence of the Count de Chambord. The natives arrested are to be tried, and the foreigners sent home.

General Montreel had embarked at Toulon for Civitia Vecchia, to take the command of the French troops at Rome, in the place of General Goneau, who returns to France.

On the 8th, at a grand review of cavalry at Versailles, the Empress, mounted on a fine charger, was present. The Empress rode very gracefully, and the acclamations were enthusiastic.

At the festival of the Deouf Gras the oxen are the year named Uncle Tom, Shelby and St. Clair.

The Emperor and Empress have consented to stand godfather and godmother to the great bell of Dordeaux, just about to be plied.

Napoleon expresses much interest in the Industrial Fair at Dublin, and has ordered specimens of French art for exhibition.

Notwithstanding the universal belief that important changes were contemplated in the Ministry, the Moniteur declares that the rumors were totally without foundation.

The Princes Frederic and Christian, of Schlaswig-Holstein, are at the French Court at present.

AUSTRIA.

A letter dated Vienna, February, 3, says: "Although the despatch of a corps d'observation to the frontier during the progress of the Montenegro strife is a perfect intelligible proceeding, the order given suddenly yesterday afternoon to mobilize the ninth army Division, now in garrison here, and march it to the frontier, has produced some surprise. Meanwhile three brigades have already been started for Croatia."

"The Austrian force on the Turkish frontier will number 45,000 men. It will be divided into two corps, of which the first stationed in the Austro-Bosnian frontier, will be commanded by Jellachich, the notorious Ban, and the second stationed in Dalmatia, by Gen Count Leiningen."

The Gazette of Vienna of the 4th, however, states that Austria has not taken any aggressive attitude towards Turkey.

The gloomy fortress of Comoru is still filled with Hungarian prisoners. Seven among them are sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment, two for eighteen, and three for fifteen years. The majority of the prisoners are engaged in learning the English language.

ITALY.

The brothers Rothschild have contracted for a loan of 50,000,000f. to Piedmont, and another of $15,000,000f. to Tuscany.

RUSSIA.

The report of the advance of the Russian second army corpse upon the Swedish frontier is nodfirmed.

GERMANY.

The two remaining ships of the German fleet are to be sold at auction on the 10th March, at Bremen. A further term will be appointed for the sale of the 26 gun-boats and the stores.

Professors Schonbein, of Basle, and Bottger, of Frankfort, have sold their invention of gun-cotton to the Austrian government for 36,000 florins. It is said that Austria has communicated to the other States of the German land that they may be admitted to a share of the secret, if Maller Selcher, the leading trade writer in the Parliament of Hesse Darmstadt, has just been tried at Mayence for one of his Zollverein speeches, in the Second Chamber. Fortunately he escaped, from some technical informality.

The Gest Correspondenx says that measures will be taken to prevent the return of those emigrants to Austria who, during last, nothing more valuable than the political opinions they have picked up among the German fugitives in North America."

FLORIDA INDIANS.—A correspondent of the Jacksonville News, whose communication is published with the endorsement of the editor of that paper, advocates the application of the principle of "still hunting" for the removal of the Indians from Florida. We make the following quotations from the communication: "The plan which I propose is one that I suggested three years ago, and which, if it had been adopted, would have removed every Indian in less than three months, and saved the Government at least a million of dollars. It is this: That the State of Florida shall take the matter in its own hands, and offer high rewards for killing and capturing them. If $1200 be offered for each warrior captured alive, $1000 for each warrior killed, and $500 for each woman or child captured alive—but few of them will be either killed or captured before the rest will hasten in and surrender at discretion. Supposing, however, that it might be necessary to kill forty of the warriors (one-third of their whole number) before the rest became terrified at being waylaid and "still hunted," the whole expense would be but $40,000, and this sum the General Government would be bound to refund. One great advantage in this plan is, that if none be killed nor captured, there will be nothing to pay—its expenses will be commensurate with its success—and as all other plans, though attended with vast expense, have signally failed, so would it never be wise to give this one a trial! It is because they still hunt us that one hundred of them can make themselves formidable to 60,000 people. These savages have been for fifteen years laughing at our marching columns, or our puerile diplomacy, regarding us with no more dread than the boy in the apple tree did the old man when he pelted him with grass. It is high time that we began to play their own game upon them, and try "what virtue there is in stones."

The foregoing recalls to our mind the enormous expenditure attendant upon the first Florida war. It was after the disbursement of millions, that Gen Hardin suggested, on the floor of the House of Representatives, the expediency of "farming out" the job of extirpating the Seminoles; and he offered, in behalf of the State of Kentucky, to undertake it, with ample security for its performance, for a million of dollars. His advice passed unheeded, an expenditure of forty millions ensued, and now, from all appearances, the battle has to be fought over again.

A NEW PRIZE-MASTER.—While Mr. Gobden is piping his peace pastoral, in London, and betting that the French will never attempt to invade England, Mr. Naysmyth, of the great iron factory at Patricroft, announces in ludicrous contrast, a wonderful discovery. He has invented a mortar against which no vessel can stand for an instant. You have only, he asserts, to plant a couple of these mortars in each port and harbor on the coast, and you may then dispense with all other means and appliances of war. Let an enemy's fleet approach the harbor so protected, with a single match the train is fired, the shell rises in the air, and falling on the doomed vessel, shivers it into a thousand splinters, and sends it to the bottom. Never was invention more complete—at least on paper. It is really touch and go.

A correspondent of the National Intelligencer, commenting upon the probable influence this engine of destruction is destined to exercise upon general diplomacy, aptly remarks:

"We are not sanguine, but we really hope Naysmyth's mortar may be successful. If it were possible to sink a ship—to destroy a regiment at a single blow—to do this easily, cheaply, rapidly, at all times and in all places—there would be no more wars. Men would not dare to make war. The victory would be worth far more than the blood it would cost. It certainly is not so at this time; but with these wholesale destroyers, the price paid for a victory would be inealculable."

Right. And we fervently hope, therefore, that Mr. Naysmyth will go ahead with his infernal machine. [New York Express.

DAGUERREAN AND STORM POINTS.—A correspondent in the Scientific American gives the following:

"Put two drachms of pure nitre and a half drachm of chloride of ammonia, reduced to powder, into two ounces of pure alcohol, and place this mixture in a glass tube, of about the common long and proportionate diameter, the upper extremity of which must be covered with a piece of skin or bladder, pierced with small holes. If the weather is to be fine, the solid matters remain at the bottom of the tube, and the alcohol is as transparent as usual. If rain is to fall in a short time, some of the solid particles rise and fall in the alcohol, which become somewhat thick and cloudy. When a storm, tempest, or even a squall is about to come on, all the solid matters rise from the bottom of the tube, and form a crust on the surface of the alcohol, which appears in a state of fermentation. These appearances take place twenty-four hours before the tempest ensues; and the point of the horizon from which it is to blow, is indicated by the particles gathering most on the side of the tube opposite to that part from whence the wind is to come."

A FACT NOT GENERALLY KNOWN.—Tammany Society was originally a purely Native American Association. When the peace of seventeen hundred and eighty-three was established an unusual number of foreigners landed on these shores. Soon after their arrival they formed various societies, composed entirely of their own country men. Hitches of a strong gale and heavy sea. He kept his course for eighty miles, when the wind shifted to the northwest. He then stood in shore again in the face of the gale. During these two gales the ship stood the test nobly, and though she pitched her bowsprit under water, with her lee guard immersed, her engines performed with the utmost regularity, the wheels making six turns and a half a minute, with entire uniformity. Not the slightest motion was perceptible in the frame work and bearing of the engines. From the New York Times.

Two Letters of Franklin.

Mrs. John Gough Nichols sends to the London Gentleman's Magazine two original letters of Dr. Franklin. Both have escaped the diligent search of Mr. Jared Sparks; at least we find neither of them in the correspondence of Franklin; and the latter is missing from the diplomatic correspondence of the Revolution, leaving a blank very much to be bewept in that important work. Notwithstanding the levity with which the ghost of Franklin has mingled with the poly-colored spirits of rapperism, the fame of the statesman is yet living, and his relics are yet venerable. So we reprint these letters for the benefit of all concerned.

The first in order is addressed to his bankers, and, if less momentous than its companion, is not without significance:

CRAVEN STREET, July 11, 1769.

Gentlemen—I have desired Messrs. Freeth, of Birmingham, to send one of their corn mills packed up and directed to your care for my son. As I shall probably be abroad when it comes up, being about to make a little tour in France, I beg you would be so kind as to receive it, and ship it with Capt. Falconor, pay Messrs. Freeth for it, and charge it to my account.

I shall be further obliged, not having time to come into the city, if you can send me to-morrow forty guineas.

May I further give you the trouble of buying for me two lottery tickets, to be sent me with the money; or rather, on second thoughts, keep them, writing a line to Mr. Jonathon Williams, merchant, Boston, acquainting him with their numbers, for they are for him.

I am, with much esteem yours, etc., B. FRANKLIN.

To Messrs. Smith, Wright & Grey, Bankers, Bombield street.

The second is of more consequence. Those who have turned over the "Diplomatic Correspondence" have noted the absence of several letters that must have passed between the negotiators of the treaty of Versailles in relation to the ratification. They seemed to have absconded so adroitly as to put seekers for them quite at fault. This Gough-Nichols contribution is the most important of them; the rest may be spared:

PASSEY, March 31, 1784.

SIR—We have now the pleasure of acquainting you that the ratification of the definitive treaty is arrived here by an express from Congress. You have already been informed that the severity of the winter in America, which hindered travelling, had occasioned a delay in the assembling of the States. As soon as a sufficient number were got together, the treaty was taken into consideration and the ratification passed unanimously. Inclosed you have copies of the proclamation issued on the occasion, and of the recommendatory resolution. The messenger was detained at New York near a month by the ice, which prevented the packet boat's sailing, otherwise he would probably have been here in February. We are now ready to exchange the ratification with you, whenever it shall be convenient to you.

With great and sincere esteem, we have the honor to be, sir, your Excellency's most obedient and most humble servants, H. FRANKLIN,
JOHN JAY.

His Excellency David Hartley, etc.

There was weather for you, seventy years ago. Just fancy as you read this on a bright February day, the air as mild as May, and the echo of last night's thunder lingering on your years; fancy, we say, a season long ago, when the harbor was frozen up and Congress was prevented from meeting because of the intense cold. Those revolutionary times certainly tried men's souls.

An amusing blunder occurs in the few remarks with which the editor of the Magazine introduces his two epistolontory prizes. Alluding to the latter of the two, he says:

"It is dated from Passy, near Paris, and addressed to David Hartley, Esquire, who then held some other diplomatic appointment from the United States." Poor old David Hartley, so soon forgotten and disowned at home—posthumously outlawed, as it were. Old-Hartley, who used, in the goodness of his heart, and fullness of his friendliness to America, to make speeches in the House of Commons, hours long; dull, prosy, undeniable speeches, the exordiums of which sent half the House to dinner and the rest to sleep; and all to show that Ministers were wrong and the Colonists right. Hartley was the victim of the wickedest wit ever spent upon an honest plodder; the veritable butt of his fellows. All the memoirs and histories of the time have something to say of him.

His devotion to the American cause recommended him to his Government as a proper person to treat with the Colonial agents at Versailles. He was not chosen as Minister Plenipotentiary; negotiated the famous treaty of 1783; and in less than a lifedime afterwards is rejected of his countrymen and set down as a person "holding some other diplomatic appointment from the United States." And the very pinnacle of the offence is that Sylvanus Urban, gent., is the offender; an authority which, upon all matters relative to English history and antiquities, has always claimed infallibility. Why Sylvanus was fifty years old at the time, and should know all about it. Is his sight so dim with age that in the very letter he copies he does not see that Hartley is invited, as British Plenipotentiary, to exchange ratifications with Franklin and Jay!

LONGEVITY.—The oldest man in New England died at Nottingham, New Hampshire, on the 23d of January last. His name was Charles Willey. He was born in Nottingham on the 25th of March, 1746, and would consequently have been one hundred and seven years of age this month. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and has been a pensioner. He has been an active, robust man, and until recently has been an active laborer. He says he learned to mow when ten years old, and used his scythe until he was a hundred, and then left, as he thought nine years was long enough for any man to follow that business. He has left a son, Mr. Jonathen Willey, between seventy and eighty years of age, who is also a pensioner for services in the war of 1812.

Mary Banton, aged 121 years, died at Elton, near Stockton-on-Tees, on the 7th of January. The old lady was regarded with unusual interest in her own neighborhood and her cottage was seldom free from visitors, to whose bounty she was, do doubt, largely indebted for the happiness and comfort that gilded her declining days. Her form was very much bent, her conversation was free and lively, and her eyes, though dimmed, retained much of their former lustre, and she was able to dispense with the assistance of spectacles to the last. She was a native of Cockfield, Durham, and she resided for some time at Long Newton, previous to her coming to her daughter's house, at Elton.

A gentleman named Hill, aged 100 years, died recently near Kells. He was one of the volunteers of 1782.

John Cryer, of Walton-le-Dale, a Greenwich out-pensioner, died on the 18th January. The deceased fought under Lord Nelson, in her Majesty's ship Conqueror, Capt. Pellew, at Trafalgar, and received the sword from the French commander-in chief, Admiral Villeneuve, on board the Queenlaure. He was at the taking of Genoa, and the storming of Cases; he also fought under Gen. Abercrombie in Egypt, and served under Lord Exmouth for five years. This brave man was sergeat and sergeant-major of the Royal Marines, Plymouth Division, for twenty-one years. The whole of his services during the French war were twenty-four years.

THE SHIP ANTARCTIC.—An inquest was held in New York, on Sunday, the 20th ult., over the body of a child which was born on board this ship, and died after her arrival, when the mother of the child testified as follows:

We had five hundred passengers on board; we were fourteen weeks and two days at sea before we landed in New York; we ran short of provisions, and there was a scarcity of water; I only received three pints of water for myself and daughter during each day; there was sickness on board, and one hundred and thirty persons died during the voyage; the ship was in a most filthy condition; the above number of passengers were all in the steerage, with the exception of a few in the cabin, and there was scarcely a berth but had some person sick in it.

THE OLD GREEN LANE.... By Eliza Cook.

'Twas the very merry summer time
That garlands, bills and dells,
And the south wind rung a fairy chime
Upon the fox-glove bells.
The cuckoo stood on the lady birch
To bid her last good-by—
The lark sprung over the village church,
And whistled to the sky,
And we had some from the harvest sheaves
A hilihe and tawny train,
And tracked our path with poppy leaves
Along the old green fano.

'Twas a pleasant way on a sunny day,
And we were a happy set,
As we idly beat where the streamlet went.
To get our fingers wet;
With the dog rose there, and the orchis there,
And the woodbine twining through,
With the broad trees meeting every where,
And the grass still damp with dew,
As I'll we all forgot in that blissful spot,
The names of care and pain,
As we lay on the bank by the shepherd's cot,
To rest in the old green lane,

Oh! days gone by! I can but sigh
As I think of that rich hour,
When my heart in its glee seemed to ha
Another wood-bird's power.
For though the trees be still as fair
And the wild bloom still as gay—
Though the south wind sends as sweet an air,
And Heaven as bright a day;
Yet the merry set are far and wide,
And we never shall meet again—
We shall never ramble side by side
Along that old green lane.

CONSUMPTION.—Two or three years ago, says the Scientific American, experiments were made by members of the London Faculty of Physicians in different hospitals, for the cure of diseases of the lungs, by breathing in warm medicated vapors. The success of the experiments was so gratifying, that an institution, Brompson Hospital, for the cure of bronchitis and consumption, was immediately established, and so favorable has been the result of the treatment that the number of patients admitted during the past year is between two and three thousand, and the hospital report shows that full seventy-five in every hundred have been completely cured.

THE STRANGER AND HIS FRIEND.

BY JAMES MONTGOMERY.

"Ye have done it unto me."—Matt. xxv, 40.

A poor wayfaring man of grief
Hath often cross'd me on my way,
Who sued so humbly for relief
That I could never answer, "Nay."
I had not power to ask his name,
Whither he went, or whence he came,
Yet was there something in his eye,
That won my love, I know not why.

Once, when my scanty meal was spread,
He enter'd; not a word he spake—
Just perishing for want of bread;
I gave him all; he blest it, brake
And ate—but gave me part again;
Twice was an angel's portion then,
For while I fed with eager haste,
That crust was manna to my taste.

I spied him, where a fountain burst
Clear from the rock: his strength was gone:
The heedless water mock'd his thirst.
He heard it, saw it hurrying on:
I ran to raise the sufferer up;
Thrice from the stream he drain'd my cup;
Dipt, and return'd it running o'er;
I drank, and never thirsted more.

'Twas night; the floods were out; it blew
A winter hurricane aloof;
I heard his voice abroad, and flew
To bid him welcome to my roof:
I warm'd, I clothed, I cheer'd my guest,
Laid him on my own couch to rest;
Then made the hearth my bed, and seem'd
In Eden's garden while I dream'd.

Stript, wounded, beaten, nigh to death,
I found him by the highway side;
I roused his pulse, brought back his breath,
Revived his spirit, and supplied
Wine, oil, refreshment; he was heal'd;
I had myself a wound conceal'd;
But from the hour forgot the smart,
And peace bound up my broken heart.

In prison I saw him next, condemn'd
To meet a traitor's doom at morn;
The tide of lying tongues I stemm'd,
And honor'd him midst shame and scorn;
My friendship's utmost zeal to try,
He asked, if I for him would die;
The flesh was weak, my blood ran chill,
But the free spirit cried, "I will."

Then in a moment to my view
The Stranger darted from disguise,
The tokens in his hands I knew,
My Saviour stood before mine eyes;
He spake; and my poor name He named:
"Of me thou hast not been ashamed;
These deeds shall thy memorial be;
Fear not, thou didst them unto Me."

From the Bible Society Record.

"THE BIBLE A PACK OF LIES."

DIALOGUE BETWEEN AN INFIDEL AND HIS CONSCIENCE.

INFIDEL.—The Bible is "nothing but a pack of lies."

CONSCIENCE.—You seem very much troubled with the falseness of the Bible. You never give yourself any trouble to dispute the truth of any other books, be they ever so false, if they have nothing to say of God, religion, heaven and hell. If the Bible is "nothing but a pack of lies," let it alone, to share the fate of all other lies. Why spend your time and breath in trying to persuade your neighbors and friends that the book is false?

I.—But I hate to see other people imposed upon and made fools of by the book.

C.—What hurt does the Bible do your neighbors who believe it? Does it make them bad company for you? Does it corrupt them, make them dishonest, disorderly members of society, unkind to you and others about them, and to each other! Can you not depend upon the word of one of these people who believe the Bible, as safely as upon the word of one of your brother infidels? And tell me, honestly, do you not find yourself sometimes secretly reposing more confidence in one of these praying, Sabbath-keeping, church-going, Bible-reading people, than in the generality of the men who join you in scoffing at the Bible, and who never pray nor observe the Sabbath, nor go to church, nor concern themselves in religion? If these things are so, then you do not, after all, really believe that the Bible befools your neighbors, or any body else. But if you pretend to be a man of common honesty, you had better not say so.

I.—But I know the Bible is not true.

C.—Please to bear in mind, that assertion is not always argument or evidence. Say it as often, and roundly, and angrily as you please, that "the Bible is all a pack of lies;" your repetition of your opinion that it is so, does not make it so. You must bring your proofs that the Bible is false. You are as great a fool yourself as any of your neighbors if you believe what you say, without being able to prove what you say. And more than this, "he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar;" you are a liar yourself, unless you make good your charges of falsehood upon the Bible.

I.—But I have read the writings of Paine, and Hume, and Voltaire, and of other learned and talented men, who have studied into the matter more than I have, and they all pronounce the Book false, and not fit to be believed; and they give their reasons for not believing it. And there are some of my neighbors who have also read the writings of those men, and they say they see not how those people who call themselves Christians can get away from the arguments of those men. And one of my neighbors says he has gone through what is called "experimental religion," and found that there is nothing in it. The Bible is all false, and religion is nothing but a delusion; that's my opinion upon the matter.

C.—What logic! "Other men say the Bible is not true and I think as they do about it;" therefore, "the Bible is a pack of lies." Really, sir, you are a greater paragon of credulity than any Christian on the face of the earth. A Christian never believes the Bible on such slender grounds as you disbelieve it. He has reasons for believing it—abundance of them; he is ready to give them, and is not ashamed to tell them. They are his own reasons, too; not borrowed, as yours are; not derived alone from the say-so of ministers and doctors of divinity, ever so pious, and learned, and wise. They are reasons which he sees, understands, and feels in his heart. But, one question let me put to you: "What if the Bible, after all your disbelief of it, should turn out to be true?"

I.—Put it cannot be true. I do not believe it ever will turn out to be true. Paine and Hume, and many others, say that it is nothing but a book of fables and falsehoods, fit only for old women and children and priests: and that's my opinion; and it is an opinion gaining ground in the world.

C.—Hear me, I say: What if, after all, the Bible should prove to be true? What then will become of you, and Paine, and Hume, and Voltaire, and all the rest of the infidels? Look at the fearfulness of the truths of the Bible, in their bearings upon you and them, and all other men who reject the Book. If, when you die, your soul awakes in that new disbelieved Eternity, and in the presence of that God of whom the Bible teaches, you will be compelled to believe things at which you now endeavor to laugh and scoff. You will find yourself in the solemn and awful presence of the God you have denied, and whose Book you have called a collection of falsehoods; will find that you are going to "stand before the judgment seat of Christ:" that there is a heaven, which you are unfit to enter, as being an enemy to Him who built it: and a hell, from consignment to which there will, for you, be no escape. You will then find that you have gone too far for the possibility of reconciliation with God, whom you have offended; that you can not step back into this life and upon the ground of probation and hope, try again for a better destiny. You, and the men who have deceived you, and those whom you have deceived, and among whom you have indulged yourself in railing at religion and the Bible, and the God of the Bible, will be serious then. The terrors of finding yourselves in the presence and within the power of a holy and just God, will have put an eternal finish to your scepticism; and you will "believe and tremble" for ever. You may talk of the strength of the numbers believing as you do, that the Bible is not true. Hear what the God of the Book itself says: "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished:" and look, too, at the fact, that unbelief of God is especially declared to be the peculiarly damning sin of the soul, and hell the portion which a righteous God has especially appointed for the "unbelievers."

And once more hear me, while I point you to the warning of the Bible: "Repent, therefore, of this thy wickedness, and pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee:" and hearken to the merciful invitations, which even an infidel, yet in this world of hope, may, if he will, accept: "He that believeth on the Son of God hath everlasting life." "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved."

FAITH.

If we consider all religion to consist in faith, we must still come to the same conclusion. We know how often our blessed Lord speaks of faith, and believing in Him, as indispensably necessary for every one who would receive any benefit from Him; and as that qualification in man, which is ever quite certain to obtain from Him any thing that we can desire. How often does He assure us, in various ways, that whatsoever we ask in faith, we shall receive! Such are those expressions in the Gospels: "If thou canst believe;" "All things are possible to him that believeth." And if there is any misgiving, any difficulty, any impossibility of being cured and benefitted by Him, it is on account of our want of faith. Thus to the disciples, when they could not cast out the evil spirit, He declared the reason was because of their unbelief, for if they had faith they might move mountains from their place. And when they called out to Him, in fear and distress at the storm, He rebuked them, saying, "O! ye of little faith, wherefore did ye doubt?"

To have faith, therefore, in God, through Jesus Christ, was the cure for every disorder, the alleviation of every distress; to have faith in God only, as infinitely just, and who, the Scriptures declare to us, is "a consuming fire," might be more difficult, as our weak nature might be overwhelmed with fear before Him: but as He is manifested to us in Jesus Christ, as God the Father, the Father of our Lord, and in Him the Father of us all, how shall we not have full faith and confidence in Him!

And thus our Lord seems to imply, in those words of encouragement to His disciples, "Let not our heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in Me;" as if to believe in Him was a full remedy for all trouble of heart.

So far, therefore, as we have this faith which is so essentially required of all Christians, without which, indeed, they can have no life, it is very evident that we shall give thanks for all things at all times. This faith takes the sting out of every evil, and sweetens the bitter waters of calamity by the word of the Cross. [Plain Sermons.

THE CIVILIZATION OF AFRICA.

The Colonization Society are in no way disheartened, though their illustrious President, Henry Clay, is dead, and they have a turbulent opposition from the Abolitionists, on l every now and then a casual back-set. At their late Thirty-sixth Anniversary it was reported that 656 colored emigrants had been sent by the Society to Liberia the past year, of whom 403 were free born. Hon. Mr. Everett, in the course of his address on the occasion, describes the impracticability of all attempts to civilize Africa but through Africans:

"Thus you see, at the very moment when the work is ready to commence, the instruments are prepared. Do I err in supposing that the same Augnst Providence which has arranged or has permitted the mysterious sequence of events to which I have referred, has also called out and is inviting these chosen agents to enter upon the work! Every thing else has been tried and failed. Commercial adventure on the part of individuals has been unsuccessful; strength, courage, endurance, almost superhuman, have failed; well-appointed expeditions, fitted out under the auspices of powerful associations and powerful Governments, have ended in the most calamitous failure; and it has been proved at last, by all this experience, that the white race, of itself, cannot civilize Africa.

"Sir, when that most noble expedition I think in 1841 was fitted out, under the highest auspices in England, to found an agricultural colony at the confluence of the Niger and the Chad, out of one hundred and fifty white persons that formed a part of it, every man sickened, and all but three or four died. On the other hand, out of one hundred and fifty colored men that formed part of the expedition, only three or four sickened, and they were men who had passed some years in the West Indies and in Europe, and not one died. I think that fact, in reference to the civilization of Africa, is worth, I had almost said, all the treasure and all the suffering of that ill-fated expedition.

"Sir, you can not civilize Africa—you Caucasian—you proud white man—you all-boasting, all-daring Anglo-Saxon; you can not, do this work. You have subjugated Europe; the native races of this country are melting before you as the untimely snows of April beneath a vernal sun; you have possessed yourselves of India, you threaten China and Japan; the farthest isles of the Pacific are not distant enough to escape your grasp, or insignificant enough to elude your notice; but this great Central Africa lies at your doors, and defies your power. Your war-steamers and your squadrons may range along the coast, but neither on the errands of peace, nor on the errands of war, can you penetrate into and long keep the interior. The God of nature, for purposes inscrutable, but no doubt to be reconciled with His wisdom and goodness, has drawn a cordon across the chief inlets that you can not pass. You may hover on the coast, but woe to you if you attempt to make a permanent lodging in the interior! Their poor mud-built villages will oppose no resistance to your arms; but Death sits portress at their undefended gates. Yellow fevers, and blue plagues, and intermittent poisons, that you can see as well as feel, hover in the air. If you attempt to go up the rivers, pestilence shoots from the mangroves that fringe their noble banks; and the all-glorious sun, that kindles every thing else into life and power, darts down disease and death into your languid frame. No, no, Anglo-Saxon, this is no part of your vocation. You may direct the way, you may survey the coast, you may point your finger into the interior; but you must leave it to others to go and abide there. The God of nature, in another branch of his family, has chosen out the instruments of this great work—descendants of the torrid clime, children of the burning vertical sun—and fitted them by centuries of stern discipline for this most noble work.

"From foreign realms and lands remote,
Supported by His care,
They pass unharmed through burning climes,
And breathe the tainted air."

"Sir, I believe that Africa will be civilized, and civilized by the descendants of those who were torn from the land. I believe it because I will not think that this great fertile continent is to be forever left waste. I believe it because I see no other agency fully competent to the work. I believe it because I see in this agency a most wonderful adaptation."

M.

BE COMPREHENSIVE.

Talk to the point, and stop when you have reached it. The faculty some possess of making one idea cover a quire of paper, is not good for much. Be comprehensive in all you say, or write. To fill a volume upon nothing is a credit to nobody; though Lord Chesterfield wrote a very clever poem upon nothing.

There are men who get one idea into their heads, and but one, and they make the most of it. You can see it and almost feel it when in their presence. On all occasions it is produced, till it is worn as thin as charity. They remind us of a twenty-four pounder discharged at a humming-bird. You hear a tremendous noise, see a volume of smoke, but you look in vain for its effects. The bird is sheltered to atoms. Just so with the idea. It is enveloped in a cloud, and lost amid the rumblings of words and flourishes. Short letters, sermons, speeches and paragraphs are favorites with us. Commend us to the young man who wrote to his father: "Dear sir, I am going to be married;" and also to the old gentleman, who replied: "Dear son, go ahead."

Such are the men ready for action. They do more than they say. The half is not told, in their cases. They are worth their weight in gold for every purpose in life. Reader, be short; and we will be short with our advice.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE.

These two Universities, says the editor of the "Household Words," consist of forty-one colleges—twenty-four at Oxford, and seventeen at Cambridge. These are two learned corporations, governed by their own laws and their own dignitaries, assembling in Oxford under the name of a Convocation, and in Cambridge, under that of a Senate. Each college, however, has its own peculiar laws, its own funds, and its own special character. One is more devoted to theology, another to philosophy, another to classical literature, another to medicine; and one or two are distinguished, like the Magdalens at Cambridge, for such qualifications as are more akin to the arts and mysteries of the grand turf than to any of the fine arts, or the mystic meaning of the white surplice.

In each University, one college takes the lead of the rest, like a Triton among the fishes. In Oxford, it is Christ's Church; and in Cambridge it is Trinity. There are the royal apartments for the sovereign; and there, upon the largest scale, you may perceive the distinguishing peculiarities of college life. Trinity College, Cambridge, is, we believe, the richest college in the world; but its chapel is not so large, nor so transcendently beautiful as that of King's College; nor is its dining-hall so large as that of Christ's Church, Oxford. The finest chapel in the world is that of King's College, and yet it is only appropriated for seventy Eaton boys, for whose sake alone King's College was endowed, and the chapel built. That chapel is three hundred and sixteen feet interior, two hundred and ninety-one in length, and the height of the ceiling, seventy-eight. It contains twenty-six windows, each fifty feet high, and all but one—the west—magnificently painted, and so costly in their preservation that the very cleaning and burnishing of each window, which must be done in London, piece by piece, inflicts a bill of £200 on the college treasury. Such magnificence is not to be seen in any cathedral in England. Trinity College Chapel is smaller, being only two hundred and four feet in length, interior, and forty-four feet high, though even this is much longer than Oxford Cathedral, which is the chapel of Christ Church College. But as Trinity College contains about one-third of the students of Cambridge, its chapel is filled to overflowing, and is one of the most interesting sights which the University presents; for, at each of the Colleges and Universities on what are called surplice days—that is Saturday, Sunday, and saints' days, or eves—the students all attend in their white surplices; and there, at one view, you see the future chancellors, bishops, prime ministers, judges, and legislators of England.

The kitchen of Trinity College, Cambridge, supplies food for one thousand, one hundred mouths daily. The hall, which is one hundred feet long, forty broad, and fifty high, is not sufficiently large to dine one-half of the students. There are two dinners, and many dine at their own apartments. The cellar contains about four hundred barrels of ale, four of which are emptied daily. Even the butler keeps his carriage and his livery servants, and is reckoned a man of £3000 per annum. Food there is over-abundant; for nothing is ever sent twice to table. The remnants go to certain officials; and a table at Trinty College is sometimes worth £200 a year to him or her who has the clearing of it. Next in size to Trinity is St. John's, and these two monopolize more than half of the students, as Christ's Church, Oxford, one-third of the Oxonians.

Gradations of rank, like the four Indian castes, prevail in both Universities. In Cambridge, it is: 1. Fellow-Commoners—noblemen and rich gentlemen, who have the privilege of dining at the Fellows' table, and wear gold trappings on their gowns, and gold tassels on their caps; or if they choose to wear hats, they may. 2. Pensioners—who receive no pension, like state pensioners, but pay for all in less expensive style than the former. 3. Scholars—who are elected on the foundation, and have various emoluments, according to the value of the scholarship. 4. Sizars—who have commons free, and dine on the remnants of the Fellows' table. In Oxford, the four castes are Noblemen, Gentlemen-Commoners, Commoners, and Servitors.

Education at the Universities consists, for the most part, of private tutorship. Each student attends the class-room of a tutor, either in college or out of it, and reads with him as at school; and there are public examinations, at which he has opportunities of displaying his abilities and the progress he has made. There are also public lectures, which he may or may not attend, according to his professional intentions. Every facility is afforded to the industrious, and every encouragement to the talented and the ingenious; and the associations of a university residence are most inspiring, for those who are susceptible of inspiration. The names and the images of the great surround him at every step; their memories are everywhere hallowed. The very mulberry tree that Milton planted with his own hands, in the garden of Christ's College, Cambridge, is carefully preserved, propped up, and the excoriated parts covered with sheet lead.

"I compare the art of spreading rumors," says John Newton, "to the art of pin making. There is usually some truth, which I call wires: as this passes from hand to hand, one gives it a polish, another a point; others make and put on the head, and at last the pin is completed."

If, in thy journey through life, thou overtake or are overtaken by any one who is seeking truth for its own sake, thou needst not inquire from whence he came, or from which particular tribe he sprang, but frankly give him thy hand; for be assured, thou hast found a safe and instructive companion.

If our affections and feelings are moved in social exercises, and are cold and insensible when we are alone with God, we have great reason to suspect our state.

SATAN AND THE CHURCH.

The following anecdote is transcribed from a periodical published in this country nearly fifty years ago. It illustrates an awful truth, that wicked persons are agents of Satan, who, in punishment for sin, are delivered up to him, and who become his slaves to execute his will in the world which he governs. Happy indeed is the assembly of the people of God where he is not found!

The members of a congregation had frequently met to deliberate on measures which involved their comfort, and even their existence; but a troublesome person, whose popular eloquence gave him a dangerous influence, opposed by defeated every attempt to carry these measures into effect. At one of these meetings, a member, who had the welfare of the society much at heart, appeared, while his antagonist was in the heat of debate, to be fast asleep: the friends of the society, astonished at his indifference, at length roused him up. He started, rubbing his eyes, saying, in apparent agitation—

"I have had a strange dream."

Every eye was turned to him, and every ear open. "A dream! what was it?"

"I dreamed," said he, "that I was in hell, where I saw Satan, who inquired: 'What news from the earth?' I told him I came from the place where the congregation were met to decide on business which had long distracted them. This information threw him into great excitement. 'I must instantly go there,' said he, and was making ready to set off immediately. But just as he was departing, he asked me whether his friend —— was at the meeting or not. I assured him he was not only there, but very active. 'Well, well, then,' said Satan, 'I will not go after all; my presence is unnecessary. I know that my friend —— will do my business as well as I could do it myself.'"

This epilogue produced an effect which nothing else could produce. It silenced the noisy orator, and the measures, which he had hitherto successfully opposed, were readily adopted.

CRUCIFIED WITH CHRIST.

I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me.—Gal. ii. 20. "As if he had said, 'I have fellowship with Christ in his death, as to its merit and value, being justified for His sake; so, also, as to its virtue and efficacy, inasmuch as His dying to sin, has been the means of my dying to sin; and yet again, as I have obtained both justification and sanctification through the Cross of Christ, I am through it crucified to the law as a covenant of works, and to the world as an object of complacent delight.' Nevertheless I live: 'Not by myself, or of myself, but Christ in me. I live to good purpose, and that right royally and deliciously; but it is Christ that keeps the house, not I. I cultivate the graces, subdue corruptions, perform duty, and vanquish temptations, but the strength by which 'tis act comes from Christ.' True faith is self-renouncing, and the obedience of faith is full of self-denial. It keeps its possessor low, both in respect of what he hath, and in what he doth. It confesses that he lives because his Surety died, and it consents to an inward and daily crucifixion in order to a due meetness for the crown. It acknowledges God as sole benefactor; and while it largely and importunately craves the best gifts from God, it ascribes the entire glory of all gifts and graces to Him who gave them. When the servants came to give up their accounts to their Lord, every one for his pound, how humbly do those who were faithful speak! Lord thy pound hath gained ten pounds, saith the first. Thy pound hath gained five pounds, saith another. They ascribe both principal and interest to their Lord's benefaction. So true believers ascribe all their happiness, usefulness, and piety to the gracious assistance of God. By the grace of God, I am what I am."

THINGS ETERNAL

Eternity does not touch our hearts as it ought, because it is altogether unseen; and this is why Faith is so great a thing—this is why every thing depends on our believing: for faith, or belief, is the turning away of the heart from the temporal things, which are in sight, to the eternal things which are out of sight. It is turning from the false joys of this world, and seeking comfort in Christ and His Cross; it is looking higher than the friends whom we see, and who, whatever be their good meaning, can only do us good from without, and seeking help and support from the Holy Spirit, who is given us to abide in our very heart and mind. It is denying ourselves in respect of earthly enjoyments, in order that we may be the purer and fitter to receive the unspeakable gift which He offers in His Holy Communion. This is Faith; this is that good thing, so much praised in Holy Scripture, by which God offers to justify and save us, both soul and body, in the world to come.

Let us, more and more, practice this life of faith; let us daily and hourly exercise ourselves in setting the eternal things against the temporal; the pure, blessed, invisible, against the ordinary things which we see. It is in our power to do so if we will; for, indeed, this living by faith is what we continually practice in the affairs of this world. How often, for example, do men abstain from discreditable things, because they are afraid of losing their character; they consider beforehand what people will say of them; they make it present to their minds by a kind of faith; and this helps them to stand against many pressing temptations. With no more trouble and effort of mind, and with a far greater blessing, they might represent to themselves the great day of the Lord, and what Christ and His holy saints and angels will say to them.

REFUGE IN TROUBLE.

They who love God, love to go to Him. They love prayer. They love that intercourse which is sustained between the soul and God at the mercy-seat. They love it at all times. But at no time does the Christian go to God with such eagerness as when he is in trouble. When the heart is aching and bleeding—when it throbs with grief, almost to bursting—Oh, how good that refuge! How good the overshadowing of the mercy-seat! It is as grateful for him to go there when he is worried with cares, or dangers, or bereavements, as for a hunted deer to hide himself in the depth of forest and to cool himself in its living fountains: as grateful as for the frighted bird to alight safely in its quiet nest; as grateful as for the wearied, terror-stricken child to leap to its mother's arms. It is as grateful; it is as natural. And there before God, in the day of his adversity, it is with a full, and fervent, and eloquent heart, that the child of God pours out his troubles and his wants. There is no coldness, no formality, about his devotions then. There is no want of words, no stammering upon his tongue. He comes under the impulse of a beating. He comes in earnest. He comes with boldness. He plunges into the fountain. He lays hold upon the Almighty arm with his whole strength. He must—for to none else can he go. He must—for none else can know his heart's bitterness. He must—for nothing else can suit his taste; nothing else can touch the spot of pain within him. And thus he is brought into close earnest communion with God. He throws himself, as it were, upon the very arms of his Father; lays his throbbing head upon his very bosom; lifts up his tearful eyes and drinks in the very light of his countenance.

A little bird sitting amid the foliage of a tree is frightened by some noise beneath. He flies to a higher branch. Again—and he leaps to a higher. Again—to the topmost bough. Again—and he soars away toward heaven. Just so with the Christian—just so. Disturbed by the commotions, and terrors, and troubles of things beneath, his first impulse is to leap upward. Again—to ascend higher and still higher: and at last, to fly away toward heaven—toward his God, where, for the time, no distress or adversity can reach him; to the sure place of refuge, the free expanse of undisturbed communion with his Father.

Reverence Due to the Sanctuary.

If, as we have shown, God, though not sensibly yet really, is present by a special and gracious presence in His court, is not at least the same reverence that we would show to a distinguished earthly guest, benefactor or ruler, due to the Invisible, but Mighty, and Holy and Gracious Ruler of the Universe? Is it fitting to gaze irreverently, to whisper, to smile, to read, to weave the web of our vain imaginations, or even to slumber in the presence and under the gaze of those blazing eyes, too pure to look upon iniquity? Trifle, if you choose, with wealth and character and worldly education and health, and this bodily life itself, but trifle not with God's house and day, and worship; for it is to squander your hopes of heaven, and to fritter away the staple of your salvation, and to commit suicide upon your souls. The mere habit of association should teach you such reverence. If we look with interest and respect on the observatory where Science has toiled to read the starry pages of the unrolled heavens—where some eminent astronomer, like Herschell, lifting his telescope, has looked off from the edge, as it were, of our solar system, far into the azure depths of space, how much more regard and solemn interest should invest the Christian sanctuary; the observatory of Faith, where, taking her stand, she has looked beyond the flaming bounds of stars, and systems of stars, into the eternal depths of heaven or hell. Here souls have been renewed, and here sealed to perdition.

Here, for a time, it has seemed as if the fiery pit had its covering lifted off, and its smoke went up as the smoke of a great furnace, and the wail of its unremitting and immitigable anguish arose, piercing all hearts and shaking all knees, the cry of a Despair that sate eternally knawing the core of the sinner's heart.

Here, again, the soul, in communion with its God, has seemed already to discern the glories of the beatific vision, and has caught the reverberating thunder of those hallelujahs that, with their resounding and incessant anthem, girdle the throne of light. Here the Saviour is seen by glimpses through the lattices of his ordinances: and here is the Pisgah on which we stand and gaze, till the heart is faint with longing, on the land that is afar off, and on the King in his beauty. Is such a place the proper scene for levity and indifference; for the witling's sneer and the trifler's thoughtlessness? [W. R. Williams.

NOW, WHERE'S THE DIFFERENCE?—A car load of putrid beef, on its way to market, was seized in the streets of New York, one day last week. [Exchange.

That was all right enough. Why, of course. Nobody has any objections to seizing putrid beef and destroying it. To sell it is contrary to law, and contrary to common sense. Pounce on to the man that will dare to do it! But see here. There is a talk of making a law by which something that is sold to people to drink, which is quite as injurious to the public health, and infinitely more injurious to public morals, can be seized and destroyed in the same way. Any objections, any body? "Yes, yes, hold on there. That would be taking away a man's rights." Don't you see? You can take away the liberty of selling bad meat; but you can't take away the liberty of selling bad drink. That's liquor, and you can't stop a man from selling it. It's—it's—"unconstitutional." Reader, you can draw your own conclusions. [Erie Commercial.

Some good people see in every misfortune that befalls themselves a trial—in every one which happens to their neighbors, a judgment.

LORD HAILES AND THE NEW TESTAMENT.

"I was dining," said Dr. Buchanan, "some time ago, with a literary party at old Mr. Abercrombie's of Trillibody, (the father of Mr. Ralph Abercrombie, who was slain in Egypt,) and we spent the evening together. A gentleman present put a question which puzzled the whole company. It was this: Supposing all the New Testaments in the world had been destroyed at the end of the third century, could their contents have been recoved from the writings of the three first centuries? The question was novel to all, and no one even hazarded a guess in answer to the inquiry.

"About two months after this meeting, I received an invitation to breakfast with Lord Hailes, (Sir David Dalrymple,) next morning. He had been of the party. During breakfast he asked me if I recollected the curious question about the possibility of recovering the contents of the New Testament from the writings of the three first centuries? I remember it well, and have thought of it often, without being able to form any opinion or conjecture of the subject.

"Well," said Lord Hailes, "that question quite accorded with the turn or taste of my antiquarian mind. On returning home, as I knew I had all the writers of those centuries, I began immediately to collect them, that I might set to work on the arduous task as soon as possible." Pointing to a table covered with papers, he said: "There I have been busy these two months, searching for chapters, half chapters and sentences of the New Testament, and have marked down what I found, and where I found it, so that any person may examine and see for himself. I have actually discovered the whole New Testament, except seven or eleven verses, (I forget which,) which satisfies me that I could discover them also. Now," said he, "here was a way in which God concealed or hid the treasures of his word, that Julian, the apostate emperor, and other enemies of Christ, who wished to extirpate the Gospel from the world, never would have thought of; and though they had, they never could have effected their destruction." [Memoir of Haldane.

JOHN ERICSSON.

The Literary World furnishes the following particulars of the life of this gentleman, "whose name now takes rank with Franklin, Watt, Morse, and other great benefactors of mankind." He is a man fifty years of age, of a muscular, well developed, and strongly knit frame; he is of middle size, has a firm tread, a person who gives the assurance of reserved strength, and a head with all the proper intellectual developments, the high forehead prominent brow, marking the man of thought and the philosopher; he has a dark complexion of hair, somewhat whitened by time, black eyes, introspective and reflective rather than observing, a decisive mouth, and the mixed temperament, combining the nervous and bilious, which distinguishes the powerful in action and steady endurance. His head rises in a phrenological summit of benevolence; he was heard to remark—the only sign he gave of self-congratulation on his triumph—that he was proud to be the means, through his invention, of saving life.

He was born in Sweden, in 1803. He early showed a taste for mechanics, and at the age of eleven attracted the notice of Count Platen, who obtained for him a cadetship in an engineer corps. He afterwards entered the Swedish army, and was employed in the survey of Northern Sweden. While occupied with his favorite study of mechanics, he projected his flame engine. In 1826, he visited England. While there in 1829, he competed for the prize offered by the Liverpool and Manchester Railway for the best locomotive, and produced an engine that produced the wonderful speed, at that time, of fifty miles an hour. His propeller, his semi-cylindrical engine, his centrifugal blower, his distance instrument, for measuring distances at sea, his hydrostatic gauge, his pyrometer, and other ingenious inventions, have already made the name of Ericsson famous in the scientific world; the Caloric Engine, which has now arrived at the consummation of success, was brought before the scientific world of London twenty years ago, and was rejected by men of science as an impracticability, and as involving the absurdity of perpetual motion. Faraday, Brunel, and Ure, after a short resistance, finally conceded the practicability of the invention, and Faraday endorsed the caloric engine in those famous lectures of his, before the London Institution. Fox, whose name is identified with the success of the London Exhibition, was a pupil of Ericsson.

ALL ARE NEEDED.—Society is like an army. The infantry, dragoons and artillery all occupy separate squads; but yet, in action, all is unison. So in society—the hopeful, the impulsive, the deliberate, the hasty, are all needed. But love must unite them, and then we have a perfect man. Let the weak points of one man be placed to the strong points of another, and we shall then make society; progress, growth, is now the moving spirit. Progress is the locomotive, progressives the engineers, conservatism the brake, conservators the brakemen. All are needed in their proper place. Both elements should be recognized.

A BLESSED PROSPECT.—The ties which bind together a family who all have a good Christian hope shall never be dissolved. Death comes among them, but we take the Bible in our hands and inscribe on their tombstone, "Pleasant in life, and in eternity not divided." One after another falls, till the last of the circle is carried to his long home, but the grave can not retain them. By and by the family is to meet again; husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants, are one day to stand within the gates of the New Jerusalem, all washed, and sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God, to whom will be rendered glory eve

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, March 12.

PLEA FOR THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

Rev. W. B. N. sends the result of what he says was "a short speech" at one of his appointments—eight subscribers. At one of them! Supposing he has six appointments here, would be, in a very short time as the result of a few short speeches, obtained nearly fifty subscribers to the Advocate. But the greater number of circuits have more than six appointments. See how easily, and quickly, the thing might be done—those ten thousand subscribers obtained! Is it strange that the friends of the Advocate speak for, and expect, that many?

When it appears how much good may be done by so little effort, we cannot forbear an occasional paragraph stirring up the minds of our brethren to remember these things. A few short speeches made for it, and the religious press would speak for itself in thousands of families where, without a special effort for its introduction, it will never be felt. Consider brethren of the ministry how valuable, as an auxiliary, is it to your work and every good work:

First, It advocates, illustrates, and defends the same doctrines, and discipline, in promoting which you spend your lives, and count them well spent.

Second, It does not detract from your support; it does not divide your means, while it helps in your work.

Third, Though it heralds the truths of the gospel, and preaches by its essays, it does not divide your congregations with you. Where it is heard, you have no fewer hearers.

Fourth, You can visit your congregations personally, and often at much inconvenience, only at intervals of months. The religious paper, on the same errand, visits them every week. It goes before you quickening public attention upon the great objects of your mission, and bespeaking for you a favorable hearing. It follows after your discourse with its "line upon line, line upon line."

Fifth, Those that go forth to war, conquering and to conquest, do more than victoriously overrun territory—they leave garrisons behind to secure their possessions. So must we do. The spirit of error and proselytism is abroad. All portions of the field demand the ministers presence; and while he is here and there much of the hopeful fruit of his ministry is spoiled. Before he leaves let him throw a garrison into every family—a religious newspaper.

And all this costs but a little looking after, a few words—"a short speech." Who will not make the speech? It may be a short one. It will not cost you much labor to deliver, or time to prepare it. You will not feel exhausted after it. And be sure, after making the "short speech," to make the application, also. A good many of these short speeches will quite do away with the long faces of editors, and give them instead, what is better—a long list of paying subscribers.

No. 56 Gravier street.—The Book Store of H. D. McGinnis is going a flourishing business. Perhaps it may be esteemed no favor to our friends in the country, or Mr. McGinnis, if we should direct them, by this notice, to call upon him, as already he seems to have as many calls as he can attend to. The boxes of books are rolled in, sold, re-boxed and rolled out in brisk style. For particulars, refer to his ADVERTISEMENT.

"SOLDIERS OF THE POPE."

The Catholic Messenger quite forgets its propriety, and makes symptoms of a moral spasm at the "Catechism for the use of Roman Catholics," gratuitously furnished by us, two weeks ago. The only comfort we can offer our neighbor is that offered by the doctor to a charity patient that wouldn't mend, and kept coming back for another prescription. Mixing a pretty severe dose—"Here, take that, good woman, and if it doesn't work, come back to-morrow, and I will put a seton in your neck."

To be plain: Those telling tracts of Napoleon Roussel are not yet out. They were imported expressly for the use they are being put to. After awhile will appear one on the Jesuits, and after awhile another and another on appropriate subjects. We say, after awhile; for, though wholesome, they are difficult of digestion, and we wish them thoroughly digested.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

We are at length enabled to congratulate our readers and the whole country upon the auspicious action of Congress on this important matter. On the 2d of March the House of Representatives adopted, by an overwhelming majority, the amendment from the Senate appropriating $150,000 for the necessary surveys.

The vote in both Houses was very decided in its character—nearly two to one—and very clearly indicates that the views of Congress are those of the great mass of the nation.

We trust the new President's attention will be at once directed to the subject—that competent corps of engineers will, without delay, be placed upon all the routes which have been suggested by the friends of each, and that Congress may thus be enabled, at an early day, to [illegible] measures for the completion of a [illegible] will have no parallel among the [illegible] of art, and of which every American [illegible] be proud.

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS.

We noticed, a fortnight ago, what our Baptist brethren were doing towrd establishment and Church extension in this city. Other denominations are up and doing. There seems to be a most laudable and determined feeling among them to make New Orleans the centre of their evangelical operations in the South-West.

It is currently reported that Dr. Clapp's congregation have raised, by subscription, $70,000 for Church building.

Our Episcopal friends have nearly completed a brick Church in the Fourth District, on Jackson street, of Gothic style, and substantial and commodious. The site is very eligible, and a large and influential congregation will soon be gathered there, under the excellent paster. We hear it is also contemplated to supercede the building on Camp street, (St. Paul's,) by a more durable and costly structure.

A pamphlet has been laid on our table which presents Presbyterian action in a style of characteristic energy and perseverance. It gives the outlines of large operations. A lot, near the Bible House lot, has been purchased for about six thousand dollars. A house is to be erected thereon, in which a large depository of the publications of the Presbyterian Board is to be kept, and a newspaper (an official Church organ) published. Texas and the southern portion of Arkansas, with parts of Tennessee and Florida, Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi are to be concentrated upon this enterprise. This brings to bear a powerful moral force, and the concentration is entirely practicable and must be of large importance in its results. We extract from the pamphlet;

"It is confidently believed by your Board that a bright day has already dawned upon New Orleans and the South-West at large. The people are awakening to the necessity of Railroads and the support of home manufactories. The increase of our population and the advance of property is looked upon as certain from this date. Nor is there a doubt on our minds of the entire practicability of carrying out the wishes of the Synod in the matters above contemplated. All that is wanting is faith, union and action. If the country congregations will help those of the towns and cities at once, this great enterprise can be set going immediately. Not a syllable of argument is necessary either to convince the Churches of their ability, united, to sustain this enterprise or to persuade them of its vast importance to us as a denomination. It is only by assuming and maintaining that position in regard to schools and the religious literature of our country, to which, as a denomination, our wealth, talents, learning and numbers entitle us, that we can hope to do our duty as citizens and as a branch of the Church of Christ. There is much land before us to be possessed. This is the day and the hour for us to arise and enter upon its possession. We must have schools and books and newspapers advocating our doctrines, if we would maintain ourselves in this age of ceaseless enterprise and progress."

The design is large, but resolute, and well planned, and we hope for its abundant success. As a clerical friend, speaking about it, pleasantly said to us the other day: "We Presbyterians believe when a thing is predestinated, that it has got to be done, and so we go at it." Not the least objection to that article in the Creed of Faith.

The Lutherans are getting along in their cosy, Dutch fashion. They are a mighty people for a family broil, in a quiet way. But it is all among themselves. They keep going to Church and sing in the most delightful strains. Now and then a Rationalist, from the hotbeds of the old country, gets among them, and is tolerated with more forbearance than it seems to us he ought to be. We rejoice to believe that among this people there are many of the family of Christ. But they are stationary. We see no Churches building—no new congregations forming.

The Christians (Campbellites) have a neat, small Church, well filled. They enjoy much unity, and are prospering.

And what are the Methodists doing? The best we can. While others are resolving to have a denominational newspaper, we have one: the Advocate being a fixed fact. We have no official depository for sale of Methodist publications; but just beneath our office H. D. McGinnis, successor to John Ball, keeps the most of them on sale. He receives and fills numerous orders. Mr. Ball could not have left a more accommodating successor. We are glad to see his business has increased this winter thirty per cent. over any previous season. Notwithstanding, when the General Conference gets ready and sees it to be to the interest of the M. E. Church, South, to establish a DEPOSITORY in New Orleans, and provide therein a suit of rooms for the Christian Advocate—that will be an advance upon present position—a large advance.

Our German Mission are doing a good work. Feeble and small as they are, compared to the large and increasing demands upon them, they are the principal evangelical instruments now operating among the Germans. The aid granted them from Louisiana and mainly from Alabama last year, has been, and is being judiciously invested. It has given appreciable relief and enlargement to their operations.

The calamity of having two large chapels burned down that befel the New Orleans Methodists, is being repaired. The Carondelet street Church (vice old Poydras) has held a large congregation the past fall and winter in its basement. The architect engages to have the building complete in sixty days. When complete, few Church buildings will present a more chaste and elegant finish, and none in the South will accommodate a larger audience.

On visiting the lower part of the city last last week, we were not less surprised than gratified to find that the walls of Moreau street Church, going up on the old foundations, had reached a height of ten or twelve feet. Taking good heart in their trouble, and applying the promise to Churches as well as persons, that all things work together for good, they rose up to build, Capt. Robertson, like Nehemiah, directing the work. It goes on finely. The new will differ in a few points from the former edifice, and the difference be both an economy and improvement.

[For the N. O. Christian Advocate.]

"AS UNKNOWN, AND YET WELL KNOWN."

To become a notoriety is an easy and insignificant achievement. A casualty, a scandal may do this. Among the

"——— Few immortal names
That were not born to die,"

are reckoned knaves of renown and villains of high degree. They are passed round by the press; they are the theme of table talk; the multitude is familiar with their history. "An eminent man" is equivocal praise. There is such a thing as "bad eminence."

Grace cures an itching ear. Grace corrects these morbid cravings for poor human famousness, and reconciles the Christian to labor and suffer and die, with little concern about the applause of earthly witnesses, so that from heaven the approving eye of God looks down. Grace tunes his heart to a strain of sublime indifference—

"Let me be little and unknown, Loved and prized by THEE alone."

And yet the Christian can not, even in the humblest sphere, be hid. He may not be a notoriety, "a distinguished arrival;" his name and deeds may never have sounded through the brazen trumpet's throat; the list of "notabilities" may not include him; to those seeking out "stars" he may be passed by "as unknown;" yet there is a circle where he is not only known, but known for good—"well known"—and in such a way as it is well to be known.

It was an evening that invited out, and, with the pastor of a Church not set down on the guide-books, we took a long ramble through the city. He figured not among the platform orators, his movements were not chronicled in the gazette, and but for a minute direction privately furnished, we should never have found his dwelling. On inquiry at the chief places, none could tell where he lived. Indeed, one person believed he had heard of such a name, but to them all he was "unknown." With the name of Dr. Sachs, who lived on a salary of five thousand a year, they were familiar, and others of that class. Knowing that our friend was not brilliant, we began to fear he was living to little purpose in such a great mart. But we knew, also, that he was a faithful and industrious man, and we should find him working away somewhere.

We had not proceeded far, and a drayman, mounted high on a pile of cotton bales, bowed to us. The hat was tipped, almost to taking off, and on the sable face was an expression of deference and grateful love that might be read half across the street. "He seems to know you, and to be happy at the sight of you. Who is he?" It was one of a congregation of blacks he had gathered and regularly instructed on Sabbath evenings. This man had been awakened and converted under his ministry. "As unknown, and yet well known."

Farther on, a group of children met us—a family group of three little girls and a brother. They had been gathering chips and shavings at a carpenter shop close by, which they were taking home to save the wood bill. Their faces brightened. They whispered, "that's our preacher." "We've already learnt our Sunday School lessons," said the two oldest, "and read through the books." Encouraging them, they drew nearer and told the titles of the books they had got from the Sunday School library—that blessed circulating library for the poor—and they went on to say that mother was most well again, and was going to bring the baby to be baptized. "You seem well known to them, and they are not ashamed to own you." "Nor am I ashamed to own them," was the reply. The brief history of the case was being told—how that during an epidemic that raged a few summers before, when few of the distinguished clergy remained in the city, he had become known to this poor, but industrious family, continued to visit them, the mother had professed religion and joined the Church, the father was measurably reformed, and the children put in the way we found them—when we halted before a house bearing the marks of comfortable independence. Such a house as "good livers" live in.

We found ourselves in company that opened a welcome to the very heart and sanctuary of that home. The sick was there, and the doctor on a professional visit. It needed no penetration to discover that our friend was "well known" there. Two of the best thought-of people in any family had called in at the same hour—"our preacher" and "our doctor." The physician was not a member of his congregation; he had a pew in Dr. Skylight's Church; but from mutual remarks and inquiries about the man that had the consumption, and the case at the hospital, and this and that case that was better or worse, it was clear they were used to meeting at the house where it is better to go than to the house of feasting. And as our friend retired to the sick couch to feel the moral pulse of its languid occupant, the doctor said to us: "Good man, that; when I die I want him to be there."

We left soon after the doctor, but staid long enough to see from the looks and the speeches, of the young and old, even of the children and servants, that the preacher was "well known" there. Following us to the door, the mother said: "Do come soon. The dear creature suffers and talks of you so much. She says your prayers are such a comfort. She is always more cheerful after you've been in." Our friend was "well known" in that sick chamber.

The walk was long; and, to its end, revealed in the most grateful manner, without ostentation, and in many unlooked-for ways, that in this noisy, showy world, one might be "as unknown, and yet well known."

And what must it be when such a man dies. He goes not to strangers, but where he is "well known." Friends receive him into everlasting habitations. In the last day, how many will rise up and call him blessed. When those that were prisoners upon earth, and sick, and hungry, own their benefactor, and redeemed sinners acknowledge the ministers by whom they were led to God, then, in that day, he will appear "as unknown, and yet well known." LATE PUBLICATIONS.

PHYSICS OF LOUISIANA.—The Report of the Standing Committee of the Senate of Louisiana on Levees and drainage, has been laid on our table. It contains the results of numerous surveys and scientific researches and calculations upon the humorose and valuable alluvion of Louisiana, made in 1851, by Prof. Forshey, and other engineers. Copious maps illustrate the report. Those desirous of information as to the levee systems and the lower delta of the Mississippi, will find it in this pamphlet, of sixty-four pages, in such accuracy and fullness as is not elsewhere to be had. For sale at Norman's, 14 Camp street.

PUTNAM'S MONTHLY.—The January, February and March numbers have been furnished us. Putnam has created a sensation. His magazine can not vie with Harper in mechanical execution or variety, but its friends boldly pit it against that monthly. It sets out with a praiseworthy purpose of being original, and of being so at the benefit of home talent. There is a charming freshness and piquancy about its articles, and a Blackwood look. It is a decided accession to this class of American literature. To be had at 56 Gravier street.

SOUTHERN LADIES' BOOK.—This is home manufacture; and though Graham and Gody leave no room for complaint in this line, and, indeed, are all the while improving, yet this is home. It is published with remarkable neatness, at the office of the True Delta, 103 St. Charles street, Mrs. French—the quondam L. Virginia Smith—editress.

FAMILY GOVERNMENT.—This excellent treatise on home matters, by Bishop Andrew, is still doing good, and may be had of H. D. McGinnis.

MANUAL OF DEVOTION, by Brooks. CHRISTIAN SACRAMENTS, by Rev. O. Fisher. Both these publications have been noticed in our columns before, and for sale by McGinnis.

METHODISM BY INSKIP.—Every reader of the scathing review that this book underwent (by R. A.) in the last Southern Quarterly, would like to see it. To be had of H. D. McGinnis.

NOT THE BEST BEST POLICY.

A Northern Methodist paper has this bit of news. We give the whole of it:

"NO DIVIDEND.—The book agents will make no dividends to the Conferences this year. The profits of the Concern have been absorbed by extraordinary expenses. In view of this fact, we hope our brethren will vigorously press the collections for necessitous cases, Preachers' Aid Society, etc., so that our superannuated fathers may suffer no loss in consequence of the failure of the Book Concern to pay its accustomed dividend."

So, then, the shoe pinches in that quarter. A fellow-feeling and sympathy may spring up in the bosoms of those who have been withholding from "our (Southern) superannuated fathers," their wives and children, just dividends for years past, leaving them to suffer. A better policy might have been pursued. Solomon says: "There is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty."

EMIGRANT VESSEL FOR LIBERIA.—The American Colonization Society is making preparations to start a vessel from Norfolk, Va., the first of May with emigrants for Liberia. One hundred and seventy-eight persons have already applied for a passage; of whom one hundred and fourteen are from Virginia, fifty-two from North Carolina, six from Kentucky, three from Massachusetts, one from Ohio, one from Pennsylvania and one from New York. A fine large vessel will be chartered, affording the most ample accommodations for two hundred and fifty passengers. Application for a passage should be made immediately. The price of passage and six months' support in Liberia is $60 each one, for all who are able to pay. A free passage and six months' support will be given to all worthy persons who are unable to pay, and who can come well recommended.

Mr. Isaac Griffith died at his residence at Bayou Chicot, La. on the 12th ult., in the 96th year of his age. He served in the defence of Lewistown, in the last war with Great Britain, immediately after which he emigrated to this State, and served under Col John Thompson, when the militia of Opelousas was ordered to Berwick's Bay, to oppose the disembarking of the British at the mouth of the Teche.

PROFANITY REBUKED.—A friend sends us the following, which, although it has been published heretofore, we think it cannot be published too frequently: [Eds Courier and Enquirer.

A true extract from the original "General Order Book" of Gen. Washington, under date of 29th July, 1799.

"Many and pointed orders have been issued against the unmeaning and abominable custom of swearing—notwithstanding which, with much regret, the General observes that it prevails, if possible, more than ever. His feelings are continually wounded by the oaths and imprecations of the soldiers whenever he is in hearing of them. The name of that Being, from whose bountiful goodness we are permitted to exist and enjoy the comforts of life, is incessantly imprecated and profaned in a manner as wanton as it is shocking. For the sake therefore of religion, decency and order, the General hopes and trusts that officers of every rank will use their influence and authority to check a vice which is as unprofitable as it is wicked and shameful.

"If officers would make it an unvariable rule to reprimand, and if that does not do, punish soldiers for offences of this kind, it could not fail of having the desired effect."

[For the N. O. Christian Advocate.]

AN IMPORTANT MOVEMENT.

At the recent session of the Alabama Conference, a Ministerial Education Society was formed, the object of which is to aid pious young men who may need it, and who give evidence of being called to the ministry, in obtaining such an education as will qualify them to enter upon the sacred office. No step has been taken by our Conference, for years, which promises so much to it, and the cause of Christ, as this; and I venture the opinion, that no merely prudential movement has commended itself as strongly to the Church, especially to the more intelligent portion of it, as will this.

The want of the requisite number of competent ministers is deeply felt by every Protestant Church in the country, with, perhaps, one exception. Complaints and anxious inquiries upon this subject are heard in every direction, without meeting any satisfactory reply. My own thoughts, like those of many others, doubtless, have been anxiously turned to this subject, and I have had lying on my table for months a scrap of paper, with the inquiry upon it, "How can the requisite number of efficient ministers be obtained?" intending it as the theme for some suggestions. But previous to this move, I really saw no light upon the subject, before us.

It hardly need be said that the members of this Society recognize fully the importance of a divine call to the ministry. Far distant be the day when Methodism shall yield this point. It proposes, as already stated, to afford aid only to such as give evidence of having received such a call. But few persons, however, at the present day, expect divine agency is to do all in bringing men into the sacred office, independent of human co-operation. In this matter, as in all others affecting human interests, a place is left for man's agency, and God employs it.

There is a peculiar propriety in the adoption of this course by the Methodist Church. Our economy not only justifies, but demands it as a matter of right. In other Churches, such aid is furnished, and when the man is ready to enter upon the ministerial work, he is at liberty to go forth and make the best disposition of his services that he can, for his own interests and those of the Church. With us, on the other hand, while no such aid has been given, when a man has furnished the means himself for his education, struggled through the difficulties of a preparation, and come forward wishing to devote himself to the sacred office, our economy requires him to forego the right of disposing of his services in a way most to his own profit and comfort, and accept such fields of labor—often not very inviting—as others may think best suited to him, and such as the circumstances require he should fill; while the prospect for even a living compensation may be sufficiently discouraging. Thus, in effect, one system says to pious young men, "We will prepare you for your work, and then you may go and do the best you can for yourself, provided you labor in the vineyard of the Lord." The other says, "Fit yourself for the work, and then we will employ you in the way we think best." The comparative efficiency, merits, or scriptural character of the two systems are not now under consideration, but only a single phase of them. Few, it seems to me, can dissent from the proposition, that such an economy as ours ought, in all justice, to have, as an appendage, such a provision as the one under consideration.

There is another reason for the adoption of this measure. A Methodistic economy is peculiar, involving, to some extent, mutual sacrifices on the part of ministers and people; it is of importance to our harmony and success that we have in each Conference a sufficient number of men equal to the demands of the fields open to, and occupied by, us; then will the frequent change in the pastorate of our Churches take place without distraction, or fear, on the part of our people. For while there will always be strong personal attachments springing up between each pastor and member of his flock, and strong Christian regards entertained for him by those benefitted under his ministry—making separation unpleasant—yet if a Church is assured that it is not to suffer in the piety or ability of their pastor by the change, the alternations attendant upon our itinerancy will take place without perceptible friction, nearly all objection to the system will cease, and its apparent disadvantages be removed.

Young men of piety and good natural abilities, are exercised—often deeply—upon the subject of the ministry, but being without education, and feeling their deficiency, and seeing no way open, quench the Spirit and give up in despair. Or if they ever enter upon it, they do so as a kind of dernier resort to save their souls—too far advanced in life to gain an education, or (with no habits of study) ever to improve their minds much, and thus effect comparatively little for Christ. I have met with such a case recently.

I will only add, that the Society does not contemplate making any public or formal appeal for funds, but expects to obtain them by private application. Let our wealthy, intelligent friends, upon reading this, remit their contributions to Bro. Dorman, the Treasurer, or hand them to their pastor, who will remit them with pleasure. It is very desirable that the Board of Directors have a meeting and commence their work soon, as several young men—some of them gems of excellence—are now waiting. Read the constitution appended. J. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

This Society shall be known as the Ministerial Education Society of the Alabama Conference of the M. E. Church, South.

ARTICLE II.

The object of the Society shall be to aid such men, in limited circumstances, as give evidence of being called of God to devote themselves to the work of the itinerant ministry, in obtaining such an education, as will enable them to discharge acceptably the duties of the sacred office.

ARTICLE III.

The payment of one dollar annually shall constitute any person a member of this Society; and the payment of one hundred dollars, at any one time, shall constitute any person a life member.

ARTICLE IV.

The officers of the Society shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer, and twelve Managers, who shall constitute a Board of Directors, which shall control the funds and manage the affairs of the Society, to wit: it shall decide upon the case of all applicants for aid; the amount to be appropriated to each; the institutions they shall attend, and the length of time they shall continue beneficiaries of the Society.

ARTICLE V.

One-half of the Managers shall be composed of members of the Alabama Conference and one-half of lay members of the Church.

ARTICLE VI.

The President, Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer, shall be elected annually; and the Managers biennially—one-half at the first two years, and the other at the expiration of the two years following, and so on in succession.

ARTICLE VI.

The Board shall have power to make such by-laws as it may deem necessary for its own government and the transaction of business.

ARTICLE VIII.

The Society shall hold its annual meetings at the time and place of the session of the Alabama Conference, for the election of officers to receive subscriptions and donations, and to devise measures to augment its resources.

ARTICLE IX.

This Constitution may be altered or amended by a vote of two-thirds of the members of the Society at an annual meeting, provided the proposed alteration or amendment has laid over one year.

A HAPPY LOVE-FEAST.

The Northern Christian Advocate has an interesting letter from its New York correspondent, which gives the following enthusiastic description of the last of a series of General Love-Feasts, or family gatherings, as they are familiarly called, recently held by the Methodist Churches in that city. He says:

"The evening was very cold, and the streets were very slippery, which, together with the fact that in several of the churches protracted meetings were being held, prevented so large an attendance as had been at each previous "gathering." However, the house was well filled, and the sequel fully proved that it does not require a throng to insure the presence of the Master of assemblies. The Presiding Elder of the New York District opened by reading the hymn commencing—

"There is an hour of peaceful rest,"

Which was sung by the choir, the whole congregation heartily joining; after which, the Elder offered fervent prayer. If some of the people in Central and Western New York could have heard the warm responses accompanying that prayer, offered from thousands of waiting hearts, they would no longer think New York Methodists to be such a "stiff, cold" people as they have sometimes imagined them to be. The venerable Dr. Bangs then rose, and with a firm tone and clear utterance, told of his unwavering confidence in God—of his knowledge of present, full salvation—of his bright prospect of eternal felicity. Then followed a song of praise; and such a song! Oh, how it still echoes in my memory! It was no new song! You, Mr. Editor, have sung it a thousand times! so have many of your readers! The writer has often joined in singing the same lines, in school-houses and cottages, in barns and groves, in Central New York, but he never heard such singing till then.

"How happy every child of grace."

"There, that was the song. It seemed that every one sang—that every singer was a "a child of grace," and that "every child of grace" was "happy." And the burden of that song rolled up from that temple, till the angels, descending, caught the notes, and struck up the accompaniment in glorious harmony, and redeemed spirits took up the chorus, and helped to swell it, till hallelujahs, long and loud, burst from each jubilant heart. Then the speaking began. The aged spake—the young spake—and the burden of all the speaking, was redemption through the atoning blood. Some were near Canaan—some were in the "land of Beulah"—some were battling their foes in the wilderness; but all expected the conquest, as sure as the conflict. The moments passed swiftly away, and the hour arrived to close the exercises. Dr. Bangs arose to say so, when an old brother begged a short space. It was granted. Another did the same, and as he finished his speech, the Doctor said, "now we must close." A good brother sitting near, said, "just one minute, Doctor," and commenced speaking. The Doctor, shaking his finger at him significantly, said, "remember the time, one minute, and don't tell a story." When the brother sat down, the Doctor (who had been standing while three had spoken,) said, "well, what do you say now?" A young man near the door said, "I'm satisfied to go on in this good way." And I think that closing experience was the language of every heart present. After the collection in behalf of the "Ladies' Union Aid Society," Rev. S. Martindale, the Presiding Elder, said, "I love the songs of Zion, sing another." Instantly one began—

"He it my only wisdom here."

which was taken up at once by the whole "family," and, Mr. Editor, such a "family" song I never heard. We sung Willoughby, and after singing the two verses, a brother continued—

"Amen, amen, my soul replies."

I sang with them the first line, then I listened; and Oh, what a volume of the most perfect harmony. Not a discordant string—every voice in perfect time, and when the full chorus ended, there was a perfect calm. Not a sound, except the clear tones of the man of God, who begged heavenly benediction to rest upon us.

LONG PASTORATES.—In noticing the retirement of Rev. Wm. Jay, from a Pastorate of sixty-three years in Bath, England, the Boston Watchman mentions several English Baptist pastors who have enjoyed remarkably long pastoral relations. Rev. Lawrence Butterworth was just sixty-three years pastor of the church at Evershan; the late Rev. Dr. Rippon, editor of the Hymn Book which bears his name, was sixty-five years pastor of one church, and there is at least one Baptist pastor living who has occupied the same pulpit for sixty years. Dr. Collyer has been a devoted pastor at Peckham for more than half a century.

LIBERALITY.—The First Baptist Church, in Cambridgeport, Mass., (Mr. Parker's,) has contributed the sum of $11,000 towards placing the Newton Theological Seminary upon a permanent basis.

METHODIST PRESS.

LARGE FIGURES.—The Southern Christian Advocate thus adds up and multiplies. The present and prospective denominational aggregate forbids any spirit of vain [illegible] and rolls upon the soul an almost oppressive sense of responsibility. What evil can withstand the protest of such numbers properly enlightened and directed? What good cause can languish if their benevolence be properly developed and systematized? The Methodists of this day would do well to bear in mind that they are making the precedents, taking positions, forming affinities and laying the foundations of the educational, political and moral institutions that are to form and mould the character and influence of the on-coming hosts:

"There are twenty-one distinct Methodist organizations in the world; twenty-three if we add the French and Australian Churches. Five of these are in England and Ireland, four in Canada; and eleven in the United States. Of these latter two are German, two are colored, and two Congregational, viz: the Reformed Methodist in Vermont, who have fifty ministers with an average of ten members to each, and twenty-five licensed preachers to boot; and the Stillwellites, who have one preacher and two hundred members. There are one hundred and eight Annual Conferences; twenty-seven Bishops; upwards of forty-nine thousand travelling and local preachers, and two millions one hundred and ten thousand communicants.

"In England the first society was organized in 1739, less than a century and a quarter ago. In this country the first regular Conference was held in 1773, four months less than eighty years since. Ten preachers and eleven hundred and sixty members made up the sum total of American Methodism. The statistical tables show the remarkable fact not only of a uniform principle of progression, but that with surprising regularity Methodism doubles itself in about every thirteen years. This ratio of increase has been vigorously exhibited for the past hundred years. The second century of its existence may show an altered state of things, but if the same ratio of increase should mark its history, its statistics for the year 1939 will stand at figures which now almost confound us—nine hundred and eighty-four thousand traveling preachers, and upwards of two hundred millions of members!"

ONLY ONE SALARIED MAN.—Church economy should at least be acknowledged by the world. No organization accomplishes so much, travels so far, and employs so many agencies, at such little cost. Do those who complain of being begged to give to this and that object in the Church, and insinuate that the system of gospel salvation is burdensome in point of taxation, ever compare the whole cost of Christianity in their county, or State, with the cost of the judiciary system, the militia system, the penal system? In these no man fills an office, signs a paper, goes a mile, collects a bill, or serves a notice, without pay. In the Church how different! Instance: the Missionary Treasury of the M. E. Church, North, exceeds $200,000. Yet in collecting, remitting, receiving and disbursing this sum, the Secretary is the only salaried officer, and his salary small. The Buffalo Advocate says:

"It was a matter of considerable wonderment with some who attended the late Missionary Anniversary in this city, that all the its vast operations were carried forward with only one salaried man. This is a [illegible] fact: only one man is employed who receives pay for his services. How can it be! We can only answer that such things are peculiar to the Church.

SAVE US FROM OUR FRIENDS.—Zion's Herald, deprecating a worldly spirit in the Church, says just what we wish to say in the following paragraphs:

In a few instances, Churches display the growing sympathy with this spirit, by permitting their unconverted patrons to resort to worldly measures, for the purpose of helping their funds. We insert the following card which we have cut from a newspaper, to illustrate our meaning; the names and places we strike out, because we do not intend our remarks to have a merely local bearing. The card reads thus:

"The —— Methodist Episcopal Society will hold a SOCIAL LEVEE at the —— Hall, —— evening, ———, 1853. Able speakers have been engaged for the occasion; among them are Rev. ——— and Rev. ———. There will also be a Chinese Box Benefit Ticket Post Office, and other amusements incident to such occasions. The tables will be well provided with refreshments. To conclude with dancing to such as desire it.

Music — ———'s Quadrille Band.

N. B.—A Committee will be in attendance for the proper care of clothing. Admission Tickets, twenty-five cents. Tickets for dancing, fifty cents."

Now, we very much doubt if Methodism Christ, and the world were ever before so strangely yoked together as they are in this card. Christ and Dancing! Methodism and Chance Boxes! Ministers, Quadrille Bands and "other amusements!" Alas! what would Christ done, that he should be thus wounded in the house of his friends? But we are glad to know that the Church, to be aided by "Social Levee," did not make the arrangements—though that, by the way, is a poor apology—and we are still more glad to know that one, at least, of the Reverend gentlemen advertised, had not engaged to be present, and that his presence at such a meeting could not be purchased with gold. The card alone is a curiosity; and it painfully shews what the worldly spirit would lead if it once were in the Church.

HOLY GROUND!—The following is from our excellent Nashville side of the Nashville and Louisville Christian Advocate. It only proves that "all things hang by comparison," as we had thought no subject fitter for newspaper enlightenment. A question of pure casuistry, procul profani! Well, well:

"But, as editor of this paper, we now enter our solemn protest against any controversy in our columns, as to the future location of our book Concern, or our other great interests. We have no objections to a discussion of the general principles involved in the matter, but of these concerns, but as to the particular place or places to be selected as the seat of our operations, we think untimely, and fraught with no good to make it a subject of newspaper controversy. If in our heart we believe one place more suitable than another, we would—and as an honest man, we shall—prefer that place, and would vote for it, but we a voice in settling the question, [illegible] tive of any personal wishes in the matter.

The Great Penny Postage is being largely agitated in England. Mr. Hiliu Burritt is now in Ireland, promulgating his doctrines, and at a meeting of the Society of Arts in London, the question was discussed and resolutions adopted with great enthusiasm in favor of the reduction.

MARRIED—On the 23d ult., by Rev. C. D. Oliver, Rev. CHAS. S. HURT, of the Alabama Conference, to Miss ELIZA B. THOMPSON, of Montgomery county.

OBITUARY:

DIED—At his residence, near Livingston, Madison county, Miss., on the 25th ult., JOHN LOWE, in the 58th year of his age.

He emigrated to this State, from Georgia, in the year 1803. By dint of industry and an economical mode of living, he had amassed an extensive property; but his feelings did not change with his fortunes. His heart was as warm and his smile as familiar as it was forty years ago, when, without friends and without means, he lighted his camp-fire in the Valley of the Mississippi. His grateful remembrance of individual kindness, even in the zenith of opulence, has left a deep and abiding impression upon the minds of those who knew him best.

"Weep not for those
Who sink while in the arms of death;
But weep for them who here remain,
The mournful heritors of pain,
Condemned to see each bright joy fade,
And mark grief's melancholy shade
Flung o'er Hope's fairest rose."

MEMOIR OF MISS MARTHA A. M. DUNCAN.

At the late session of the Alabama Conference, we were called upon to sympathize with a worthy member of that body, the Rev. Daniel Duncan, on occasion of the death of his lovely daughter. He judged rightly that we know how to feel for a bereaved parent. We truly do; and we can understand the feelings which prompt him to inquire into the probable state and employment of a beloved child translated to Paradise. Is she allowed to act in the capacity of a guardian angel, or a ministering spirit, to those who she loved with so intense affection when on earth! So many great and good men believe. Some suppose that the angel who visited John in Patmos was no earth-born angel—one of the Prophets—though this is questionable. It can not be doubted, however, that our glorified friends are "made like unto the angels," and why may they not

"Enjoy the grace to angels given,
And serve the royal heirs of Heaven"?

Certainly, this is an employment in which, rather than any other, next to chanting the praises of their King, they would choose to be engaged; and none can question that it is congenial to their social and benevolent nature. That there is no impossibility in the premises, needs no proof; or if it does, it is furnished in the case of Moses and Elijah, who ministered to Christ on the Mount of Transfiguration—the latter in a glorified body, the former as a disembodied spirit. That our departed friends are never visible to us in the proof that they do not minister to us; for neither are the angels visible to us though they were visible to the ancient saints to whom they ministered, and yet few will doubt that they minister to the heirs of salvation as well now as in former times. We may, therefore, without subjecting ourselves to the charge of credulity and weakness, cherish the belief that our dear departed friends do visit us on errands of love, heightening their own happiness by ministering to ours.

We have been led to these reflections partly by the enchantment of the subject, and partly, by the suggestive inquires of our bereaved friend. The following tribute to the memory of his daughter is furnished to our columns by the Rev. J. T. Heard, who says, in a private note, "She was buried at Dayton, and like the friends of your little angel, some of her friends have asked the privilege of placing a suitable monument over her grave." Consoling sympathy! beautiful expression of Christian love!

"Another bright flower has been taken from earth to heaven. The sweetness of its odor still lingers below, but the freshness and beauty of its bloom is seen only where blighting frosts never come. The bereaved parents of Miss MARTHA A. M. DUNCAN may now adopt the sentiment expressed by their daughter on her dying bed, and say, they never knew so much of the value of religion as since they have been afflicted. She died at her father's residence in Linden, Ala., December 1, 1852, in the sixteenth year of her age. During a protracted and painful illness of twenty-one days, she exhibited great patience and resignation. She was converted when ten years old, and she had been a member of the church from infancy. In her life and in her death, she gave the most heart-cheering assurances that she was not too young to know experimentally the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. I visited her in her last sickness, and found her calm and peaceful. She expressed no dread or fear of death, and seemed more concerned for others than herself. She said 'I want to die shouting'—'I want to be a star in glory.' Seeing the tears of her friends, she said: 'Don't weep for me, I shall be better off.' 'Yes,' said they, 'but we want you here to comfort us.' She replied: 'Yes, but I will be your guardian angel.' Oh! what comfort is here for those who loved her most. Well may they smile through their tears, and say: 'Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory.' Oh! that the friends to whom she sent a farewell message to meet her in heaven, may profit by her example. She was a devoted Sunday School scholar. We hope that many children who may read this tribute to the memory of our young friend, may, like her, early give their hearts to God. I shall not soon forget her acts of kindness as from time to time I shared the hospitality of her father's family; nor how she looked when last I saw her calmly waiting the will of the Lord."

NOTICE
To Alabama Conference.

BRO. MCTYEIRE: Give me room in the paper to say to the members of the Alabama Conference, that nine hundred copies of "Sermons on Baptism" have been forwarded by the Book Agent to Carver & Ryland, Mobile, for their accommodation. And as this has been done at their request, and as it has involved a heavy expense, which, in the present state of our Book interest, the Agent can but ill afford to incur, it is to be hoped that the brethren will forward their orders promptly, and, as far as practicable, the money with them. In this region the work is in demand.

Meeting of Engineers.

At a meeting of steamboat engineers, held on the 5th inst., pursuant to call, at the United States Exchange, Mr. Jas. Curry was chosen President, and Mr. Hiram Hoodrich Secretary.

After stating the object of the meeting, the Chair appointed a committee to draft resolutions for the consideration of the meeting.

The committee thereupon reported the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the practice heretofore in existence, of referring to a particular boat, and saying that we will be governed by the wages given on that boat, is injurious to the engineers as a class, and productive of bickerings and discontent, and that we will countenance the practice no longer.

Resolved, That the time has now come when we may, with perfect justice to ourselves and employers, ask what we consider to be a fair and honest compensation for our services.

Resolved, That in view of the prices established by the engineers of the principal ports on the western waters, we now denounce our duty to claim the wages established at those ports.

Resolved, That from and after this date the engineers composing this meeting will ask $150 per month for first engineers, and $100 per month for second.

The following, as a statement of facts, for the information of the public, was then unanimously agreed to:

Certain steamboat Captains and owners, having endeavored to stigmatize the engineers by stating that no intimation or warning of the contemplated strike for higher (or more reasonable) wages was given to them, we take this method of refuting said statement. They were not served with printed or written notices, it is true, but that they had ample and early knowledge of our intended strike (than which nothing more would be necessary to men not disposed to quibble,) we can prove to the satisfaction of any disinterested person.

It is due to the public to state that this demand by us for an advance in wages is but part of a plan of general reformation and organization that is now being carried out by engineers throughout all the western and southern waters. For some years past, owing to a want of proper organization, our calling has suffered much from steamboat owners and Captains assuming improper sway in the engine room, and, in the pursuit of a false economy, fixing the wages at a point beneath the acceptance of any respectable engineer. We have been stigmatized in many instances as the authors of disasters, when, if the public would take the trouble to examine into it, they would find that the fault laid really with the owners, either in imposing unfair restrictions upon their engineers, or, for the sake of saving a few dollars, placing men at the engines whose proper place would be in front of the boilers. This evil has been in existence for some time, and has continued to grow worse; and the present movement, of which our strike is a part, is designed to do away with the evil, and elevate our calling to that standard of respectability and responsibility to which it is fairly entitled.

Appeals have been made to the sympathy of the public regarding this strike of ours. We have none to make. All we ask is that simple justice be awarded us, and that those who feel interested will look at both sides of the story fairly before pronouncing judgment against us.

It gives us pleasure to state that a number of Captains and owners, who know how to appreciate the hardship of an engineer's life, and the responsibility of his station, have, from the first, heartily acceded to our pleas. Those who do not go with us it is our intention to coerce in a perfectly reasonable and legitimate manner; and in this we have every right to expect the sanction and support of a just and discriminating public.

The meeting then adjourned.

An Act to Incorporate the South-Western Industrial Fair Company.

WHEREAS, An Industrial Fair in the city of New Orleans will benefit agricultural, mechanical and other industrial pursuits and develop the resources of our country, and

WHEREAS, The cultivation of a friendly feeling between the citizens of the different States of this Union, and also the encouragement of the same feeling with the inhabitants of other countries has a tendency to the good weal and prosperity of the States; and as the holding an Industrial Fair will in a great measure promote that object, therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana in General Assembly convened, That O. Roselius, George Eustis, Allan M. H. Cohen, Samuel Jamison, I. W. Palfrey, H. B. Chilton, Daniel Edwards, D. Macaulay, John Stroud, Jr., Edward Grinnell, A. G. Bull, Newton Richards, S. H. Riddell, and all other persons that may hereafter become Stockholders, are hereby created a body corporate, under the name and title of the South-Western Industrial Fair Company, and by that name sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, make contracts with persons and corporations, make by-laws and regulations not being contrary to law, fix and collect the fees for admission, borrow money, and enjoy all the rights, privileges and immunities of a corporation or body politic, and that the above named persons be commissioners for carrying out the objects of this act.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, etc., That the capital stock of this Company shall be $100,000, divided into shares of $100 each, and that the said Company have power to increase the said capital to $250,000 if a majority of the shareholders think fit.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, etc., That the above named Commissioners, or a majority of them, may cause books to be opened in such places as they may direct, for the purpose of receiving subscriptions to the capital stock of said Company.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, etc., That so soon as five hundred shares shall have been subscribed, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners, after ten days' notice of the time and place, to call a meeting of the subscribers for the purpose of choosing a Board of nine Directors, who shall choose their President from among themselves for the management of said Company, and that at the said meeting and all other meetings of the subscribers, each subscriber shall be entitled to one vote for every share he may hold, and no person shall be elected a Director in the said Company unless he hold at least five shares.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, etc., That each subscriber shall pay five dollars per share at the time of subscribing, and that further calls may be made by the Directors of such amounts and at such times as they may think fit, provided no call exceeds ten dollars per share, and that a period of three months elapse between each call.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, etc., That the said Company shall have power to build such buildings or buildings as may in the opinion of the Directors, or a majority of them, be required, for the purpose of holding an Industrial Fair in the city of New Orleans in the years 1854 or 1855, and that they have power to rent or purchase or receive without rent any parcel or parcels of ground requisite for the said building or buildings, and that the said building or buildings he of such materials as the Directors may think best, and that they shall have power to put gas or water in the said building or buildings, and if they see fit, to make their own gas, provided that no gas made in the building shall be used, sold, or given away, for any other purpose than lighting the said building or its entrances, and that they shall have power to erect any steam or caloric engine or engines that may be necessary, to show the working of machinery in motion.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, etc., That the said Company may appoint, engage and discharge all policemen and watchmen and all other employers necessary for the protection of said building, and of the property therein contained, and of the approaches of said building.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, etc., That if any person wilfully or by any means whatever, injure or destroy any part of said building, or attempt to do so, such person or persons so offending shall each of them for every such offence, be liable for all damages occasioned thereby, and furthermore be proceeded against by indictment, or information at any time within six months of such offence having been committed and be punished by a fine not exceeding $1000 or imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, or both, at the discretion of the Court, and if such person or persons be a slave, the owner of said slave shall be liable for all damages so occasioned.

SEC. 9 Be it further enacted etc., That this charter shall expire at the end of five years after the date of the promulgation of this Act.

[The above bill has passed the Senate ED.]

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.—The following bill has been introduced in the Senate:

An act to amend an act entitled an act to provide for the sale of a portion of the swamp and overflowed lands granted to the State by acts of Congress, approved 2d March, one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine, and the 28th of September, one thousand eight hundred and fifty, and to appropriate the proceeds thereof, and suspend the sale of public lands.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana, in General Assembly convened, That the Register of the Land Office, and the Treasurer, as receivers of public moneys, be, and they are hereby, required not to sell any more warrants under the act of the 4th of March, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two: Provided, that the provisions of this bill shall not apply to the pre-emption claims secured by the second section of the above recited act.

FROM BUENOS AYRES.—A revolution occurred at Buenos Ayres on the 11th December. Aticna, elected duverner recently by a majority of one vote, was forced to resign by the armed opposition of Gen. Flores, Minister of War, and Col. Lagos. At the last dates they were outside of the city with forces. Preparations were going on in the city to give them a warm reception. There was a continued skirmishing at the outposts.

By a recent arrival at NewYork, we have dates to the 23 of January, which state that the revolution had been successful, and that Urquiza had been overthrown.

The Bayou Sara and Woodville telegraph is now in operation.

Gov Foote has issued a proclamation ordered the election of five members of Congress from the State at large.

FOR AUSTRALIA.—The ship Euphrasin sailed from New York on the 20th ult., full of passengers for Australia.

It is stated in one of the Boston papers that, in that city, there are upwards of forty divorce suits pending.

INDICTED.—Aldermen Smith and Bard, of New York have been indicted, and true bills found against them, for receiving bribes.

RABBITS.—A party of hunters a few days ago shot seven hundred rabbits in one day upon an acre of ground near Galena, Ill. They had been hemmed in by the waters.

In August 1850, the population of Pittsburgh was 50,771. In January 1853, it was 110,211. The value of taxables, $65,000,000.

A nervous face-ache, consequent on being drawn a dozen times, is said to give one the tic-le. The Manchester Mirror got that off.

The Tallahassee Sentinel denies that the question of dividing Florida is under discussion amongst the people of that State.

W. Moreton Dyer has been recognised by the President as Consul of Great Britain and Ireland for Florida and Alabama.

Two consignments of flour from the Ohio river were received in Baltimore on the 20th ult., for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. They are the first over this road.

We perceive that the city of Mobile has at last got full possession of the public square, and measures are being taken to improve its appearance. It certainly needs any amount of improvement.

The Concordia Intelligencer learns from a reliable source that Mr. Park, who was recently murdered in a duel on Tensas river, was a grandson of Mungo Park, the celebrated African traveler.

LOSS OF A STEAMER AND FIFTY LIVES.—By a dispatch from New York, dated the 1st instant, we have information of the loss of the steamer Victory, on the Irish coast and that fifty lives were also lost.

The negro coachmen of Louisville have organized a society, the object of which is to create a proper degree of pride in keeping their horses and vehicles in proper condition.

COALS TO NEWCASTLE.—The steamer Emma Dean arrived at Cincinnati, from St. Louis, on the 1st inst., with one hundred and fifty barrels of whiskey. The owner expected to realize a profit of one cent per gallon.

MONUMENT TO GEN. HARRISON.—A public meeting was held a few days since at Vincennes, Ind., with a view of petitioning the Legislature for aid in erecting in that town a monument to Gen. Harrison, the first Governor of that State.

We see it stated that a patent of nobility has been made out for Major Burns, son of the Plowman-poet, and that he will soon be gazetted as Baron Ellisland. The lovers of Burns will remember that Ellisland was the name of Burns's farm.

COTTON IN TRINIDAD.—The Manchester (Eng.) Examiner mentions having seen a specimen of cotton grown in Trinidad, by a planter who emigrated from the United States, and who thinks that Island is peculiarly adapted for the cotton culture.

John Kennedy, now living near Columbus, Tennessee, has eighteen children—fully grown—seventy-four grand children, and fifty-one great-grand-children—in all one hundred and forty-three. There has not been a death in the family since 1806.

Punch thinks that England's best defence against the French would be a cordon of railroads, attended by the officials of the worst-managed roads. Once set the trains running and no Frenchman will dare to come within a mile of them.

The Governor of Pennsylvania, it is said, will veto the bill which passed in both Houses of the Legislature of that State recently, authorising a settlement of the account between the State of Pennsylvania and the United States Bank, on the payment by the latter of $150,000 to the State.

A difficulty has occurred at Whampoa between the American and British Vice Consuls relative to runaway seamen. The matter resulted in the institution of a suit by Mr. Hunt, the American Vice Consul, against Mr. Bird, British Vice Consul, for defamation of character—damages laid at $10,000.

THE MAINE LIQUOR LAW IN DELAWARE.—Petitions asking the passage of a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drinks, signed by 1800 males and 2700 females, have been presented to the Delaware Legislature. There are also 800 petitioners for a modification of the license law, and 840 petitioners against any legislation on the subject.

The telegraph between New Haven and Waterbury, Conn., is managed in the following liberal way: Instead of paying by the word, you pay by the minute, or hour. The tariff is ten cents for the first five minutes, and one cent per minute afterwards. For a quarter you may converse to your heart's content.

MISSISSIPPI UNION BANK BONDS.—The Jackson (Miss.) Flag of the Union of the 25th ult. says:

The Chancellor of the State of Mississippi has decided that the State is legally and constitutionally bound for the redemption and payment of these bonds, and so decrees in this case accordingly.

The Attorney General appeals, we understand to the higher Court, where the cause will undergo another argument and no doubt an able and elaborate examination on the part of the Court.

BISHOP IVES AND THE POPE.—It seems that the Pope sets some value on the relics of his late office, which the Bishop of North Carolina carried with him. The London Roman Catholic Standard states that after Dr. Ives had received confirmation and communion from the hands of the Sovereign Pontiff, as a token of filial duty he presented to the Pope, his pictorial cross, ring, and episcopal seal used by him in his former capacity. They were accepted, and are to be hung as memorials at the shrine of St. Peter.

A NOVEL INTENTION.—A Yankee down east has invented a novel contrivance, for producing applause in theatres, where the merits of good actors are not appreciated. It consists of a clap-trap apparatus, permanently attached to some portion of the pit, and so arranged with wires leading to the prompter's stand as to be operated on at will. This sort of applause will not cease for hissing, but boldly prompts the audience in the duty they owe good acting and the stage. We would not be so cruel as to say that there is need of such an apparatus in any of our theatres.

EXPENSES OF COINAGE AT THE MINTS.—The following statement will show the amount of gold and silver coined at the mints of the United States, and the expenses attendant on the same at each Mint:

	Total Coinage.	Ordinary Expenses.	Cost of Coinage per Cent.
At Philadelphia	$52,404,600	$96,360	18.37
At New Orleans	4,022,900	48,200	2.12
At Charlotte	596,734	11,600	2.82
At Dahlonega	473,815	11,000	2.32

In other words, for every thousand dollars coined the expenses is, at Philadelphia, $1.83; at New Orleans, $21 23; at Charlotte, $29 20, and at Dahlonega, Geo., $23 20.

From Havana.

We make the following extracts from the Havana correspondence of the Mobile Register:

The trial of the State prisoners is still proceeding, and from the number and respectability of the parties, there has been much sensation in our community. It is said that the formalities of the trials will be closed on Monday next, and that the Captain General on that day will sign the sentences, and afterwards take a tour of inspection to the country westward of Havana.

Of the forty-nine persons on trial, it is said that the prosecuting attorney has asked for the extreme penalty for seven—varying to thirteen—on the street. And among those named are Gonzales, Garcia, Fortune, Cristo Muranda and Hernandez Pealran, who are in prison here. Others mentioned are at present in the United States Lona, Holcoria and Porpilio Valiente, residing in New York. The cause of offence, according to the specifications of the prosecuting officer of the Government, is for having secreted upon their estates or within their dwellings, arms and munitions of war for the purpose of rebellion. The Conde Fozos Dulces will probably be sentenced to labor at Ceuta, for a term of years not exceeding eight which is counted by the attorney. There are many others in prison, waiting their turn for disposition of the Government.

The poor Coolies brought here as substitutes for slave labor, after having perished at the rate of twenty-five per cent on the voyage, are now being sacrificed by disease contracted on board the transport ships—and it seems probable of the thousand and upwards that left Asia, there will not be left the half, for sale by the owners, at the expiration of their quarantine. The result of this experiment of benevolence, and speculation of British philanthropy, I will be enabled to communicate in my next.

Since commencing this note, I am informed that the son of Brigadier Fortune has been condemned to death, and that he was prevented making defence, for the reason that he attacked the Fiscal with some warmth, for the vindictive spirit that seemed to have influenced him in the prosecution of his case. The Conde de Fozos Dulces made a most brilliant defence before the court-martial, showing himself one of the first intellects of the Island. He demonstrated very clearly that he was not justly held in bonds—that the Fiscal had not made any case against him—and more, he proved that he had not violated any law of the realm, as far as negative testimony could be brought to bear; but it will not save him from eight years in presidio.

I learn to-day, prematurely I think, that the sentence of death has been signed for six of the prisoners. It is probably the suggestion of their fate.

The Inauguration of President Pierce.

The Boston was still in session on the 4th instant, at half-past 11 o'clock, P. M.

Mr. Fillmore vacated the Executive mansion while the inaugural ceremonies were progressing, and Mr. Pierce was escorted back to the mansion by a procession.

There was an immense crowd of visitors to see the Jackson statue on the 4th inst. The admiration for this master work of art is unbounded.

The Capitol was thronged with ladies on the 4th instant—hundreds of strangers slept in the rotunda and passages of the Capitol, lying down on cloaks, and indeed some lying on the floor, whilst thousands walked the streets the "live long night."

The first train from Baltimore arrived at 8 o'clock, and the second at 9, bringing about 2000 persons.

Pedestrians and horsemen from the surrounding country arrived.

Captain Rynders, with delegations of the New York and Baltimore Empire Clubs, paraded the streets.

Mr. Pierce (mounted finely mounted, with badges and sashes, the military and fire companies moving to and from like an invading army.

Mr. Fillmore and Hon. Pierce were serenaded on the night of the 3d instant, by the New York Continental band.

The procession moved from the City Hall at noon. It was composed of a large military escort, and various civic bodies, diplomatic corps, Judges of the Supreme Court, ministers, members and ex-members of the Senate and House of Representatives, various political clubs, the Baltimore and New York Empire Clubs, the Washington Fire Department, etc.

At Willard's Hotel Mr. Pierce was received into the procession, and entered a carriage by the side of President Fillmore, amid loud acclamations, ringing of bells, and the roaring fields of cannon.

An immense multitude was gathered along the route to the Capitol.

Both Houses of Congress had adjourned.

Mr. Pierce stood erect, bowing gracefully, in acknowledgment of the repeated cheers which greeted him.

The flag of the Senate Chamber was lowered, to indicate that the old Senate had adjourned sine die, and again raised, indicating the organization of a new Senate.

The procession entered the Senate Chamber, and after various civil bodies had taken the stand assigned them and the arrangements were completed outside the procession again formed, headed by Chief Justice Taney. After prayer by Rev. Dr. Butler, the oath was administered by the Chief Justice.

Mr. Pierce stepped forward to the front of the stage, and was greeted by loud plaudits from the vast multitude he then delivered the inaugural address.

At the conclusion of the speech the procession escorted the President to the White House, and left ex-President Fillmore at Willard's Hotel. Judge Campbell and others are understood to be in the Cabinet—they were in the procession.

The Senate met immediately after the ceremonies were over, and adjourned until Monday.

All the Appropriation bills were passed, after being subjected to a modification by conference committees.

The President's Inaugural Address.

We find in the St Louis papers the Inaugural Address of President Pierce.

WASHINGTON, March 4

The circumstances under which I have been called for a limited period to preside over the destiny of the Republic, fill me with a profound sense of the responsibility, but with nothing like shrinking apprehensions. I repair to the post assigned, not as to one sought for, but in obedience to the unsolicited expression of your will, answerable only for a fearless, faithful and diligent exertion of my best powers. I ought to be and am truly grateful for the rare manifestation of the nation's confidence; but this, so far from lightening my obligations, only adds to their weight. You must sustain me by your strength. When looking for the fulfillment of reasonable requirements, you will not be unmindful of the great changes which have occurred even within the last quarter of a century and the consequent augmentation and complexity of duties imposed on the administration, both at home and foreign affairs. Whether the elements of inherent force of the Republic have kept pace with its unparalleled progression in territory, population and wealth has been the subject of earnest thought and discussion on both sides of the ocean.

Less than sixty-three years ago the Father of his Country made the then recent accession of North Carolina one of the subjects of his special congratulation; at that moment, however, when the agitation consequent upon the revolutionary struggle had partially subsided, when we were just emerging from the weakness and embarrassment of the confederation, which was an evident consummation of vigor equal to the great undertaking which was so wisely and bravely fulfilled by our fathers. It was not a presumptuous assurance, but a calm faith springing from a clear view of the source of power of a government constituted like ours. It is no paradox to say that although weak, the new born nation was intrinsically strong. Inconsiderable in population and apparent resources. It has upheld the broad and intelligent comprehension of the right and all pervading purpose to maintain the stronger power. It came from the furnace of the revolution, tempered to the necessity of the times. The thoughts of the men of that day were as patriotic—they wasted none of their energies upon idle or delusive speculations, but with a firm and fearless step advanced beyond the government-ial fetters which had hitherto circumscribed the limits of human freedom, and planted their standard where it has stood against dangers from abroad and international agitation, which has at times fearfully menaced them at home; they have proved themselves equal to the solution of the great problem to understand what their powers had been illuminated by the dawning light of the revolution. The object sought was not a thing dreamed of; it was a thing realized. They had exhibited not only the power to achieve, but what all history affirms to be so much more unusual, the capacity to maintain. The oppressed throughout the world, from that day to the present have turned their eyes hitherward, not to find these lights extinguished, or to fear lest they should wane, but to be constantly cheered by their steady and increasing radius.

In this, our country has, in my opinion, fulfilled its highest duties to suffering humanity. It has spoken, and will continue to speak, not only by its words, but by its acts, in language of sympathy, encouragement and hope, to those who earnestly listen to tones which pronounce for the largest unlimited liberty. But, after all, the most amatory encouragement, and the most patient appeal for freedom will be its own history and its triumphs; and, pronouncedly, the power of our example; but no example, be it remembered, can be powerful for lasting good, whatever apparent advantage may be gained, which is not based upon the eternal principle of right and justice.

Our fathers decided for themselves, both upon the hour to declare and the hour to strike. They were their own judges of the circumstances under which it became them to pledge to each other "their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honors" for the acquisition of the priceless inheritance transmitted to us. The energy with which the great conflict was opened, and under the guidance of a manifest and manifested Providence, the accomplishing endurance with which it was prosecuted to its consummation, were only surpassed by the wisdom and patriotic spirit and concessions which characterized all the councils of the early fathers. One of the most impressive evidences of that wisdom is to be found in the fact that the actual working of our system has dispelled a degree of solicitude, which at the out-set disturbed bold hearts and unreconciling intellects—the apprehension of danger from extended territory. States accumulated wealth and augmented population were expected to be unfascinated. The stars upon your banner have become nearly three-fold their original number—your densely populated possessions skirt the shores of two great oceans, and yet this vast increase of territory and people has not only shown itself compatible with the harmonious action of the States and Federal Government in the respective constituted spheres, but has afforded an additional guarantee of the strength and integrity of both, with an experience thus suggested and cheering, the policy of my administration will not be restricted by any timid forebodings of evil from expansion. Indeed, it is not to be disguised, that our attitude as a nation, and our position on the globe, render the acquisition of certain possessions, not within our jurisdiction, evidently important for our protection, if not in the future essential to the preservation of the rights of commerce and the peace of the world; should they be obtained, it will be through no grasping spirit, but with a view to obvious national interest and security, and in a manner entirely consistent with the strictest observance of national faith. I have nothing to say of any wish or intention of hostile aggression—we have every thing to impress upon us the cultivation of relations of peace and amity. I intend my administration shall leave no blot upon our fair name, and I trust I may safely give the assurance that no act within the legislative scope of my constitutional control will be tolerated on the part of any portion of our citizens, which cannot challenge ready justification before the tribunal of the civilized world. The administration should be unworthy of confidence if it hoped, or respect abroad, should it cease to be influenced by the conviction that no apparent advantage can be purchased at a price too dear as that of national wrong or dishonor.

It is not our privileges as a Nation to speak of a distant past. The striking incidents of our history, replete with instruction, and furnishing abundant grounds for hopeful confidence, are comprised in a period comparatively brief. But, if our past is limited, our future is boundless. The obligations that throng the unexplored pathway of advancement will be limitless as their duration—hence, sound and comprehensive philosophy should embrace no less the distant future than the urgent present. The great objects of our political organization are here, to be retained and they are entirely consistent with the tranquility and interests of the rest of mankind. With the neighboring nations on our Continent we should cultivate kind and friendly relations—we can desire nothing in regard to that so much as to see them consolidate their strength, and pursue the path of prosperity and happiness. If, in the course of their growth, we should open new channels of trade and international intercourse, it must always present a noble field for the moral influence of a great people.

Of the complicated system of European policy we have heretofore been independent, and from their wars (unsolicited as unsolicited, we have been entirely exempt, while those are confined to the nations with which they originated, and within their legitimate jurisdiction they can not affect us, except in appealing to our sympathies in the cause of human freedom and universal advancement.

With these views firmly and honestly carried out, we have a right to expect, and shall, under all circumstances, require prompt reciprocity. The rights which belong to us as a nation are not alone to be regarded, but those which pertain to every citizen in his individual capacity, at home and abroad, must be sacredly maintained, so long as he can discern every star in its place upon that ensign; though he may be without wealth to purchase for himself a place, it will be his privilege, and must be his acknowledged right, to stand unabashed in the presence of princes, with the proud consciousness that he is himself one of a nation of sovereigns, and that he can not, in his legitimate pursuits, wander so far from home, that the agent he shall be behind in the place I now occupy, will see that no rude hand of power or tyrannical passion shall be laid upon him with impunity; he must realize that upon every sea and every soil where our citizens may rightfully seek it the protection of our flag. American citizenship is a inviolable panoply for the security of the American's rights, and in this connection it can hardly be necessary to reaffirm a principle which now should be regarded as fundamental—the right for the security and repose of this confederacy, to reject the idea of interference or colonization on this side of the ocean by any foreign power, beyond its present jurisdiction, as utterly inadmissable.

The opportunities of observation furnished by my brief experience as a soldier, confirm, in my own mind, the opinion entertained and acted upon by others from the foundation of the Government, that the maintenance of large standing armies in our country would not be only dangerous but unnecessary. They also illustrate the importance, I might well say, the absolute necessity in military service of practical skill, which has made our army what it is. Our army, as organized, must be the nucleus around which, in every time of need—the strength of your military power—the national militia, may be readily founded into a well disciplined and efficient organization.

The skill and self-devotion of the Navy assure you that you may take the performance of the past as a pledge for the future, and you may confidently expect that the flag which has waved, untarnished, its folds on every sea, will still float in undiminished honor; but these, as well as many other subjects, will be brought before you at the appropriate time. Through the subordinate branches of the Government to which I shall always look with profound respect and with truthful confidence for that cordial aid and support which I shall so much need, and which their experience and wisdom will readily suggest.

In the administration of our domestic affairs you expect a devoted integrity to the public observance in all its departments, so marked as never justly to be questioned, and if this reasonable expectation be not realized, I frankly confess that one of my leading hopes is doomed to disappointment and that my efforts in a very important particular must result in a humiliating failure. Officers can be properly accepted only as aids for the accomplishment of these objects, and no occupancy can confer no prerogative, nor inordinate desire for preferment any claim, the public interest imperatively demands, and every good citizen may and will claim the protection of the law and the benign influence of a good Government; but a claim for office is what the people of the Republic should never recognize, and no reasonable man of any party will expect the Administration to be so regardless of its responsibility and the obvious elements of its success as to retain persons known to be under the influence of political hostility and partisan prejudice, which will require not only severer labor but cordial co-operation. Having no implied engagements to ratify, no rewards to bestow, no resentments to remember, no personal wishes to consult, in selecting for official stations, I shall feel the more different and delicate trust, admitting no motive to be worthy my choice but the appropriate one, which does not contemplate an efficient discharge of my duty and the best interests of my country.

I acknowledge my obligations to the masses of my countrymen and to them alone, and as higher objects than personal aggrandizement never gave direction to their exertions to the latest crisis. They shall not be disappointed—they required a new branch of diligence, integrity and capacity whenever there arose duties to perform, and without this guaranteed quality in the public servants, more stringent laws for the punishment of negligence and malpractice on the part of public officers, more severe punishment will be visited upon delinquents, and with them would be unnecessary. But these are not the only points to which you look for vigilance, watchfulness of duty. The dangers of the concentration of all the powers in the General Government in a confederacy as vast as ours, is too oblivious to be disregarded; you have a right, therefore, to expect your agents, in every department, to regard strictly the limits imposed upon them by the Constitution.

The great scheme of our constitutional liberty rests upon a proper old division of power between the State and Federal authority, and experience has shown that the harmony and application of our people thereto upon the joint discriminating lines between the separate rights and responsibilities of the States and your separate rights, and herein, in my opinion, are the considerations which should form the true basis of our future movement in regard to the questions which have mainly disturbed the tranquility of the Government; to the exercise of the powers already granted by the constitution it can hardly happen that its action upon any question should endanger the institutions of the States or interfere with their rights to manage matters of a strictly domestic character according to the will of their own people.

In expressing my views briefly upon an important subject which has recently agitated the nation to an almost fearful degree, I am moved by no other impulse than an earnest desire for the perpetuation of that Union which has made us what we are, flowering upon us blessings, and conferring a power and influence which our fathers would hardly have anticipated, even with their most sanguine hopes directed to a far-off future. The sentiments I announce were not unknown before; the expression of that value called me by no own position upon this subject was clear and unequivocal, in the record of my words and my acts, and it was only re-asserted at this time because my silence might, perhaps, be misunderstood. With the Union my dearest hopes are enlisted—without it, what are we individually and collectively? What becomes of the noblest field ever opened for the advancement of our race in religion, in government, in the arts, and all that dignifies and adorns mankind, from that radiant constellation which both inhabites our sky, and points out to struggling nations their course; but let a single star be lost, and if utter darkness does not follow, the lustre of the whole is diminished. In my reverdity, then need any assurance that such a catastrophe is to overtake them, while I possess the power to stay it? It is with me an earnest and vital belief that as the Union has been the source, under Providence, of our prosperity up to this time, so it is a pledge of the continuance of the blessings we have enjoyed, and which we are bound to transmit undiminished, to our children. The field of calm and free discussion in our country is open, and will always be so, but it never has and never can be traversed for good in a spirit of sectionalism and uncharitableness. The founders of the Republic dealt with things as they were presented to them in a spirit of self-sacrificing patriotism, and as time has proved, with a comprehensive wisdom which it will be safe for us to consult. Every measure tending to the paternal feelings of all the members of our Union can find my heartiest approbation; but to every theory of discernment, whether the offspring of fevered ambition or wild fanaticism, calculated to disturb the bonds of love and affection which unite us, I shall interpose a steady and stern resistance.

Such have been and are my convictions. Upon them I shall act, and I fervently hope that the question least rest and that no sectional or ambitious fanatical excitement may again threaten the durability of our institutions or obscure the light of our prosperity. But let not the foundation of our hopes rest upon man's wisdom—it will not be sufficient that no sectional prejudices find a place in the public deliberations; it will not be sufficient that the rash counsels of human passion are rejected. It must be felt that there is no national security, but in the nation's acknowledgment of God and his over-ruling providence. We have been carried safely through a perilous crisis. Wise counsels, like those which gave us the Constitution, prevailed to uphold it. Let the period be remembered as an admonition, and not as an encouragement in any section of the Union to make experiments where experiments are fraught with such fearful hazard. Let it be impressed upon all hearts that beautiful as our fabric is, no earthly power or wisdom could ever re-unite us, after being broken into fragments.

Standing as I do, almost in view of the green slope of Mount Vernon, and as it were in reach of the tomb of Washington, with all the cherished memorials of the past, gathering around me like so many eloquent voices of exposition from heaven, I can express no better hope for my country, than that the kind Providence which smiled upon our fathers, may enable their children to preserve the blessings they have inherited.

The following gentlemen compose the Cabinet. This information was obtained from General Pierce at a late hour last night:

TELEGRAPHIC.

MOBILE, March 6—7:30 P. M.

The steamer Black Warrior has arrived here from New York via Havana, having left the latter port on the evening of the 3d inst., and reached her wharf in Mobile at seven this morning. The Havana papers brought by her contain no news of interest.

A private dispatch from Matanzas states that Mr. King's health had slightly improved, the climate being more congenial, but he was still in a precarious condition. The health of Havana is reported good. The Black Warrior has made remarkable dispatch in this trip. She remained in New York only fifty-two hours, during which time she discharged 1,000 bales of cotton, coaled, provisioned, and took on board the largest cargo ever brought to Mobile.

NEW YORK, Monday, March 7—9 A. M.

The Collins steamer Baltic arrived here late yesterday, bringing dates from Liverpool to the 23d

TRUST TO THE FUTURE.... By Caroline A. Bridge.

Trust to the future—though gloomy and cheerless
Look not behind thee—be hopeful and fearless;
Strengthe the right way, and keep to the track!
Fling off despair—it hath strength like a giant;
Slaughter the purpose, and, boldly defiant,
Rave to the right, stand unmoved and unpliant!
Faith and God's promise the brave never lack.

Trust to the future—the present may fright thee,
Scouring so fearfully close at thy side;
Face it unshrinking, and no present can blight thee—
He who stands boldly such blast shall abide.
Never a storm but the tainted air needs it,
Never a storm but sunshine succeeds it;
Each has a lesson, and he alone reads it
Rightly who takes it and makes it his guide.

Trust to the future—it stands like an angel,
Waiting to lead thee, to bless and to cheer;
Singing of hope, like some blessed angel,
Luring thee on to a brighter career.
Why should the past or the present oppress thee?
Stamp on the coils, for with arms in caress thee,
See the great future stands yearning to bless thee;
Press boldly forward, nor yield to a fear

Trust to the future—it will not deceive thee,
So thou but meet it with brave heart and strong;
Now begin living anew, and believe me,
Gladness and triumph will follow ere long.
Never a night but there cometh a morrow,
Never a grief but the hopeful will borrow
Something of gladness to lighten the sorrow;
Life here such is a conqueror's song.

Trust in the future, then—cease from your weeping;
Faith and a firm heart are all that you need—
God and his angels have yet in their keeping
Harvests of joy if we'll sow but the seed!
Trust to the future—all life will be glorious;
Trust—for in trusting the soul is victorious;
Trust—and in trusting be strong and laborious;
Up and be doing, and give God the meed!

Death of Louis XVII.

The fable of the existence of Louis XVII, of France, under the disguise of Rev. Eleazer Williams, of Green Bay, has created (says the Newark Advertiser,) a general sensation. Mr. Hanson, the author of it, since the story has acquired a commercial value, promises, like Mrs. Stowe, to follow up the original narrative, with documents and illustrations. They will come unquestionably to a buoyant market. In the meantime, it it can be proved that the unhappy Dauphin died in a French prison, in the arms of one of his guardians, Lasne, at half-past two o'clock in the afternoon of the ninth day of June, 1795, it would seem to be a material fact in an inquiry after truth, notwithstanding the testimony of doctors, that Mr. Williams carries ominous marks upon his limbs. This evidence seems to be furnished by the work of M. de Beauchesne, just published in Paris, an account of which we find in that entertaining as well as instructive journal, the Literary World.

The death of the Dauphin is thus described by M. de Beauchesne, as reported to him by Gomin, one of the guardians du temple:

"DEATH OF THE DAUPHIN.

Gomin, observing the child calm, motionless and silent, said to him, "I hope you are not suffering at present?"

"Oh, yes, I am suffering, but much less; the music is so fine!"

There was no music either in the tower or in the neighborhood; no noise from without at the moment reached the chamber where the young martyr was dying. Gomin, surprised, called him, "Where do you hear the music?"

"Right on high!" "How long since?" "Since you have been on your knees. Don't you hear it? Listen! listen!" And the child raised his lailing arm, and opened his large eyes lighted up with ecstacy. The poor guardian, not wishing to destroy this sweet and heavenly illusion, placed himself to listen along with the pious desire of hearing what could not be heard.

After some moments of attention, the child started again, his eyes glistened, and he exclaimed in an inexpressible transport: "In the midst of all the voices I heard my mother's!"

Lasne came up from below to relieve Gomin; the latter, not easily heart oppressed, but not more anxious than on the evening before, for he did not expect an immediate termination. Lasne took his seat near the bed; the Priests regarded him for a long time with a fixed and dreamy look. When he made a slight movement, Lasne asked him how he was, and if he wanted anything? The child said, "Do you think that my sister has heard the music? How happy it would have made her!" Lasne was unable to answer. The eager and penetrating look, full of anguish, of the dying child, darted towards the window. An exclamation of happiness escaped his lips; then looking towards his guardian, he said: "I have one thing to tell you?" Lasne approached and took his hand; the little head of the prisoner fell upon his guardian's breast, and listened to him, but in vain. His last words had been spoken. God had spared the young martyr the agony of the dying rattle. God had kept for himself the last thought of the child. Lasne put his hand on the heart of the child; the heart of Louis XVII had ceased to beat. It was half-past two o'clock in the afternoon."

M. de Beauchesne knew Gomin and Lasne, the two last guardians of the Dauphin, and received from him each a certificate, confirming his account of the Prince's death. The similarity of these original papers are given in the book, which we translate:

TESTIMONY OF GOMIN—Monsieur de Beauchesne: Nothing can be more true than what you have written in regard to the last moments of the Dauphin, his conversations and his death. You have done justice to my sentiments, and I thank you for it with all my heart. Receive, etc.,

Paris, April 23, 1840. GOMIN.

TESTIMONY OF LASNE—Monsieur de Beauchesne: As I have always said, and always will say, I declare here upon my honor, and before God, that the son of Louis XVI died in my arms in the tower of the Temple. They are nothing but impostors who pretend in the contrary. I had often seen the unfortunate Dauphin at the Tuileries, and I perfectly recognised him in his prison. You have perfectly recalled all the details I gave you; the account of which that you have drawn up and have read to me is most scrupulously exact. I have told the truth all my lifetime; it is therefore, not when I am approaching the end of my days, that I would falsify it. LASNE.

TURKISH DECLARATION OF WAR.—The following curious declaration of war was issued in 1663 by Mahomet IV. against Leopold, Emperor of Germany:

"By the grace of God, the great God in Heaven, we, Mole Mahomet, god of the earth, renowned and powerful Emperor of Babylon and Indes, from the rising to the setting of the sun, king of earthly kings, mighty ruler of Arabia and Mauritania, born triumphant sovereign of Jerusalem; possessor of the tomb of Christ the crucified, design to thee, Emperor of Germany, in thee, king of Poland, and to all the chiefs of thy land, as well as to the Pope of Rome, his cardinals and bishops, that We are resolved to attack thee with 13 kings, 1,500,000 men on horseback and on foot, with Turkish courage, countless as to thee and thine. We will visit thee in Vienna, thy capital, and pursue thee and the king of Poland and all thy allies, sword in hand, burning, plundering, murdering and destroying the country and subjects. As for thee, thou shalt suffer the most horrible death imaginable. As thy government is weak and cruel even among Christians, we will wrest from thee, with fire and sword, thy Empire and Kingdom, and likewise overthrow and annihilate the Son of Rome and its triple crown.

"This, Emperor of Germany and King of Poland, is our declaration to thee and all thy dependents; and We moreover inform thee, that these words will speedily be followed by deeds, for which thou hast to hold thyself in readiness.

"Given in Our powerful city, Stamboul, containing 1659 streets, 99 hospitals, 1000 public baths, 907 fountains, 120 markets, 115 stables for mules, 480 inns for foreigners, 1052 great and small schools, 4122 mosques and churches. This great and powerful city is four German miles in circumference, and on both sides are 500 strong towers. Our ancestors erected it from the hands of the Christians, whose wives and children were murdered before their eyes. Thus will We treat thee and all Christians, to prove our hatred and disdain.

"Given in the twenty-fifth year of Our age and the seventh of our potent reign.

(Signed.) "MOLO MAHOMET."

WAR SONG OF ESSEX.—Historical readers are familiar with the story respecting the ring which Queen Elizabeth gave to her favorite Essex, promising that she would interpose for him, even in his utmost need, if he should send back that ring to her as a token. The tale goes that when he fell under her displeasure, and was sentenced to the block, he dispatched the ring to her Majesty by the sisters of Nottingham, but that the messenger, instead of delivering the token, treacherously withheld it, the consequence of which was that Essex was executed, and that Elizabeth a year after, learning the perfidy of which he and she had been victims, pined away and died in less than a month.

This romantic legend has long been regarded as a fiction, and given over to novelists as their proper prey. But a work lately published in London, "Lives and Letters of the Devereux, Earls of Essex," contains documents that render the truth of the tradition probable, to say the least. In fact, the London Athenæum, which is by no means a credulous journal, declares its full belief in the story, and says that the identical ring, a posie gold one, with a portrait of Elizabeth, is still in existence. Truth certainly is often stranger than fiction, and the incident, besides is eminently characteristic of the Queen. Perhaps historical writers have been too skeptical, for these last hundred years, in rejecting every thing which, like this tale, has an air of romance.

THE ALEPPO BUTTON.—A Singular Disease.—The Aleppo button is a singular ulcer, which attacks every person born in the city, and every stranger who spends more than a month there. It can neither be prevented nor cured, and always last a year. The inhabitants almost invariably have it on the face—either on the cheek, forehead, top of the nose—where it often leaves an indelible and disfiguring scar. Strangers, on the contrary, have it on one of the joints, either elbow, wrist, knee or ankle. So strictly is the affection confined to the city proper, that in none of the neighboring villages, nor even in the distant suburbs, is it known. Physicians have vainly attempted to prevent it by inoculation, and are at a loss to what cause to ascribe it. We are liable to have it, but I hope it will not pass its appearance till after I reach home. [Baghdad Telegraph.

CURE FOR TOOTHACHE.—Mr. James Balson, of Aairdrie, says: Gum Copal, when discovered in chloroform, forms an excellent compound for stuffing the holes of decayed teeth. I have used it very frequently, and the benefits my patients have derived from it have been truly astonishing. The application is simple and easy. I clean out the hole, and moisten a little piece of cotton with the solution; I introduce this into the decayed part, and, in every instance, the relief has been almost instantaneous. The chloroform removes the pain, and the gum copal resists the action of the saliva; and, as the application is inoffensive, those who may labor under this dreadful malady would do well to make a trial of it.

Douglas Jerrold is a well known wit, and often cracks a good joke with his literary and other friends in the social circle. At a private party in London, a lady—who, though in the autumn of life, had not lost all dreams of its spring—said to Jerrold: "I cannot imagine what making pay bills' means, I sometimes fancy it must be the 'manner of rosemary,' with which my maid is in the habit of brushing it. What do you think?" "I should rather be afraid madame," replied the distinguished dramatist, dryly, "that it is the manner of Time." (Thyme.)

The longer I live the more certain I am that great difference between men, the great significant, is invincible determination, an honest purpose once fixed, and then victory. Those qualities will do anything that can be done in the world; and no talents, no circumstances, no opportunity, will make a two-legged creature a man without them.

The monthly shipping lists show an enormous increase in the number of ships destined for Australia. Ninety-five vessels—nearly forty thousand tons burthen—are announced to sail the present month from the Thames, besides eighty from Liverpool, and others from different outports. Several of these vessels are foreigners of small tonnage, intended for the conveyance of merchandise. There is great speculation in this branch of trade. Freights have risen considerably, £7@8 being asked for fine goods to Sydney and Melbourne; liquids, £2 per hhd.; rough goods, £6@6 10s; steerage passengers, £22; but the more prudent shipping-houses are withholding freight, in the expectation of a fall of £2 or £3 per ton.

Further Details by the Humboldt.

The Humboldt brings dates from Havre to the 16th ult. Among the passengers is Pulaski, friend of Kossuth.

Interrogations were addressed to the British Government, in reference to an unceurteous speech made by Sir Chas. Wood at Halifax, in which the conduct of the Emperor Louis Napoleon was attacked. Sir Charles being absent, the Earl of Aberdeen and Lord John Russell replied, to the effect that Sir Charles had no intention of being personally offensive to the Emperor.

Mr. Cobden called the attention of the Secretary of Foreign Affairs in a letter in the London Times, written by Earl Egercombe, who says that he has private information of undoubted character, that naval armaments in France are eventually to be employed in a descent upon the English shores. Lord John Russell replied by doubting the correctness of the Earl s information, and declared that the relations existing between the two Governments is of a most friendly character; that the Government had not thought it necessary to remonstrate with France on the subject of naval preparations.

Dates from Paris are to the 15th. The Legislative Chambers were opened on the 14th at the Tuileries by the Emperor in person. In his speech, he said he had decided to reduce the army; to keep good understanding with foreign powers; to prove to the incredulous that when Frenee declares her intention to remain at peace, she must be believed to be strong enough not to be afraid, is the army is to be reduced by 20 000.

The speech created great enthusiasm, and produced a favorable effect on the Bourse, causing a rise of French stocks to revail.

Additional from Mexico.

On the 16th ult., Gen. Braga published a defence of Miramon course in Mexico, which does not seem so convincing as it should have been under the accusation that he had been false to the plan of Guadalajara, or that he had been deceived. He states that after the attack on Guadalajara, though the enemy was not strong enough to do him serious injury, he was not able to destroy them, and that, in order to prevent the effusion of blood, he came to terms with them. He further says his mission is fulfilled, and exhorts the people of Mexico to recognise the present authority as a centre of union, as the only means of avoiding anarchy until the coming election of President.

He says Mr. Moore gave as the names of his partners, Draper, Wetmore, Cryder, Dird, Coleman & Stetson, Sacchi, Robb, Speyer and seven others whose names he was not privileged to divulge until the closing of the contract. He says he took the course he did because he "foresaw the difficulties in which we are now involved, and which are far from being settled."

Later from Jamaica.

By the steamer United States at NewYork, we have received dates from Kingston to the 21st ult.

The House of Assembly refused to raise more than £165,000 for the expenses of 1853, expressing a determination to reduce the excessive amount of taxation.

It is expected that the next steamer will bring us an account of the proceedings of the Legislature relative to the proposition to abolish all charges on shipping, except light dues, which is only six and a quarter cents per ton. The question was to be taken up on the 22d ult, and it was expected that the measure would pass into a law.

A curious incident took place in the House on the 18th. Mr. Hague, one of the reporters of the Daily Advertiser, was placed at the bar, in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and charged with contempt, in having written disrespectful expressions at the bottom of a notice which the Speaker had posted up in the reporters' gallery, requesting them to pass in and ant through a certain door. This regulation was necessitated in consequence of a reporter having made public a private conversation he had overheard between two members while he was lounging about. Mr. Hague, on being placed at the bar, was asked by what evidence the House had arrived at the conclusion that he was the writer of the words in question? He was reminded that he did not appear there to ask, but to answer, such questions as might be put to him. Mr. Hague then declared that he did not know that the order had emanated either from the House or the Speaker, as it bore no official impress, and as it had been posted up by any known official officer of the House. He reiterated he did not know the order had emanated either from the Speaker or the House." Mr. G. A. Hague was then ordered to withdraw, and the doors were closed. On their being re-opened, Mr. Hague was again placed at the bar, and told by Mr. Speaker, "that the House had resolved that he be committed to the common jail of the county of Middlesex, during the pleasure of the House." Whereupon Mr Hague was removed from the bar, and proceeded with the Sergeant-at-Arms, bearing the mace, to the common jail. Upon the Sergeant's return, the officer reported that the body of Mr. Hague had been delivered in custody, as ordered.

THE BLACK WARRIOR AFFAIR.—The following letter from Capt Shirfeldt, of the steamer Black Warrior, has been published in the NewYork Courier and Enquirer. The Captain was blamed by some of the Northern press for his course, but letters, one of which is from Mr. Benjamin, of New Orleans, entirely exculpate him:

STEAMER BLACK WARRIOR, }
NewYork, February 25, 1853. }

To the Editor of the Courier and Enquirer: Understanding that some little excitement has been created by the report of the occurrence which took place between this vessel and a Spanish war brig, off Havana, on the 18th inst., I beg leave to make the following statement and explanation, if such should be deemed necessary by you:

In his report alluded to, there was no intention to create any feeling; it was the simple statement of a fact which occurs often when merchantmen fall in with men-of-war who are cruising on any particular ground for a specific object; in this instance, I presume the brig to have been one of the fleet at present employed around the Island of Cuba in checking the importation of slaves. It was her right and duty to see the flag of every vessel that passed within the range of her guns; and had I known her to have been a man-of-war, I certainly should have anticipated her wishes, and shown our colors as a matter of respect and courtesy; but I was not aware of her character, (there being two other vessels in company, and she having no pennant flying) until my attention was attracted to the smoke of her lee gun, when I instantly gave the order to hoist our flag. The commander of the brig, anxious to exercise his authority—or, perhaps, fearful (as we were going very fast) that we would soon be beyond his range—fired a shotted gun before the man had time to execute the order. Now, this can neither be construed into any want of courtesy on my part towards the Spanish flag, nor a desire to pass unnoticed any insult to our own; for, in the first place, I was ignorant of the fact of her being a man-of-war; and in the second place, when made aware of it, I only waited for her to fire a shot after the American flag was flying, to prove to her Captain that neither he nor any other person could do so with impunity. Very respectfully, R. W. SHUFELDT.

THE BLACK WARRIOR AFFAIR.—We make the following extract from the comments of the Washington Union on the affair of the steamship Black Warrior:

We must confess that we are tired of hearing of explanations and apologies for stopping American vessels, or firing into them on the high seas. Any petty nation thinks it may wrong our ships, and we will gladly consider the matter "honorably adjusted" on the mere allegation of mistake, or on an insincere profession of regret and a worthless apology without adequate reparation, to be followed by a repetition of the wrong at the first convenient opportunity. We have no faith in these mistakes, and no consideration for such apologies: for we have never heard that a foreign officer was ever punished or even retaked for stopping an American ship. Why no but some of our captains or commodores make a mistake occasionally, and stop a foreign ship? Are they wiser than the officers of other nations, and less liable to error? Or are they more cautious and less zealous in the discharge of their duties? We cannot answer these questions; but we know that our officers have so managed as not to make mistakes and fire into foreign vessels, either public or private. Steps ought to be taken, therefore, to prevent violence to our ships; and, if mistakes continue, it might have a wholesome effect if our captains and commodores would commit a few blunders in return. It is a bad plan which does not work both ways. We like reciprocity, and retaliation too, when it becomes necessary to put a stop to aggression.

FROM THE RIO GRANDE.—The Brownsville Flag of the 18th February learns, from good authority, that the plans of Carvajal have been abandoned, at least for the present, and that his followers, many of whom are formers, have turned their attention to planting their fields.

The same paper says: We are pleased to see the affairs in Matamoras assuming an aspect of content and quietude not experienced before for some time. Another feature of the new order of things we notice with satisfaction, and that is the unrestrained, friendly intercourse between the citizens of Brownsville and Matamoras. During the administration of Gen Avalos, it was a rare thing to see a Mexican officer in our streets; now, however, we are rejoiced to see them daily interchanging civilities with our officers and citizens. We repeat, it is particularly gratifying to note the existence of this state of affairs, and we sincerely hope they may long continue thus. Every exertion appears to be manifested both by Col. Cruz and his command, as well as by the civil authorities and citizens of Matamoras, to restore and maintain good relations and harmony, not alone with their own people, but also with their neighbors. Let us, then, not be backward in maintaining, on our part, the continuance of this good neighborhood.

THE CALORIC SHIP ERICSSON.—We have on which to say a word again. The new method of propulsion that is about to be tested in its application to the Ericsson, expecting to arrive in this country from America. All that we wish to draw attention to, without dispraragement to any successful modification that Capt. Ericson may put in operation connected with heated air as a motive power, is the fact, that the invention, said to be his, is not new. About thirty years ago, a vessel named the Highland, that sailed many of our readers will remember as passage boat on the Clyde, was fitted up by Messrs. Cland, Girdwood & Co., of this city, with a caloric engine, the invention, we believe, of the Rev. Mr. Stirling, now minister of a parish—Galston, we think—near Kilmarnock. The engine propelled the vessel at the moderate rate that gave satisfaction in those days, being estimated sawmilling at twenty horse power. It was subsequently removed from the vessel in consequence of the working parts yielding to the enormous heat, and thereby becoming soft, and giving way, and its place was supplied by an ordinary steam engine. We trust that Capt. Ericsson's engine will labor under a like disadvantage; but he that is so many, he must contest himself with ranking in this country as the mere modifier of the invention of Mr. Stirling, whose caloric engine we saw working regularly in Dundee in 1843, in a factory. [Glasgow (Scotland) Advertiser.

SINGULAR SECRET SOCIETY.—The police of Perrysville, Ashland county, have just discovered and exposed a "secret society" among the youth of that town, which is startling enough in its features; the penalty a little harder than usual:

The society numbered a band of fifteen young men and boys, formed for the purpose of robbery. A Captain was chosen and a regular Constitution and By-Laws, the violation of which was death, were adopted. One of the band stole from his own father $10, which he had collected for a poor widow, who had no son belonging to the band. Learning that the money belonged to her, the band stole $10 from another woman to replace it. The cash-drawer of a landlord in Perrysville was opened by two of the band, and a ten dollar bill taken from it. The one that changed the bill to divide with his comrades, charged a premium for making change. This being a violation of the By-Laws, the rest of the band, unknown to him, held a meeting, and determined on his death. It was arranged that all were to go out upon the ice (in which a hole was to be previously cut), to skate, and thus all to pass over first and excite his curiosity in the water, and took in, and when this one should stoop over the hole one of the company should strike him with a club and pitch him in. One young man, whose heart was not so corroded as the rest, relented, and by giving information prevented the murder. Several of the company are now in the Ashland Jail. [Cin. Enq.

THE FORT SMITH ROUTE TO CALIFORNIA.—The Fort Smith Herald, in reply to a letter addressed to the editor from this city, making inquiries relative to the Fort Smith route to California, passing through Santa Fe or Albuquerque, says:

The Fort Smith route affords grass as early generally as the 1st of April, and the road to Santa Fe is as good as any known; and the road by Don Ana is almost unsurpassed, affording abundance of good grass for stock. It is supposed that the route by Santa Fe, thence by Walker's Pass, is the nearest and best known; at least it is said so by those living in Santa Fe. From Santa Fe by this Pass it requires only twenty-five days to reach California. We know nothing about it, only what has been published in regard to it. There are urgent many making arrangements to leave here early in the spring. Pack mules leave no doubt the speediest way of traveling, and emigrants can reach California in about half the time it takes wagons to go. There is but little danger to be apprehended from Indians, provided emigrants are prudent and watchful. In regard to mules, we can say that there will be a large number here for sale, but as to the rate we cannot say; but presume that they may be had at moderate prices.

EXTRAVAGANT PROFITS OF LEAD MINING.—The Grant County Herald remarks as follows, under this head: "We learn that smelters at Franklin (Iowa county) are paying $40 per 1000 lbs. for mineral. We fear that this rate is the result of competition, or else over-estimated demand. That mineral will fluctuate the coming season between $30 and $40, we have no doubt; but that it will steadily value, based upon the Eastern and St. Louis price of lead, will be $40, we doubt very much. But that as it may, miners may rely upon a very high compensation for their labors henceforth." We fully agree in the above opinion. The price of our staple, for some time to come, must mainly depend on the prices asked by the owners of Spanish and English lead, for it is plain that our own mines cannot supply the market. If foreign dealers choose to keep the price so near its present limit, we think they can do so; but this cannot be a safe reliance in the transaction of a heavy business. [Galena Advertiser, 15th ult.

CONSTRUCTIVE MILK.—An article of this name is advertised in the NewYork papers. The editor of the Courier and Enquirer says he has been induced to test the properties of the article, and the result is a well grounded conviction that it is in sober truth a discovery of no ordinary character, and one which is destined to add greatly to the comfort of mankind.

Fresh and wholesome milk is a luxury which almost everybody appreciates and to many it is a necessary of life. Yet we are at all times so situated that it is absolutely undrinkable. This is too frequently the case at sea, and therefore the man who has invented a mode of preserving it, or has devised a substitute for it, which is potable, and at the same time capable of retaining its peculiar qualities, is a public benefactor.

CONSTRUCTION AS ATTORNEYS.—The bill to prevent frauds on the Treasury has been so amended as to permit members of Congress to prosecute claims, provided they receive no pecuniary compensation for so doing. They will therefore be enabled to exert the full weight of the influence arising from their position with the heads of departments; and even though their decisions be adverse to applications thus enforced, gentlemen so situated must evidently be incompetent to decide upon claims in which they are thus indirectly interested, when they subsequently come up for legislative action in the Senate or House of Representatives.

NEW PRINTING MACHINE.—We noticed among one of the many improvements added to the establishment of Messrs. Webb & Leverings blank book manufactory and bindery, on Main, below Third Street, an ingenious printing machine for paging all kinds of blank books, music books, and others when the paging is omitted. The machine is simple, and numbers the upper and lower leaf at the same time, thus numbering two pages at once. The machine is capable of paging any work to the extent of 1000 pages in large bold type in neat and handsome style, without blot or blure. [Louisville Journal.

FANCIES OF AN ARTIST.—We are told that Ole Bull, the great violinist, next to his favorite instrument, has a passionate fondness for horse flesh, and whenever he meets with any thing beautiful in this line, he almost invariably purchases it. Some six or seven years since, he amused himself for a few months by accompanying the celebrated French General Yussuf in a foray against the Arabs in Algeria. The General, by a well planned manœuvre gained a signal victory over the Bedouins, capturing all their horses and about forty prisoners. The horses were very beautiful, and from the moment he laid eyes upon them, they were Ole Bull's delight and constant theme of admiration. He purchased four of them, having to pay an enormous price, and shipped them for his home, on the enchanting island, "Christiansand," in Norway. Three of these splendid animals died on the passage, but the most beautiful one of the four survived. and was named by the great Maestro, Mazeppa. It is still living and in his possession. Immense offers have been repeatedly made to him for Mazeppa, but no money could induce him to part with his favorite horse. He has a stud of the most splendid horses in Europe, and we learn that he intends to bring them all over to his flourishing colony in Pennsylvania, where he has already sent the famous stallion "Hero," and several other fine animals which he purchased a few weeks since in Columbia, South Carolina.

A valuable discovery with regard to daguerreotypes has been made by Mr. S. N. Carvalho, an artist of Charleston, S. C. It has been hitherto necessary to enclose daguerreotypes in cases, and cover them with glass, as the least friction destroyed the work of sun and shadow. Mr. Carvalho has discovered a perfectly transparent enamel, insoluble by all ordinary agents, a thin coating of which being spread upon a daguerreotype, it may be carried about without other protection, or sent by post to any part of the world. The enamel produces no perceptible effect upon the picture.

The Paris Moniteur Algerien states that, since 1736 to 1815, the number of Christian slaves at Algiers were never less than 500, and at times amounted to 2000. In 1816 it was 1400, but in that year the Dey of Algiers, after the bombardment of the city by Lord Exmouth, entered into a treaty by which he put an end to the slavery of Christians. In 1812 and 1813, the Christian slaves were, 62 Romans, 625 Neapolitans, 52 French, 24 Americans, 8 Spaniards, 372 Greeks, 10 Austrians, 34 Sardinians, 285 Sicilians, 10 Flemings, 5 persons from Doubray, and 150 from Mellile.

A WHOLE FAMILY SWEPT AWAY.—About a year since, a family, by the name of Twombly started from South Malden, Mass., for the West. The family consisted of the father, mother, five or six children, and an old man, who had long resided with them. Shortly after arriving at their new home, the father and two children died. The mother, with the remainder of the family, started to return, under the protection of the old man, and all are supposed to have been lost on the lakes, by one of the disasters which occurred early in the winter, as nothing has since been heard of them.

There are forty patients now confined in the Ohio Lunatic Asylum, who were victims of spirit rapping delusion and knavery. The greater number came from the Western Reserve.

During the past year eighteen persons were admitted to the Indiana asylum for the insane, whose insanity is attributed to the spirit-rapping imposture. Nearly every asylum for the insane has the victims of this imposture among its inmates.

THE UNITED STATES AND PARAGUAY.—On Friday the 25th ult. the bark Kate and Alice sailed from NewYork for Montevideo with a full cargo, including a quantity of coal, shipped by the United States and Paraguay Steam Navigation Company, on their own account. She also took out a splendid carriage and horses as a present to Gen. Lopez.

ANOTHER DONATION FROM MR. PEABODY.—The Boston Transcript states that George Peabody, Esq., the American banker in London, has made a further donation of $10,000 to the town of Danvers, his native place, to be applied to the moral and mental improvement of its citizens. Last year Mr. P. gave the town $20,000 for this purpose.

A CHEAP COUGH MIXTURE.—Take three cents' worth of liquorice, and three cents' worth of gum arabic; pulverize them into a quart of warm water, simmer them till thoroughly dissolved; then add three cents' worth of paregoric, and one like quantity of antimonial wine. Let it cool, and sip whenever the cough is troublesome. It is pleasant, cheap and good, and will remove a common cough from recent old. Its cost is fifteen cents.

The New York Tribune thinks that the accession to the metallic currency of the world, during the last two years, has been about four per cent. a year; and since prices of real estate, and many other things, have risen far above that increase, it apprehends there is danger of a general revulsion before long.

The recent death of Lord Melbourne is now going the round of the American newspapers. This is an error. Lord Melbourne, formerly Prime Minister of Great Britain, died in November, 1848. His successor in the title still lives. Lady Melbourne has lately deceased, and this is probably the origin of the misstatement.

PENNSYLVANIA DEAF AND DUMB INSTITUTE.—During the year 1852, 83 pupils, (viz: 16 boys and 17 girls,) were admitted, and 25, (viz: 10 boys and 15 girls,) were dismissed.

"There remained in the Institution on the 31st day of December, 1852, 78 boys and 65 girls—total, 143. Of this number 67 are supported by the State of Pennsylvania; 14 by the State of Maryland; 10 by the State of New Jersey; 4 by the State of Delaware, and 18 by their friends or by the institution."

HEMP.—We hear of but little doing beyond the supply of the rope-walk. To supply this demand as high as $80, we are informed, has been given on short time. There is a girl in Troy who wears such a sunshiney face, that when she goes out doors the snow birds take her for summer, and follow her about as if she had apple blossoms in her apron. With such a power in cheerfulness, isn't it singular that women ever allow themselves to have the sulks?

Of all melancholy sights, a bachelor's home is the most so. A house without a woman is like a world without a sky, or a sky without a star—dark, desolate and dreary.

Sally Maminash, the last of the Indian race in Northampton, Mass., died in that town a short time since, at the age of eighty-eight. Her father, Joseph Maminash, died in 1767, and her mother, who was a Mohekan, and a sister of Rev. Sampson Occom, the celebrated Indian preacher, in 1789. At the age of fifty she was one of the early pupils of a revival under Rev. Mr. Willard, and during the remainer of her long life an exemplary Christian.

A singular discovery is given by a Cuban correspondent of the Raleigh Standard. Dr. Tinsley, an English practitioner of long experience in Cuba, and a graduate of Paris, has discovered, in the course of his practice in cases of small pox, that vaccine virus, after having once passed through a negro's system, becomes useless as a preventive to the white race.

During the reign of Queen Anne, the Earl of Clarendon was appointed Governor of the Provinces of NewYork, and commissioned to represent Her Majesty in that office. The Earl, whose "upper chamber" seems to have been somewhat scantily furnished, understood this phrase rather too literally, and actually put on a woman's dress as his official costume! A painting of him, thus accoutred, still exists in England.

[For the N. O. Christian Advocate.]

The following exquisite stanzas were sent to the author, several months ago, in connection with an obituary notice of the lamented dead,—who died in Attakapas, La. The obituary appeared in due time, but the poetry was mislaid:

TO MY SISTER IN HEAVEN.

BY J. W. RICHARDSON, OF LA.

Thou art gone from me, sister, thou art gone to thy rest,
Thy spirit has fled to the home of the blest;
While deep 'neath the turf, all lifeless and cold,
Reposes the form which we loved to behold.

The sound of thy footstep no longer is heard,
And that voice, which rivaled the notes of the bird,
Shall never again its sweet pleasures impart,
Nor send the glad thrill to thy brother's lone heart.

No more shall I bask in the light of thy smile;
No more shall those sof-tbreathing accents beguile;
No more shall those eyes, all sparkling and bright,
Dispense their sweet beams of joy and delight.

In the morn of existence, from life and its cares,
Thou hast left me, sweet sister, in sorrow and tears:
Like a flower of beauty, cut down in its bloom,
Every charm that was thine has fled to the tomb.

Thou art gone from me, sister, but oft I'll look back
Through the vista of years, o'or life's desert track,
To the sad, sad time, when the curtain of night,
Was drawn over all that was lovely and bright.

It was then, when earth had faded away,
And hope had departed, with the light of the day,
Thou came'st like an angel, sent down from above,
And illumined my night* with the light of thy love.

Thou art gone from me, sister, but deep in my heart
Thy memory will live—it can never depart:
It's all that is left me in life to console—
'Tis the joy of my heart,—'tis the food of my soul.

*The author alludes to his own loss of sight.

SHALL WE KNOW EACH OTHER IN HEAVEN?

A Dialogue.

Mr. C. I cannot believe we shall know each other in heaven; the absence of the loved ones would give us sorrow which can be felt only by imperfect beings.

Mr. H. Perhaps if the sorrow were like that of the Master over the impending doom of Jerusalem, it would evince a higher rather than a lower perfection of nature.

Mr. C. Ignorance of the fact that those we loved on earth are excluded from heaven, will nevertheless, it seems to me, be necessary even then to prevent the rebellious wish arising in the heart that God had not so dealt with them.

Mr. H. Your difficulty implies that if we knew truly the divine character, of which his dispensations are the image, we could not possess the spirit of submission; that is we cannot love him as he really is, but as he is not, which is not truly to love him at all. But then "we shall know not in part, but as we are known." We shall learn that the Saviour "would have gathered them," and their own choice of evil alone utterly disqualified them to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, and so we will meekly acquiesce in the judgments of heaven.

Mr. C. To remove objections to the opinion that we shall know each other hereafter does not prove its truth.

Mr. H. Well, there is sufficient proof of it. It is implied in the doctrine of the general judgment, which will be conducted for the instruction of created minds, and not for the information of the Omniscient Judge, which instruction includes a knowledge, one of another.

The saints are said to be "in light;" "there is no night there," no darkness of any kind: "we shall know as we are known." It is true these descriptions, of the excessive light of the holy city, refer chiefly to our knowledge of God, but they are certainly incongruous with the notion that the memory of all our past associations and intercourse with mankind is sunk into oblivion. David's language, "I shall go to him," and Paul's words of comfort to the Thessalonians, that we "sorrow not even as others which have no hope," teach us that the sorrows of the death-separation shall flee away upon a reunion with them, not as with lovely strangers, but as the beloved of the past restored unto us. It is impossible to believe that Moses and Elias knew not each other when talking with Christ on the mount of transfiguration. They loved each other as all the pure do—were fellow servants of the Lord, and spake of the decease he should accomplish at Jerusalem. This plainly shows they knew, at least, some of the events and places of earth. In such circumstances ignorance of each other would have been strange, indeed, when even the Apostles, who had never before seen either of them, knew them both. The angels who visited Abraham knew him and Sarah; Lot and his family, and the wickedness of Sodom and Gomorrah. They were intimately acquainted with both persons and places. None will doubt their equally perfect knowledge of each other. Now, it would be very singular if angels, who constitute part of the family above, should have such information of things and persons, actually beyond their own immediate sphere, while their fellow-worshippers, redeemed from among men, should remember nothing of human affairs. Do you think the saints will know they were once sinners?

Mr. C. O, yes! They will sing to the Lamb, Thou hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred and tongue, and people and nation; hence, they must know that because of their sins redemption was necessary.

Mr. H. Will they remember merely the abstract fact of their sinfulness, without recollecting a single offence they had committed, or will they also remember the specific bitter fruits and evidences of their depravity?

Mr. C. I admit that a correct knowledge of their past guilt includes the memory of particular transgressions.

Mr. H. Will they also remember the grace Christ had wrought in them, and the holy acts he had enabled them to perform?

Mr. C. Certainly this is no i- in order to the full glory of the ly inter-.

Mr. H. If then they know their past virtues and vices, and by consequence the order, time, and place of them—for order, time and place, materially affect the quality of our deeds, as, for instance, sin after conversion is greater ingratitude to Christ than the same offence before we obtained mercy—our whole lives will be before our minds, and we may speak of them to each other in the mode of celestial communication. Moreover, our virtues and vices consist largely in actions done, or principles cherished toward our fellow beings in the various relations of life: for example, filial virtue honors parents; conjugal, cultivates faithful affection to husbands or wives; fraternal, cherishes brothers or sisters; political virtue seeks the good of our commonwealth; friendship is entertained for congenial spirits; patience and long-suffering are exercised toward those who injure us; benevolence cares for the needy; kindness diffuses joy around us; charity, fortitude and faith, overcome this world; hence the memory of past virtues and vices will include the recollection of all persons evil, or happily affected by our short earth-life.

Mr. C. I grant that the spirits may perfectly remember the entire past, but it doth not follow that they will recognize in the myriads of shining ones about them, then so gloriously changed, the once lowly kindred friends and fellow-sufferers of their probationary state.

Mr. H. From this fact of the resurrection of the same bodies, I do not think they will fail at a glance to recognize among the bright ones of God their former friends. Should they not, how long think you before they discover the cherished ones? Imagine the countless throng mingling on the blissful plains of Paradise; the song of Moses and the Lamb rolls sweetly over the wide extended scene; afar the golden and jeweled walls sparkle in a flood of brilliancy; a wonderfully bright, lovely, and mysterious light, ie strangely, without sun or star, shed upon the whole land, upon the mystic tree of life, upon the pure transparent river of life in its sweetly winding flow, upon the sea of glass fire-mingled, adown the golden streets, flashed in diamond jets from the living fountains, irradiating the serene air, penciling glorious hues upon loveliest bowers, the many mansions in our father's house, and shining upon the very hearts of the multitude of pure robed ones whom no man could number. It enkindles rapture, awakes bursts of joy, and reveals treasures of wisdom; every face and heart reflects it.

In this scene, with perfect memory, see two sweet spirits arrayed like Him before whom John fell to worship. One of them is the older where all are ever youthful. His glory, compared with some of the beautified, is "as the light of seven days;" the other hath a glory hardly less excellent. They approach and salute in holiest brotherhood; they interchange thought; mind is there; "they have put away childish things." Hear, then, "O, the far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, hath given us. To Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever!" "Joyfully," saith the younger, "in a new song will we praise the Lamb, who hath taken us out of great tribulation, and washed our robes and made them white in His own blood. Worthy, thrice worthy, is the Lamb that was slain for us." "Brother," saith the older, "where my sin abounded, His grace did much more abound; it nerved me to fight the good fight, to keep the faith, and to finish my course with joy; and, now, perils by land or sea, among the heathen, or mine own countrymen, with the afflictions which in every city awaited me, are fled away for ever. How glorious this crown of life, the gift of my merciful Judge; how sweet this rest from my labors."

"I, too," replies the younger, "felt the power of His grace through faith unto salvation, by which also I was made a fellow laborer in the Gospel of Christ, and sought the things which are Jesus Christ's; therefore God is not ashamed to be called my God, whose mercy hath given me also a name in this blessed city."

"See," saith the elder again, "yon glorious Lamb, the light and the temple of this holy place; I did many things contrary to His name; I was present at the stoning of Stephen, his first martyr. Being exceedingly mad against His saints, when they were put to death, I gave my voice against them, and persecuted them unto strange cities; whereupon, as I went to Damascus, at mid-day I saw a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun, shining round about me; it was the shadow of His brightness. When fallen to the earth I heard a voice—it was the voice of Mercy and Love—calling me to His service, and now this joy."

"Is this," saith the younger, quickly, "Paul, my much loved spiritual father, for whose blessed ministry I have long praised my Saviour? What! remembrest thou not the young man of Lystra, the son of Lois, and grandson of Eunice, thine own son Timothy, whose knowledge, from a child, in the Holy Scriptures then didst commend?"

"Art thou," with an expression of rapture, responds the senior, "Timothy—my own dearly beloved son Timothy, to whom I gave my last sacred charge, which thou hast faithfully kept? Welcome to my heart, my own, my blessed brother! O, magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together! My spirit rejoiceth in God, my Saviour, for He that is mighty hath done great things for us, and holy is His name."

Mr. C. I cannot resist conviction. Your inferences are fair, and your view of heavenly bliss scriptural, but will all think you enjoy such privileges of conscious re-union with the loved of the past, as those eminent saints, Paul and Timothy?

Mr. H. Most assuredly I do. How can it be otherwise? You admit that a knowledge of redemption will be the basis of their grateful praise, and this involves, as we have seen, a recollection of their depravity, of the change which passed upon them by grace, and a consequent remembrance of all persons evily or happily affected by their virtues or vices. Now add to this the simple power to interchange thought, without which society, properly so called, would not exist in heaven, and you have all that is necessary to acquaint yourself familiarly and perfectly, during the roll of eternal ages, with every lovely, gentle and wise spirit, in all the myriad millions of your glorified brethren.

Mr. C. What a motive is this to faithful effort for the salvation of our friends.

Mr. H. It is, and it surprises me that any should doubt our ability to recognize our friends hereafter. It seems to me to evince either a degree of unbelief in the fact of heavenly rewards, or a sad want of attention to Bible truths connected with this subject. Now, at the risk of being thought speculative—for all ideas upon religious topics beyond the beaten circle of dullness or superficial thought are generally considered fanciful—I will venture to show the plain consequences which flow from the opposite opinion. Let it be granted that the entire past history of the glorified saints is erased from their minds, and hidden in impenetrable darkness, so that conversation cannot possibly discover to them their past friendship. Only allow them the faculty of communing upon what they do know, without which isolation reigns in heaven.

In these changed circumstances let Paul and Timothy meet as before supposed. They still sweetly salute each other, for they discover in each other the beautiful image of God—the infallible badge of fraternal love.

"Hail, thou glorious spirit!" saith the younger, "by what name art thou registered in the Book of Life?"

"It is known as Paul," saith the elder. "And thine, thou highly favored one?"

"Timothy. Hast thou, Paul, dwelt ages in this glorious Eden, gathering the glory which adorns thee? Or, wast thou ever an inhabitant of a less glorious sphere?"

"My nativity, Timothy, I learn was cast in a sphere called earth: of the glory of my native place, my mind informs me not. It doubtless was inferior to this habitation of the Throne of I AM. My first consciousness of life was near yonder Eastern gate where those sweet angel guards, you see there, smiled upon me. My heart drew me to the Throne to worship; at every step as I proceeded, I was amazed at new beauties opening around me. Innumerable happy faces, all strange to me, breathed upon me as if they had always loved me, and I loved them no less. Spontaneously praise fell from my lips, in holy song, as I fell before the Lamb amid the white vested elders."

"And so did my lips praise the Lord, Paul. I, also, learned that I was redeemed from earth, but memory goes not beyond the same glorious gate. There, astonished, I gazed long and entranced—listened to the choral praises swelling up from the hearts of mighty millions, and pouring out treasures of richest wisdom and love at the Redeemer's feet. Every word was light to me, and fell like holy dew upon my heart, vibrating in unison with their joy. Two sweet spirits clasped me to their hearts, and hastened me, winged with love, to the presence of the Lamb: for a moment the silvery beauty of the river of life, and the lovely richness of the tree upon its banks, arrested my attention, until a nearer view of the excellent glory; when, swift as the response in the outposts of heaven to the voices of the Throne, I hastened and fell before Him who liveth for ever and ever, crying Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord of Hosts. The rapture of that moment still lives before me. But tell me, Paul, how long didst thou dwell upon earth?"

"I know not, Timothy, whether during one or more of the vast cycles of eternity, which ever open more blissful eras to the sons of God."

"Knowest thou, Paul, whether our native place bore any analogy to our present glorious home?"

"No, Timothy, deep darkness covereth it."

"I have heard that many dwelt there with us. Rememberest thou them, Paul, or their manner of life?"

"No, Timothy, they are to memory, as though they had not been. I have learned but this: that we were sinners, and wonderful it is to me that we should ever have refused full-hearted love to Him who is the fairest among ten thousand. But yonder comes Gabriel; perchance he knoweth of earth. Hail, thou prince of light! We know thee to be the faithful and swift messenger of the Throne; canst thou resolve our doubts of earth, our birth place, and of our being there?"

"Truly, Paul, I have seen earth, and know of its strange history. I was once the bearer of a message of moment to the Virgin; but enough: let your hearts quiet you; it is not given you to know of it: thus much may I say, give all honor to the Lamb, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, for much owe ye Him for your wonderful redemption thence."

Can it be possible, Mr. C., that this is the manner of the Land of Light? Is this "making to ourselves friends, who shall receive us into everlasting habitations." Is it like the holy action of Heaven described in Revelation? No, by no means: perish the doubt of the conscious restoration of friends in heaven. E. J. H.

THOROUGHFARE READINGS.

On this day there are several thousand people, of all grades and classes, who are busily preparing to leave, for home or abroad, on the various conveyances that depart today from NewOrleans, Louisville, Charleston, and forty other towns and cities, in the bounds of our Church. In nineteen cases in twenty these persons are busily engaged: hurry! hurry! for several hours previous to leaving. But, how, most or all are on board, the hurry is succeeded by entire leisure, and in an hour, or in five minutes, the vessel, boat or car, is off. As soon as this leisure moment comes, the question comes with it: Well, now, what about something to read? "Oh! I entirely forgot to buy some books," says one. Another says: "Wife, did you provide any books for the trip?" "No: I fully intended it, but we were in such a hurry!" Well, something must be had, and the best that can be done, for the moment, is to look up the basket-boys and select the least objectionable of a parcel of dirty or worthless trash. And they are almost compelled, in self-defence, to read this trash for a day, or a week, as the case may be.

Now, Brother McTyeire, you and I know, very well, that this is the condition of five thousand persons to-day: it has been the case with a like number on every day for years past; and, as yet, no remedy is provided. I mean five thousand—more like ten thousand, who are within the reach of our influence—in regard to whom our Church has the means of abating the evil.

Now, it is the easiest, cheapest—yes, and one of the most useless things in the world—to croak over an existing evil. It requires but a small stock of either eyes, or ears, or brains, to make such discoveries; and not much industry to read a homily over them: this is not my present purpose.

I have recently been spoken to, and have conversed with some of the most distinguished ministers, and members of our Church, on this subject; and the universal sentiment, so far as I have learned, is that the evil in question is within our control. Certainly there is, right here, a very large field of usefulness entirely vacant. But what can be done? This can be done:

There is one very important truth that the Church seems not yet to have learned; that is this—the printing press will work just as cheap for us as for any one else! Then, let there be selected from books already published, and let persons be requested to prepare others, suitable books, of small size, on the subjects of Enterprise, Improvement, Science, Morals, Temperance, Religion, Miscellany, etc. Let these things be spread over an extensive variety; let them possess buoyancy, elasticity, humor, gravity, speculation, and readableness. Let them be published for the most part in the cheapest pamphlet form; and then—buy some baskets.

Now, sir, supposing we had these works published, how many men could be profitably employed in the sale of them in New Orleans, in Natchez, Vicksburg, Memphis, St. Louis, Louisville, Mobile, Montgomery, and in such like places, all over our country? It is believed, by those who know more than you and I both, that a system of book-making and selling, of this kind, will "pay," besides the immense good it will do. What do you think? And when I say, what do you think? I mean to ask a question.

I presume there would be no great difficulty in your handing this paper to the printer, or in putting it on the copy-hook, and so let it be printed. One man would read it, and say, "Well;" another might say "Yes, I reckon;" and a third, perhaps, "Well, may be, that would do." But, sir, this is not exactly what I propose. If this is your notion, I reckon you had better throw this paper under the table.

I propose to you, personally, that first you hold still a few minutes—long enough to look over the ground a little, and then turn your thoughts over a few times, and then brush up your enterprise a little, and then take your pen, and write down what you think about the matter, and print that. No matter about printing this, particularly. And when you have done all, then ask your brother editors what they think about it; and if deemed practicable, let the thing be put in motion.

We greatly need a light literature, properly so called, of moral, religious, and miscellaneous "Thoroughfare Readings." It is believed, by at least some of our friends who have the best opportunities of knowing, that a system of this kind can be put a going, and if properly directed will sustain itself well. I am one of those who believe that the Church has not as yet, by any means, suitably engaged the services of the press in the propogation and dissemination of religious and useful knowledge.

In the last two months I have traveled on near twenty steamboats, and I have noticed this matter carefully; not for the first time, however. I have looked round among a hundred deck passengers, and I have found nothing, almost, absolutely, nothing to read. I have looked in the ladies' cabin of the "Eclipse," the "Shotwell," the "Magnolia," the "Telegraphs," etc., and I found three two-bit novels among forty ladies, and a few, very few, other things of not much greater value. The forward cabins are supplied with twenty two-bit novels, a few nameless things, six newspapers, and four packs of cards, for seventy-five persons to read.

The Female Bible Society of New Orleans, with enterprise and devotion that ought to be copied, as well as admired, has seldom failed to make its mark in both cabins: but what are these among so many?

Now, sir, will you be so good as to say something, or nothing, just as you think best, on the subject of "Thoroughfare Readings," and I will be your humble servant,

Miss. SCHWARZEAD.

THE INEXHAUSTIBLE FULLNESS OF THE SACRED WRITINGS.

REV. GARDNER SPRING, D.D.

We can furnish but a bare suggestion on this rich and varied topic, to be traced out and amplified, as it may present itself in different lights and forms to different minds. The Bible is in this respect a most wonderful volume. There is nothing like it in the wide world—no such source of intellectual wealth: itself never exhausted, yet exhausting the brightest, strongest, and most potent minds. A candid mind, that has been prepossessed against it, needs but to read it in order to confess with shame that it has disappointed its prejudices, and that it is enriched with thoughts altogether beyond any other volume.

There are thoughts in this sacred Book which, though perfectly obvious when seen, are not seen on the first or the second inspection, even though that inspection be ever so full. Instances of this kind so frequently occur, that they are continually sources of surprise and admiration even to the most reflecting minds. It is wonderful to observe what new trains of thought of prodigious interest are often suggested by a single sentence, or a single fact recorded in the Bible; a word, a date, not before observed, or not understood, or viewed in some new aspect. The Bible seems in this respect almost like enchanted ground; or rather like the embowered precincts of some unearthly world. As we pass over its luxuriant plains, and tread its wide and accustomed avenues, we unexpectedly discover a thousand less frequented paths that open views—views of indescribable richness and beauty, that are new and immeasurable. It is difficult, if not impossible, to resist the impression that this light which shines upon us is from no earthly source, but beams from the infinite Intelligence above us. The mind is never weary in tracing out those opening vistas of truth, except from its own infirmity; and even when thus wearied, may always recover and refresh itself at unwasting fountains, scattered by the wayside, and every where overhung by the dense shadow of the Tree of Life.

We do not find it so with any other book. This is one of the great peculiarities of the Bible; it is an exhaustless volume. Viewed as a whole it is like the full orbed sun, which, though it may have spots on its disk, dazzles by its splendor; and the more we gaze upon it, and the more its light emanates and is diffused, the more de its resources appear unwasting. Portions of this Book seem deep and unfathomable; but even its deepest recesses are neither empty nor dark. It is a vast profound, which lies open to the day; where, though reason's lamp alone were darkness, yet the deeper it descends, it not only encounters no noxious vapors, but, as in a mine of jewels, in every discovered gem it receives back the reflected light of heaven. There is no other book which a few careful readings of a sound and retentive mind will not exhaust. Yet men there are who have made this volume the object of their study for half a century; who have examined every paragraph it contains with repeated and closest scrutiny, and with every fresh perusal, have discovered new thoughts, and now causes for wonder and joy. The more deeply they have become absorbed in its pages, the more deep and thorough has been their conviction of its illimitable resources—a conviction uniformly strengthened by their growing acquaintance with its instructions, and by all the effort and honesty, the humility and prayer, they have been enabled to bring to their researches.

There was an humble fisherman on the lakes of Palestine, who wrote a short treatise so replete with heavenly truth, that Archbishop Leighton, whom Dr. Doddridge calls "that wonderful man," employed years of intense and delighted labor in illustrating the rich and heart-affecting lessons it contains—lessons which furnished even the splendid mind of Coleridge with many of those "Aphorisms" which form the basis of his far-famed "Aids to Reflection." Nor do the Epistles of Peter stand alone as exhibitions of intellectual vigor and richness, to which minds unaided by the Holy Spirit never aspired. There is no book in any age, in any country, which can, in this respect, be compared with the Bible. It has very little in common with other books: aside from some of its genealogical records, it has borrowed nothing from them; while it is the unexhausted, inexhaustible source from which every thing that is truly valuable on the great subjects of which it treats, is derived.

The storms of adversity are wholesome, though, like snow-storms, their drift is not always seen.

Dickens, in his Household Words, maintains that in seventy years we have but about fifteen for labor. He devotes the remainder for sleep, eating, amusement, etc.

TOO POOR TO PAY.

We were so poor when baby died,
And mother stitched his shroud,
The others in their hunger cried,
With sorrow wild and loud;
We were so poor we could not pay
The man to carry him away.

I see it still before my eyes—
It lies upon the bed,
And mother whispers through her sighs,
"The little boy is dead."
A little box of common pine
His coffin was—and may be mine.

They laid our little brother out,
And wrapped his form in white,
And, as they turned his head about,
We saw the solemn sight,
And wept as little children weep,
And blessed the dead one in his sleep.

We looked our last upon his face,
And said our last "Good-by,"
While mother laid him in the place
Where those are laid who die;
The sexton shoved the box away,
Because we were too poor to pay.

We were too poor to hire a hearse,
And couldn't get a pall;
And we drove him to the grave—
A wagon held us all.
'Twas I who drove the hearse, and I
Who told my mother not to cry.

We rode along the crowded town,
And felt so lone and drear,
And oft our tears came trickling down,
Because no friends were near;
The folks were strangers, selfish men,
Who hadn't lost a baby then!

We reached the grave and laid him there,
With all the dead around;
There was no priest to say a prayer,
And bless the holy ground;
So home we went in grief and pain—
But home was never home again!

And there he sleeps, without a stone
To mark the sacred spot;
But though to all the world unknown,
By us 'tis ne'er forgot.
We mean to raise a stone some day—
But now we are too poor to pay.

WHO EDUCATES YOUR INFANT?

We often ponder this question in our own mind, as we see the infants of our citizens given over to the guardianship of ignorant, and often bad tempered and unprincipled nurses. In many families this ignorant, high tempered nurse, spends a great deal more time with the infant, and exercises more influence over its mind than the mother does, and of course has more to do in the formation of its character than the parent. We need not ask what kind of a character she will impart to the child. She will impart her own.

The great object of a multitude of mothers is to get rid of the trouble of attending constantly to their infants. They like to fondle the little creatures when they are washed and dressed, and in good humor; but the moment they begin to be troublesome, and fretful, they call Betty, or Bridget, to take the child away. Many mothers will pay for the services of a child's nurse, when they can ill afford it, and will dispense with many coveted things for the sake of this.

But, when Betty takes the baby from its mother, let us follow her and see how she manages that uneasy, fretful, little child. Perhaps the baby hurt itself by falling against the chair, or bedstead; naughty chair, naughty bedstead, says Betty, it shall be whipped for hurting Betty's blessed little baby; and slap, slap, goes Betty's big hand, or shoe, against the offending chair, or bedstead; thus teaching the baby a lesson of revenge, instead of trying to teach it the necessity of being careful of its steps.

Or, if baby persists in crying, after the chair has been punished, Betty has a dark closet, or a black man, or some other bugaboo, into whose charge she threatens to put it if it does not stop right away, thus inspiring unwholesome fears towards imaginary evils. And thus every day, and almost every hour, ignorant, ill tempered Betty pours her miserable lessons of deceit, falsehood, revenge, into that infant mind, and stamps her own grossly defective character upon that infant heart, and when the infant becomes a child of sight, ten, or twelve years, it carries about, engraved on its inmost soul, the lineaments of its ignorant and vicious nurse.

Mothers, if you wish to have sweet and lovely children, suffer no one to come between you and your infant if you can possibly help it. Hire help for anything and everything else, but take care of your infant yourself! How can you, how dare you, loving that infant as you do, suffer a hireling stranger, whose character may be radically vicious, and whose influence may pollute your infant's mind forever, to come and take your place, and impart her character instead of yours to your infant?

A strong and clear minded writer says he would not suffer a sour face to come into the nursery—lest it should make an unfavorable impression on his infant's mind. What would he have said to the plan of putting his infant daily and hourly in the hands and under the controlling influence of such woman as mothers are in the habit of hiring to take care of their babies? Let not these mothers imagine that infants are too young to learn. They learn more in the first six months of their existence than you can make them unlearn in as many years.

A Cheerful Heart.

There are some persons who spend their lives in this world as if they would spend their time if shut up in a dungeon. Everything is made gloomy and forbidding; they go mourning and complaining from day to day, that they have so little, and are constantly anxious lest what little they have should escape out of their hands. They look always upon the dark side, and can never enjoy the good that is present, for the evil that is to come. There is enough in this world to complain about, and find fault with, if men have the disposition. We often travel on a hard and uneven road, but with a cheerful spirit, and a heart to praise God for his mercies, we may walk therein with great comfort, and come to the end of our journey in peace.

THAT WILL DO.

"That will do," is a phrase of modern invention. The ancients knew of no such expressions, or the Egyptians would never have raised the pyramids, nor the Greeks and Romans displayed that love of the beautiful which led them to impart a grace even to the meanest utensils for the household use—as the remains of Pompeii fully testify.

"That will do," is the excuse of mediocrity unable to soar to better things. "That will do," is the self-deprecation given by the lazy painter, who glosses over the want of anatomical correctness by a showy coloring. "That will do," is the besetting sin of scholars who lay their short-comings to the want of a favorable site, or an Italian climate. "That will do," makes your slovenly and your slattern. A man who adopts this motto with regard to dress, does not mind being seen with a dirty shirt and a beard of two days' growth, while the same fatal saying allows a woman to go about the house with curl-papers and slipshod.

"That will do," applied to household matters, is equally bad, and more annoying to friends than when applied to dress. You may expect ill-cooked dinners in any house where the heads adopt this maxim, to say nothing of shabby carpets, faded paint, dirty muslin curtains, etc. "That will do," has conjured up a host of inefficient teachers, and a still larger proportion of imperfect scholars. "That will do," has sunk many a ship—caused the downfall of countless tottering tenements of human beings—destroyed at least half the fires that take place, and is at the bottom of most railway disasters.

"That will do," is the enemy to all excellence, and would sap the conscience of the most virtuous man alive if he hearkened to its dictates. The only persons to whom we recommend it are drunkards, gamblers, and spendthrifts, who may very properly exclaim, "That will do!" All should bear in mind that nothing will "do," but the very best in point of excellence.

Providence of God in Minute Events.

It is an erroneous view to think of God as governing the grand phenomena of nature, and leaving those which are minute to the operation of a set of laws which He does not uphold at every moment in all the fullness of their application. "We cannot," says Chalmers, "disjoin God from one particle of the universe of God." We may despise what is small, ah beneath the notice of our pride; but nothing is too microscopic for Him who, while He "measures the waters in the hollow of His hand, and metes out the heavens with a span, and comprehends the dust of earth in a measure, and weighs the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance," yet numbers the very hairs of our heads and knows of every sparrow that falls to the ground. The minuteness with which God provides for all wants is well brought in the LXVth Psalm, where David speaks of Him as attending to the very setting of the furrows of the field, and the watering of the ridges. "Thou makest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice; Thou visitest the earth and waterest it; Thou greatly enrichest it with the river of God, which is full of water; Thou preparest them corn, when Thou hast so provided them food; Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly; Thou settest the furrows thereof; Thou makest it soft with showers; Thou crownest the year with Thy goodness, and Thy paths drop fatness." [Prof. Balfour.

We See But in Part.

A traveler, as he passed through a large and thick wood, saw part of a huge oak which to him appeared misshapen—spoiling the scenery.

"If," said he, "I was owner of this forest I would cut down that tree."

But when he had ascended the hill, and taken a view of the forest, this same tree appeared the most beautiful part of the whole landscape.

"How erroneously," said he, "have I judged while I saw only a part!"

This plain tale illustrates the plans of God. We now see but in part: the full view, the harmony and proportion of things, are necessary to clear up our judgment. The time will come when we shall condemn, with deep humiliation, our own impertinence.

The Chinese and Liberty.

It seems that the present rebellion in China is, to some extent, a struggle for religious liberty and against idolatry. The expansive power of the Bible is beginning to be felt by those who have been under its instructions. We learn this from a letter from the Rev. J. J. Roberts, an American missionary. He also says:

"The chief leader of the Chinese rebellion is a man named Siew-Chaou, surnamed Hung, who some five or six years ago studied Christianity in Canton, and that, while in Canton, he applied himself to the memorizing of the Scriptures, and maintained a blameless deportment. He requested to be baptized, but left for Kwangsi before we were fully satisfied of his fitness. When he first came to us, he brought some pieces of [illegible] other essays, which he had written [illegible] ing the Christian religion, the [illegible] which he professed to have [illegible] a tract received at one of the [illegible] in Canton, and [illegible] had while sick; which, he said, [illegible] the disciples learned out of the [illegible] heaven believed in the true God, [illegible] to Canton expressly to be instructed, [illegible] learn the way of the Lord [illegible] from his own [illegible] that about one [illegible] numbered on the [illegible] is popular among the [illegible] with respect, generosity, and [illegible]

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, March 19.

Bishop Soule.—The steamship Philadelphia, whose news may be seen on another page, returned from Chagres on Tuesday. The Captain reports Bishop Soule in good health, and thus far standing the journey well. The Isthmus route was healthy and in fine traveling order.

Another Minister Fallen.—Since the Conference Sessions the death of Rev. Jeab Evans, a superannuate of Mississippi, has been reported to the Church. The obituary column of this week adds another worthy name, of Alabama, to the list of the dead. "And I heard a voice from heaven, saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead, which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

Death of Mrs. Jenkins.—The Rev. Mr. Jenkins, says the Christian Advocate and Journal, of the M. E. Church, South, with his children, arrived at this port from China on the 6th instant. This beloved Missionary brother, who left his field by the advice of physicians, to bring his wife to this country, as the only remaining hope for her life, was obliged after all, when seventy-five days out, to commit her remains to the Great Deep, until that day in which the "greedy Sea" shall restore the treasure resting in her. We are happy to record the mercy of the Lord in granting to our Brother, and his motherless sons, a return in excellent health.

B. M. Fowler, Esq.—The President of the Alabama Temperance Convention called on us, last week, and reports the work going on well. Central Committees of seven, for nearly all the counties of the State, have been appointed, and are keeping the subject of the "Alabama Law" before the people, so that the next Legislature may take action on it. The old friend looks, as usual, cheerful and hearty, and gives another proof that cold water and a warm heart go together.

The London Watchman has a long leader on Mr. Tyler's address or response to the Duchess of Sutherland, and other English women, who, having nothing better do, indicted some gratuitous advice to American ladies on the subject of slavery. We beg leave to correct the editor when he speaks of our fair countrywoman, the accomplished respondent, "as the widow of the late President." The late President Tyler is yet alive.

The world, looking on, can but be struck with the naiveté of this intervention of English and American ladies. When the English serfs and quasi slaves were dying of actual starvation a few years ago, the American ladies went about with subscriptions, got up fairs, etc., and sent over ship loads of bread, for sympathy. Now, the mawkish sensibilities of English ladies being excited by an abolition fiction, in behalf of our poor, they send over an address!

It sits rather hard upon our cousins across the Atlantic when Mrs. T., somewhat versed in courts and diplomacy, insinuates the true motive of this foreign intermeddling: that if Anglican sympathy must needs have a foreign outlet, and were the Stafford House Address sincere, it would have been preceded by one from the same quarter against Russian serfdom. "But, no!" she exclaims, "I withdraw the idea; that is a European affair, and concerns an Imperial Monarch and a powerful Aristocracy."

She pointedly hints that the ladies, dear things, had little to do in this business; that their "leads" were at the bottom of it; that the whole was a conspiracy of all political parties and persons, in England, against the domestic peace of America; and that the Lords, Commons, and newspaper editors, not daring to fire off the infernal machine themselves, handed the lighted match to their ladies, who exploded the Address.

The Watchman, our Methodist brother and English cousin, proposes the following; and understanding for ourselves which is the "quarter" whence the "scolding" comes, and where the "abundant material for retort" is to be found, we commend the conclusion:

"There are in this land many journals which affect to treat the matter on both sides as a laughing match between the women of the Old Country and of the New; who lift up their voices the more shrilly because they have to make them heard across the roar of the Atlantic. This representation is amusing, but it must be acknowledged that it is unjust; the affair was not begun in levity here, and it has assuredly been taken up very seriously there; and the scolding has come exclusively from one quarter. To this it is to be desired there may be no rejoinder, though the temptation be never so great; for our 'far-away cousins' are so sensitive, and the material for retort is so abundant, that the prudent and generous course, if any is to be done, is that of forbearance and conciliation."

THE METHODIST CLASS LEADER.

The Class is an articulate feature in Methodism, and the Class Leader is a "character." Among the benefits conferred by it upon the Church was the developing, in a style of active, simple, experimental piety, this character, and appointing the sphere in which he moves. Here, to a blessed end, the one talent and the five talents have found employment. Here has been seen and practiced, without strife, and to the edification of the body of Christ, lay-coöperation. The Class Leader is a sub-pastor; and so great is the number of these sub-pastors provided for by Discipline, and so closely and constantly do they stand connected with all its primary movements and essential machinery, that the piety as well as the polity of Methodism takes character, largely, from the Class Leaders.

A Class Leader can be great in his way; just as Chalmers or Olin, preachers, were great in their way. In English Methodism the Class is an important sphere for usefulness, and the great Class Leader ranks with other great men. Carvosso was only a Class leader. He was one sixty years. In his biography we discover no restlessness on his part, or his friends, for promotion to the rank of preacher. He shone there with full lustre. He filled up his measure. He got his great name (we call it great) as a simple Class Leader. It may be, and is so, that American Methodism would be better off in good Class Leaders, if many of those who can be good Class Leaders, could get their own and their friends' consent to remain in that calling. The Class Leadership is not necessarily a stepping-stone to exhorters' or preachers' license. The good and wise may begin and end a career of usefulness there.

In the Watchman, of the 16th ult., is a notice of the biography of "Father Reeves," a Wesleyan Class Leader, of Lambeth. He was no common man. Dr. Bunting was not superior in his way. His death, which occurred a few months ago, created a profound sensation throughout a large circle. His funeral drew together thousands, and the officiating minister communicates some interesting facts to the Watchman:

"The service was the more affecting from the circumstance that it was, in its order, according to his request, as left by him in writing. His body was laid near the pillar, under the clock, as he requested, that being the place where he was first convinced of his guilt and danger as a sinner before God. The third chapter of the Book of Revelation was read, and a pause was made, according to his desire, at the twentieth verse; that being the portion of the Divine Word by which he was brought to feel his sinfulness, and to see the readiness of Christ to save him. The whole scene, as connected with the religious service and the funeral, was most imposing; and, as viewed in association with the burial of a man in humble circumstances, it showed the power exerted on the minds of thousands by a course of consistent goodness and laborious service in the cause of Christ. He had been a Class Leader in the Wesleyan Society for more than thirty-four years; and at the time of his death had some one hundred and forty members in his Classes. Of late he had devoted himself wholly to the work of the Lord, the more wealthy of his Methodist friends assisting him in his pecuniary support: and, considering that he was a simple, plain, and uneducated man, he may be gratefully thought and spoken of as an illustrious proof of what Wesleyan Methodism, under God, can produce, in the form of successful instrumentality, from among even the humblest classes of its laity." "Honor to whom honor"—and honor was well bestowed there.

Our Church greatly needs good Class Leaders. Those who will bear the name of every member, and the case of every one in their heart; who will think, read and labor to be good Class Leaders. It surely requires judgment, and discernment, and insight, and godly sympathy, not only to inquire, but to find out from members, how their souls prosper; to draw out the confused, and encourage the diffident, by suitable remarks; to assist those, not used to acts of introversion, in the difficult work of self-examination; to hold the lamp of the Word over the lurking places of secret sins; to direct inquiry, and to help those desponding souls who may have become entangled in the wrathful places of God's Word.

The Leader should study before meeting his Class, and as the preacher before going into his pulpit. Indeed, a graceless soul would prefer delivering a sermon to leading a Class. We once saw in a Leader's book a set of queries he had written out in special reference to meeting his Class: they were well calculated to traverse the whole soul, and bring up its deep things. They were dictated by a heart conversant with the deep things of God. Something more is needed, if we would make Class Meetings lively and profitable, than mere generalities. There must be adaptation, and point, and purpose, so each shall learn something of himself, and something from others.

Among the many projects for improving Preachers, we see none for improving Class Leaders. Mr. Wesley advised that the Leaders of Classes should be examined occasionally concerning their method of meeting a Class, and that they should often meet each others Classes. If, of all that has been written about keeping up and modifying the Class Meeting System, something had been put forth "on the best method of Leading a Class," or, "Instructions how to become a good Class Leader," more good would have been done, and this highly efficient part of our economy been in a healthier state.

A TRIP TO ATTAKAPAS.

NUMBER I.

I had heard much of that portion of Louisiana known as the Attakapas country, and felt a strong desire to visit it; and at the close of the late Conference, at Baton Rouge, I resolved to make a flying visit to that section of country. Accordingly, after spending a few days in the Crescent City, on the — day of January, in company with Rev. J. C. Keener, I took my departure for Attakapas, on board the good steamer Red River. We had a pleasant company of passengers, and the officers of the boat were polite and attentive. It was late in the afternoon when we started, and the next morning we left the Mississippi by way Bayou Plaquemine, which takes its departure from the Great River in no very peaceful mood. The current is very rapid, and so continues for some nine or ten miles, where its ill temper seems to have abated, and its flow becomes comparatively gentle. I am told that during the low water of summer, the bottom of the stream is bare, and a whole forest of cypress stumps present themselves to view—indicating pretty distinctly the earlier history of this singular stream.

After running some distance down the Bayou our captain changed his course, and turned into Grand River. This change of route was induced by information that an impassable raft, of some considerable extent, rendered our progress, in the usual direction, impossible. But, although we had changed our route, we soon found that we had not entirely cut our acquaintance with rafts: we had not proceeded many miles before we encountered a raft of perhaps a mile in extent;—there it was, a vast collection of logs, and every other abomination, in the form of chunks, old boats, brush, dead carcasses, etc.; the stream seemed to be totally bridged over, and the prospect of getting safely through was certainly very unpromising, and attended with considerable hazard to the machinery of the boat. Slowly, but steadily, we urged our way through this dense mass of floating timber. One would suppose that the passage of the steamer through, putting the whole mass in motion, would send a large portion of the timbers down stream: so I expected, but such was not the result; for I noticed that the path in the wake of the boat seemed to be promptly closing up, the loosened timbers resuming their places.

Another mile or two further brought us to another raft of smaller extent and much more manageable. From Grand River we passed successively through Whiskey and Chicot Lakes into Grand Lake, an extensive and pretty sheet of water—a respectable little inland sea; but so shallow that steamboats frequently find the navigation rather difficult. From this Lake, I think, we entered the Atchafalaya River; and late in the afternoon landed in the town of Pattersonville, and lodged with Brother Richardson, who accompanied us from the city. Of this place we shall speak more fully hereafter.

The next morning, Sabbath, was rather a cool morning for this country, and it would have been more pleasant to rest, but as I expected there was an appointment for me to preach at Franklin, some twenty miles distant, we took the road early and reached Franklin in time, but found we had arrived veary nearly as soon as the notice of the appointment. We had, however, a tolerable congregation,—to whom I endeavored to preach in the morning. Brother K. preached in the afternoon, and I again at night. As I wished to visit Iberia, some thirty miles above, I left an appointment for Wednesday night, and left next morning, in company with Col. Richardson, for Iberia. We had a very cold ride; the wind blew very keenly, and as a good deal of our route lay through the prairie, we had the full benefit of it. We passed through a pretty country, thickly dotted with sugar plantations. Col. R. was originally from South Carolina, but has been a long time resident in Louisiana, and is quite a chronicle of the local history of this country for the last twenty years, or more; and, as he was quite communicative, I had a very pleasant ride of it, and felt, at the conclusion of the day, that I had materially increased my stock of Louisiana history. Towards evening we crossed the Teche, a romantic looking little stream, about 200 feet wide, and deep enough to float a large steamship, and lodged at the house of F. Richardson, Esq., the Colonel's son, who owns a beautiful place, a comfortable mansion, and a fine body of land, extending from the Teche back to Grand Lake. Mr. R. is a Methodist, and seems to be a warm-hearted, hospitable gentleman: but, alas, for all worldly possessions, he has only a few months since buried an excellent and greatly beloved wife, and his home is sad and solitary! He sorrows not, however, as those who have no hope; for she left this world in the joyful hope of a brighter, better home above. Oh, earth! what would thou be to man but for the hope which the Gospel of Jesus gives of re-union and glory in the better land?

The next morning a ride of ten miles brought us to New Iberia,—which may be regarded as the head of steamboat navigation. It is a small town, with a population of probably some four or five hundred, with a Catholic and a Methodist Church. The Episcopalians have service here, also, occupying the Methodist Church. Although the notice was short, yet we had a very good congregation, to whom I ministered, as I was able, the truth of God. Oh! that some good may come of it.

We dined at the house of the Rev. Mr. Sawyer, a Baptist minister, who resides here, but I think does not preach in consequence of feeble health. He treated us kindly: God bless him and his family!

We returned that evening to Brother Richardsons, and left next morning for Franklin. That night, according to appointment, I preached at Franklin. A ball, in the neighborhood, rather diminished my congregation; however, we had a pretty fair showing. I lodged at the house of Brother Gordy, who treated us kindly: God bless him and his household!

Franklin is the largest town in this part of Louisiana. I should guess the population was a thousand or more. The place has quite an air of business. The Methodists have a house of worship; so have the Episcopalians: and the Baptists have a house at present deserted; and as a matter of course, for all the towns in this country, the Roman Catholics have a large chapel and a priest. The town stands directly on the Bayou Teche, and enjoys of course all the advantages of navigation, and is in a state of improvement. The next morning we left to fill my appointment at Pattersonville, at eleven o'clock: after driving very rapidly we reached the Church just in time, and I went directly into the pulpit and commenced the service. We had a good congregation, who listened attentively to the message which, in the name of my Master, I endeavored to deliver to them. I hope the labor was not in vain in the Lord; and now having got thus far on my way back to the city, we will wait till another time for something further.

SHORT SERMON TO A LUKE-WARM CHURCH.

Revelations iii: 15-21.

There is a certain anomalous state into which friends and relatives sometimes get which is exceedingly disagreeable. The terms of friendship between them were once defined and understood, and a warm current of affection flowed in the appointed channels. But now this has ceased to be: some obstruction has got in the way, and the intercourse creeps feebly and uncertainly. Why is this? Has any actual offence been committed toward the alienated party? None: for if there were, then we might apologize and ask pardon. But the conduct of our friend is strange and unaccountable: we know not how to treat him. To use terms of distant respect would be inconsistent with previous relations; to use hearty familiarity would be incompatible with present ones. This is what is termed the luke-warm state; and we say to ourselves—would that our friend were either hot or cold, that we might know to treat him; but since he is luke-warm we feel like spewing him out of our mouths like warm water or cold coffee. This feeling is aggravated by reflecting upon the relations that have previously existed. The love we have shown him, our unwearied kindness, his refusal to tell us what is the matter, all cause his indifference to burn like fire. We conclude that he has got above us; he needs us no longer: therefore, we determine to reject him and cut his acquaintance.

If such be our natural sentiment toward a luke-warm friend, what must be that of the Saviour to a luke-warm Church? He bears a relation to His people which is closer and dearer than one human can bear to another in this life; for he has laid down His life for His sheep. He has not spared His own glory which He had with the Father, nor His own life which He assumed upon earth, nor His continued intercession since He ascended to Glory, for the sake of His people. What is more, He has had a special providence over each individual in that Church to bring him to a knowledge of the truth. His forbearance, His mercy, His grace, were long extended to you before your blind heart would acknowledge and receive them. When you did awake to a knowledge of your lost condition, how kind were the words He addressed you in seeking to induce you to believe and trust in Himself. "Come unto me, ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

And, O! my friend, can you ever forget that hour when Jesus said: "Peace, thy sins which are many are all forgiven thee: go and sin more"?

"You could not believe, that you e'er should grieve,
That you e'er should suffer again!"

But, still, since that time you have had both grief and suffering, perhaps, and that frequently, too, on account of your new sins; but has Jesus ever turned you away empty in such an hour? Have you ever asked His aid in vain? No, "His blood cleanseth from all sin." Your afflictions have been many, but He has delivered you out of them all. But where do you stand at this time? Luke-warm, neither hot nor cold.

What a strange anomaly is a luke-warm Church! They believe that Christ died for them, but they love Him not; they believe that the Bible contains His holy commandments, but they obey them not, they read them not; they profess to believe in the efficacy of prayer, and the influence of the Spirit, but seek them not. The ministry of the Word ceases to be esteemed for its life and power, but only as it displays learning or eloquence. The house of God is thinly attended, and the tokens of devotion in the congregation are few. "Yea, the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O! Lord of hosts, my King and my God!". Family prayers are dropped or neglected, or at best, but cold and lifeless. Private devotions are left for preachers and old women.

On the other hand worldly business and pleasure prospers, and the love of it increases. The musical sound of the dollar is oft heard ringing in the conversation of professors, and giving forth an ungodly twang. The question is not, how is your soul my brother? but, how is your crop? It would offend the brother to ask after his soul: he is fast forgetting that he has one. Hours of lively conversation pass, but not a word is said of religion. The nearest approach is to discuss the talents of rival ministers. The Bible ceases to be read: not so the Union and Republic. The Cuban and Slavery questions are well understood; but who can tell me about the chief concern? Money is freely expended for the world: high prices are paid for land and negroes; dress becomes gay and fashionable, but the widow's mite constitutes the portion of the Sanctuary.

The first point directed to the attention of the Church at Laodicea, was the contrast between their temporal and spiritual condition. That Church had forgotten the true standard of piety, and was trying to estimate the favor of God toward them by their worldly prosperity. "Because thou sayest I am rich, and increased in goods, and have need of nothing." Here is their test. O! if they had referred to their Bibles, and read from the experience of David, how the wicked were rich in his day, and of great power, spreading like the green bay tree, their eyes standing out with fatness, calling their possessions after their own names; and then how man, being in power, abideth not, but is like the beasts that perish; how unable they were, with all their wealth, to purchase the redemption of the soul; how when dying they can carry nothing with them, and their glory descendeth not after them, surely they would have learned not to trust in uncertain riches, nor to set their hearts upon them, however much they might increase. Or had they opened the New Testament, and read there of the difficulty of rich men being saved; of the young man that turned his back upon eternal life because he had great possessions; of the foolish rich man who said to his soul, "Soul take thine ease, for thou hast much goods laid up in store for many years;" but God said unto him, "Thou fool, this night shall thy soul be required of thee," or of Dives, who was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day, but afterwards lifted up his eyes in hell; or even of poor Lazarus, who lay at the rich man's gate, but was afterwards borne by angels to Abraham's bosom: perhaps these things, and the oft-repeated declaration of our Saviour, that a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of his goods, might have shown them the weakness of any argument drawn from mere worldly prosperity to prove the condition of the soul before God. But so it was: the god of this world had blinded their eyes. Having begun in the Spirit, they were concluding in the flesh. They were looking at the seen and temporal, instead of the invisible and Eternal.

Having shown this Church the fallacy of their hopes, the Saviour reveals to them their true condition: "For God looketh not at the appearance, but at the heart." He says: "Thou knowest not that thou art wretched and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." See the folly of trusting to any thing less than inward knowledge of God's grace upon the heart. "Thou knowest not:" but they might have known. If they had consulted their own hearts they would have known; but, alas, they had all the while been looking after the world! Now, however, the veil is torn from their eyes; and what a contrast is exposed between their real and apparent condition! How mortifying it must have been to show their actual poverty and bankruptcy in the face of their assumed wealth! Would that some of the wealthy and pampered churches of our day might come so truly to a knowledge of themselves.

After the Saviour has shown the wretchedness of this Church He gives them counsel; for He does not show them their danger to leave them in it, but rebukes and chastens because He loves them. First, He gives His advice, "I counsel thee." Who knows so well the nature of our wants as our Saviour? And who is so wise, or so able, to relieve them? "I counsel thee to buy of me." We are to buy of Him—a precious privilege: for when we buy of Him it costs us nothing:—without money and without price; free as grace and love can make it. But, what are we to buy? "Gold tried in the fire." The rich ore of religion which God rained down from heaven into our hearts, instead of that corrupting dust dug from the bowels of the earth. This wealth is real and enduring. It has been tried in the fire. In the hot furnace of affliction and persecution it has warmed and glowed with unearthly lustre, and has shown no impurity. The soul that possesses it is rich above all price. He is rich in his own bosom, rich toward God, and though outwardly poor, he feels that he would not exchange the pearl of great price for all the world. He is also rich in expectation; an heir of God and joint-heir with Jesus Christ; he has treasure in heaven, where moths and rust do not corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal. In addition to wealth, he expects honor—a crown of life incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away—reserved in heaven for him, which God the righteous Judge will him.

The Saviour also counsels us to buy of Him "white raiment, that thou mayst be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear." Our religious attire frequently becomes soiled by contact with the world, or rent by the ill-resisted attacks of the enemy. The world laughs at us, and calls us threadbare Christians. Sometimes, when we have been washed, we go and wallow again in the mire; or, perhaps, we throw away every part of the Christian habiliment, except an old cloak, which we wrap around us on the Sabbath to go to church in. If such be the case we had better "give away our cloak, also." But let us ask of the Saviour, and He will give us pure, white raiment.

When John saw the hundred and forty and four thousand in heaven, he was told, "These are they which have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Here we may be cleansed from all sinful stains—here we may be clothed for heaven.

We are also counseled to "anoint our eyes with eye-salve, that we may see." The luke-warm Christian "is blind, and cannot see afar off, having forgotten that he was purged from his old sins." He loses those keen perceptions of truth and error which he had at the beginning. Do not be surprised to hear him trying to prove that black is white, or at least that he is a very good Christian, yet, though long since he has ceased to say his prayers, or attend to devotion. He needs light. But let him turn his sightless orbs to Him who formed the eye, and He will doubtless restore to him the gift of seeing.

The chapter concludes with exceeding great and precious promises. Jesus represents himself as still loving, though rebuking and chastening. He stands knocking at the door, waiting to see if we will let Him in. But He has long knocked there without success. Oft have we heard His gentle voice raised above the storm of adversity, urging us to admit Him, and promising peace in the midst. More than once have we started to open the door, when some unholy influence has drawn us back, and the Saviour has departed. "We treat no other friend so ill." O! that we might now obey the first impulse of our hearts, and make haste to admit our Saviour to that home from which He has so long been absent, and which has suffered so much, and been so defiled for want of His gracious presence.

Now, when He comes, He doubtless finds the place which He had swept and garnished filled with the unholy and unclean. Now, perhaps, it will be necessary that He should make a whip, of small cords, and drive the intruders from His temple! But, when this is done, He enters and brings peace: The board is spread; He sups with us and we with Him! The good cheer flows around; He entertains us with agreeable conversation. His presence consoles and comforts us. He shows us the Father, and they are both persuaded to take up their abode with us. (John xiv. 23.) Then, like the two going to Emmaus, our hearts burn within us while He talks with us by the way. Finally, He tells us of a mansion in the skies, and consoles us with this promise:

"To him that overcometh, I will grant to sit with Me in My Throne, even as I overcame, and am set down with my Father."

God's Mercy.

The mercy of God is a fountain to all. It branches out into many streams; there is a fullness in it to meet all our wants; there is mercy to pardon our sins, mercy to subdue our iniquities, to heal our back-slidings, to bear with our infirmities, to restore us to dignity, to meet us at the grave, to support and comfort us while passing through the dark valley, and conduct us safe into the presence of God, where the effects of that mercy will terminate "in fullness of joy forever." Twenty-six times, in one Psalm, David celebrates this truth, "that God's mercy endureth forever."

An Orphan's Funeral.—Our brother editor, of the St. Louis Christian Advocate, really shows, in one of the recent numbers, a vein of poetry:

"We have just returned from an orphan's funeral. All funerals are solemn; but in the funeral of a motherless child there seems to be something peculiarly so. No mother was there to soothe her last farewell:

'Her mother! O! 'tis long ago
Since she could call her so;
She had no mother: No!
She'd fled from this sad world of woe.'

No mother's hand pressed her fevered brow. No mother's hand moistened her parched lips. No mother's words fell upon her leaden ear. But, though

'By stranger's hand her dying eyes were closed,'

she died in Jesus, and now

'Unseen by eyes, and sweetly sleeps,
Low in the ground!'"

Beautiful Expression.—In a well written article entitled "Reminiscences of Washington Allston," published in the Boston Christian World, occurs the following touching paragraph:

"I once," says the writer, "asked him why, among the many Christian subjects he selected for the canvass, he had taken no part of the life of Christ for his theme?" "I have not done so," he replied, "because of my conviction concerning the nature, the mission, and character of the Saviour: these exalt Him so far beyond such an apprehension of Him, as could enable me to communicate any idea of Him, I may strive to reach, that I should fail if I attempt it. I could not make Him a study of art."

THE INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT LAW.

We understand that all the preliminaries have been settled towards establishing between this country and Great Britain an International Copyright Law. We are not sufficiently posted up as to the terms and conditions of the treaty, to express any opinions in advance, of the policy or propriety of the measure—but we have some opinions of our own as to the justice of securing to the workmen of the brain the legitimate fruits of their labors, which we wish very briefly to express.

It has been too much the fashion, even in an age so distinguished as ours, to regard the labors of authors and thinkers, as fair game for literary piracy. We confess that we are no more able to perceive the right of a party to appropriate to himself the benefits resulting from the talents, the industry, or the attainments of others, than from the fair and legitimate profits of his business in any other department of industry. We think that those efforts of the mind which give impress and character to our age, are quite as well entitled to protection as the mechanical inventions which promote our physical well-being.

In the infancy of our country there might, possibly, have been some reason for this refusal of protection to foreign authors; but now, when American genius, "in each art and every muse," sustains an honorable and successful competition with the mind of any other country, when our intellectual, social, and political position is recognized by all the world, and when the most skeptical cannot fail to anticipate our superiority in all that dignifies and ennobles our common humanity, we submit that any indisposition to protect the authors of other countries, which offer the same protection to us, is a want of fair play, unworthy of, and inconsistent with, the manliness of our national character. We can well afford to compete on equal terms with all the world, whether the object of competition be arts or arms, literature or science, political sagacity or social philosophy; and we think that it would be honorable and generous to take the initiative in a measure which sooner or later the common sense of all nations will approve.

For these reasons, we conceive that if the proposition for an international copy be fair and equitable, it is for our interest to adopt it. We may at first be a little behind our European contemporaries, because mere literature and theoretic science have not hitherto enjoyed the attention of a people whose energies are for the most part employed in active, energetic, practical exertion. But we entertain no shadow of doubt, that in less than a quarter of a century the nation which, according to Bishop Berkley, is destined to "close the drama with the day," will of all others be the most interested in advocating and sustaining international copyright.

Semi-Centennial Celebration of the First Introduction of Methodism in Cincinnati.—According to notice publicly given, a numerous audience assembled on the 6th inst., in Wesley Chapel, Cincinnati, duly to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the regular establishment of an organized "class" of the Methodist Church in that city. The meeting was opened with religious exercises conducted by the Rev. J. B. Finley, a venerable pioneer Methodist preacher.

Mr. John Reeves was chosen to preside over the meeting, Benjamin Stewart as Vice President, and the Rev. Wm. P. Strickland, of Union Chapel in that city, as Secretary.

Affecting Incident—A Master's Life Saved by his Slave.—On Sunday last, Mr. O. McCann, while crossing the Mississippi river alone in a canoe, from Battle Island to his plantations, whither he had been on a visit to his friend and neighbor on the Island, Ben. Hardin, Esq., was upset in the middle of the river. He clung to the canoe until he had floated opposite to the wood yard on his farm, when his cries attracted the attention of one of his negro men, the boy immediately put off in a skiff to the rescue of his master. Before the negro arrived, Mr. McCann had become exhausted, and sunk. The faithful negro succeeded, however, at the imminent peril of his own life, in reaching his master, which he did by seizing him by the hair, and took him into the skiff. Mr. McCann was in an insensible state, and life was nearly extinct. By the assiduous attentions of the servant, and the application of such restoratives as were at hand, he was brought to consciousness. On Wednesday, when the John Simonds passed his plantation, he was slowly recovering. This is another fact to illustrate the truth of history, touching the social and moral condition of the master and the slave. [St. Louis Republican.

METHODIST PRESS.

California Conference.—We have the Observer to the 9th ult., and the C. C. Advocate to the 17th. The Conference of the Church, North, begun on the 3d, and adjourned on the 8th February. Bishop Ames presided to great satisfaction. Good feeling prevailed, and much business was done. Dr. Boring, editor of the Observer, says:

"The Anniversary of the Conference Missionary Society was held on Monday evening, when a large and deeply interested audience was addressed by the Rev. M. C. Briggs and Bishop Ames, on the subject of Missions. The addresses were exceeding good, being both intellectual and deeply imbued with the spirit of Christ. We were deeply interested, and greatly pleased with the exercises of the occasion, (we were present) and cannot refrain so beautiful an exemplification of the catholicity of the religion of Christ to pass unobserved and unremarked. As might have been expected from the feelings which predominated, a fine collection was made—amounting to $1,000, besides pledges, which at the moment of adjournment had not been redeemed, and will probably materially augment the sum. This is doing things after Californin style.

"The adjournment of the Conference was an occasion of much interest, and one which we shall not soon forget. Bishop Ames, in his own peculiarly simple, yet beautiful and impressive style, delivered one among the best addresses, of the kind, to which it has been our happiness to listen; and we hesitate not to say that his brethren will to go their fields of labor under a high and pleasing sense of his great worth as a leader of that wing of Israel's hosts."

The Advocate, speaking of the same interesting occasion, says:

"Four of the ministers of the M. E. Church, South, who were present, sent twenty dollars to constitute the Bishop's daughter a life member. Soon his son was made a life member, and the compliment of the ministers of the Church, South, was returned with interest, in making Bishop Evans, Bishop Soule, Dr. Boring, etc., life members. A proposition was made to substitute Dr. Durbin Corresponding Secretary of the Parent Society, a life member by dollar contributions, that more might share, as sincere testimony of honor to our noble secretary."

His spirit being up—a good spirit—the editor goes on:

"California will raise all that is necessary to supply her home-work; and, shall I say it, she will give a thousand dollars more for China or Africa, as the Board at home may require. We propose that it go to China, and will be one of fifty to give one thousand dollars, above our regular missionary contribution, to the Chinese work. Who takes stock in that?"

Thirty-three preachers constituted the Conference. Admitted on trial three; re-admitted two; admitted into full connection one; remaining on trial four.

The Book Committee, in the report, gives these items:

"As to books, we present for your consideration an exhibit of the present condition of our Depository, as perhaps the best index to the circulation of our books:

Amount of stock on hand	$4,636
Due the concern	2,176
Total assets	$7,013
Liabilities of the concern	5,579
Balance in favor of the concern	$1,434

The California Christian Advocate circulates 1500 copies."

The next Conference to be held at Sacramento. The following is the membership and increase:

Members		17
Probationers		11

A Love of a Book.—The Richmond Christian Advocate tells us the editor is not well enough to be at his post, which is readily seen by the absence of his racy editorials. A correspondent furnishes an appreciative critique on "A Peep at Number 5." This is a sister volume to "Sunny Side"—sweet little things, both. The authoress, who was a daughter of late Professor Stuart, of Andover, has followed the pious Mr. Edwards, and Mrs. Edwards, to the better land. She must have been a minister's wife: none else could so describe the inside of a parsonage, and sympathize with the heart of its inmates. It will do much towards bringing about a good understanding between the pastor and the people. If circulated it will more than pay its way. It is kept on sale by Dr. Early, at the Book Concern.

An Easy Method for Singing.—A correspondent of the North-Western Christian Advocate brings to light an easy and quick method for learning to sing by note. It is on the straight shoot principle, and is being taught successfully by Professor Beal, of Boston. If he ever comes this way, we shall give him a trial:

"The music is written by figures, as above, and below, one line. Otherwise the old notation is retained.

"As soon as one learns that 1 is do, 2 re, 3 me, 4 fa, 5 sol, 6 la, 7 se, and 8 do, he can read quickly and easily all music. A mixed assemblage here learned in ten minutes to read the notes sufficiently for singing—a thing unheard of in the old system, and will be forever impossible. When the new every one, who tries, will learn to sing in one term; which, heretofore, not one in ten, who tried till discouraged, ever learned to sing by note. Here is disclosed the way for our people to realise the long-wished consummation—'let all sing,' and 'sing with the spirit and the understanding also.' The great advantage of the new is, that a person may be sung, or played, in any key with equal ease."

The friends of sacred music ought to

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

to this matter. The Christian Advocate and Journal says of it:

"Among the thousands of inventions and discoveries in modern times, we have seen none more frangbt with good to the world if it should really be what it clalms to be. We do not except the applicatlon of steam to the purposes of navigation, nor the electric telegraph. These contribute to indlvidual and national weath, and to the still more important purpose of facilitating national intercourse, and the diffusion of knowledge; but this new invention will go far to the removal of an evil which has greatly lessened the spirituality of public worship, and tendod to the spread of formality and deadness in our religious assemblies.

"If singing be a part of public worship, ie is not a simple absurdity to do it by proxy—to transfer a portion of the worship of Almighty God to a oboir in the gallery, whether composed of volunteers or hirelings, whose scientific music is so much above the ordinary requirement of the congregation, that the worshippers know ne more of it than they would of the prayers if they were said in an unknown tongne? In fact it is a serious embarrassment to the choir for the congregation to join in their complox scientiflo harmony,—and benoe they ondsavor to defeat it by assigning the 'air' to the females, while the male leader takes anothor part, which the congregation cannot follow. Thus, in Church music, melody has been almost entirely sacrificed to the harmony of we do not know how many "parts;" but parts which, to an uneducated ear are so many. Different tunes sung at the samo time, nocomprised by musical instruments, making altogether 'confusion worse confounded.'

"Under snoh circumstances singing, is really no part of congregational worship; and the minister, instead of saying 'let us commence the worship of God by singing the hymn on,' etc., ought to say 'let us postpone or suspend,' as tbe ease may be, 'the worship of God, until we have a tune from the choir.'".

Efforts to improve singing should not be discouraged, neitber should they be confined to a choir or a select few. Let those be as scientific as they can, but tbey mnst keop in the neighborhood of tbo "many." Let them lead but only where they can be followed. In taking the hymn from the people, they take the bread of life out of their months. Of the doctrinal bearings of this subject, the Advocate and Journal thus weightily discourses:

"How, then, has it happened the history of the Church records no other instance of the uniformity of belief, such as obtains among the Methodists in all parts of the world where they are known? There have been many secessions from the body, but even these are not exceptions to this remark. We have been divided on questione of Church government and polity, but seldom, if ever, on points of doctrine. But how is this? How is it to be accounted for? Especially as the Methodists admit, without question, persone of all shades of belief on the 'Five Points;' how is it that all come to agree in doctrine, ultimately, whatever their previous differences may have been? We believe the principal cause in prodncing this effect is our Hymn Book!

"Charles Wesley was decidedly the best evangelical poet which God has ever given to the Christian Church. He embodied in hymns all the life-giving doctrines of our holy religion; and every one who enters our communion will in a short time have sung those sacred truths so often that he will have committed them to memory, and what is not (as is generally supposed) the same thing, will have 'got them by heart,' and have a sound body of divinity, doctrinal, practical, and devotional, which the most learned theologian might envy.

"Yet it is this great instrumentality of religious orthodoxy and uniformity which we are suffering to gradually lose its efficienoy, by passing into an unknown tongue, or sound without sense, under the direction of choirs, who would consider it very 'unscientific' to enunciate the words of the hymn so distinctly as to be followed by the rest of the congregation. And though the hymn be announced, and we have our Hymn Books, as we cannot participate in the singing, the hymn is little attended to, so as to be even committed to memory, much less 'got by heart.' Our social meetings have in part saved us from the effects of this departure from primitive Methodist usage. Bnt scientifio singing, with all its complexity of parts and accompaniments, may invade those too—and then! Well, what then!"

The Great Hazard.—We thank the editor of the Helston Advocate for his friendly editorial on this "Advocate," which he endorses as "a good paper and ably edited." [Our hat is off.] But he discovers a "great hazard" that we bog to bring before its agents and readers, in his own words, in order that by their diligence in getting new subscribers, and renewing the old ones, always in advance, no damage may come to us or tba Church by publishing at so low a price. Friends of low pricoe and a large circulation, the New Orleans Christian Advocate hazarde everything upon that principle. If you approve the prinoiple, "shew it, show it!" Our Holston cotemporary thus remarks:

"But it must bo remembered that the price of the paper is ouly $1 50 por annum, in advance. Whetber the paper is continued to those who fail to pay the advance price for a second year, in dus time, we ars not apprised. If it is, there is great hazard in publishing at that price. We wish that paper a long and successful career, and with special reference to that monster of iniquity, Romanism, now laboring so hard to plant her standard in the Southwest."

Literary Intelligence.—"Revolntionary Correspondence," in three volumes, by Jared Sparks, is about being brought on.... Mr. Irving has occupied himself with research in the public offices in Washington for his "Personal Memoirs of the Father of his Country."..... Fiotchor W ebster is occupied with "Recollections of the Private Life and Conversations" of his Illustrious father. The task of editing the "Memoirs and Correspondence of Mr. Webster," is for the most part confided to Mr. Geo. Tick. nor.... The third follo volume of Dr. Schoolcraft's great work on the American Indians is in press.

Large Deposit.—A London letter says that the gold which lately arrived by the Australian steamar was contained in about four hundred packages, and weighed nearly ton tons; it was safely deposited in the bank last Saturday, amidst the cheers of tha populace. It was the most valuable deposit that ever entered the Bank of England at one time.

OBITUARY:

Died—At the residence of Rev. T. Kingsberry, on tbo 20th instant, REV. ROBERT LAWRENCE, in the sixty-second year of his age.

Mr. Lawrence was a native of Somersetshire, England. About two years ago he emigrated to this country—to which most of his family had come before him. In his native land he had the confidence of a large circle of friends, and was generally esteemed for his sterling integrity as a citizen, and unaffected piety as a Christian. Being a man of unobtrusive manner, and great modesty, he was but little known among us; yet there were a few who esteemed him highly, for they knew him to be "a good man, full of the Holy Ghost, and of faith."

He bore his protracted illness with fortitude and resignation: no impatient word, nor murmur against Providence, escaped his lips. He acquiesced fully in the will of God, and could say at all times, "Thy will be done." His end was eminently peaceful and happy; although there was no ecstasy, there was such an absence of fear, and such an unbounded confidence in the goodness, power, and faithfulness of God, as kept the soul in perfect peace, and illustrated the power of the Gospel as seldom witnessed. Such were the last moments of this meek disciple of Christ, who for nearly forty years was a local preacher in the Methodist Church.

Although, as a preacher, he was a man of moderate abilities, yet from his manifest sincerity, humility and zeal, he was heard by the common people gladly, and by the learned with respect. May his Godly example be imitated by all who knew him.

Died—In Pickensville, Alabama, January 26, 1853, JOHN W. HENLEY, aged three years, three months, and thirteen days.

Another dear little ono has been added to the vast multitude that now compose the family above.

John was more than ordinarily interesting and promising; but the Master called, and medical skill, parental solicitude, and the prayers and tears of the pious, could not detain him. We submit to Him who hath said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." W. M.

Departed this life at the residence of Rev. James Thompson, near Camden, Alabama, on the 5th instant, forty-five minutes after ten o'clock, P. M., Rev. WESLEY RUFUS ROUNSAVALL, a member of the Alabama Conference.

He was born in Green county, Mississippi, September, 24, 1824. Being early instructed in the plan of salvation, he joined the M. E. Church when but a boy, but did not profess conversion until his eighteenth year. From that time he was an exemplary member of the Church, and when about twenty years of age he was licensed to preach. He joined the itinerancy in February, 1846, being in his twenty-second year. He traveled two years on the Chickasawha Circuit, two years on Randolph Circuit, one on Pascagoula, and one on Mount Pleasant Circuit. His health failed at the close of his sixth year, and he received a superannuated relation to the Conference, and remained some eighteen months, declining all the time with consumption, patiently waiting the Master's call.

I was acquainted with Brother R. from his cradle to his death. He was amiahlo in his disposition, deeply pious, and one of the most laborious ministers I have ever known. He traveled two years in the bounds of the Districts I was on, and a more faithful man I have never seen. He was of moderate, but respectable abilities as a preacher.

Some three days before he died I called to see him; found him sinking fast. He said, "All was well!" and joined heartily in prayor with us, although not able to rise from his bed. The day of his death I found him the same; and at night called again to watch with him. During the night, some minutes before he expired, I inquired if he felt much pain: he said, "None." Then, said I, "Do you feel the Lord present with you?" With a smile he replied, "Yes!" and this was the last word he spoke.

So lived the Rev. Wesley Rufus Ronnsavall, and died in his 29th year, leaving a wife and little son, with other relatives, and friends, and the Church, to mourn his loss.

Doctors.—At the annual commencement of the New York Medical University, held on the 9th inst., the degree of M. D. was conferred upon one hundred and one medical students.

Honorary degrees were conferred upon Dr. Cooper, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Scudder, Missionary of the American Board of Commissioners in India, and forty of the graduates were rewarded with honorary certificates for punotual attendance at lectures, and diligence in the pursuit of their studies.

At the annual commencement of the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, the degree of Doctor of Medicine was conferred upon the large number of 223 graduates.

Emancipation of a Slave.—The New York Journal of Commerce states that the surplus of the Lemmon indemnity fund has been applied, through the agency of Mrs. Col. Waver and her husband, of Waverton, Md., to the purchase of James Dent, a slavo in Virginia. Mr. and Mrs. Waver have interested themselves much in behalf of Jim, whose children they had freed many years since, and sent to Liberia. Jim will sail for Liberia in May to join his children, who have been separated from him for many years.

The above sales show an increase in the price of real estate over the sales of last year of twenty-eight per cent. What better evidence of the prosperity of our city, and the advantages derived by its consolidation, could be desired than the result of this sale? We answer, none.

Youth and Common Schools of Ohio.—An educational report of the Secretary of State of Ohio, gives some interesting facts. The whole number of youth in the State is 838,669. The entire number of pupils enrolled, male and female, is 437,412. The average daily attendance during the year has been but 266,267. These figures certainly are not very creditable to the State, even though every allowance be made for attendance upon private schools. Nearly four hundred thousand children entitled to attend these schools but do not. The enrolled number of boys exceed that of girls by more than forty thousand. There are 9,916 schools with 10,564 teachers in the State, to the latter of whom $771,145 are paid as wages. 171 school houses have been built during the year at a cost of $61,837.

The statistics are given of forty-five Union Schools in towns varying in population from 625 inhabitants to 160,000, and which vary from $270 to $1,000 each for teachers. Most of these schools are free to the children of residents, but with an annual tuition fee of from $7 to $15 for non-residents. The expenses are met by a special school tax of from one to four mills. Ten of them possess district libraries, varying in value from 12½ cents to $600.

There are thirty-one Teachers' Institutes in the State, with 2,824 teachers under instruction.

Hip! Hip! Hurrah!—We are happy in being able to announce to our multitude of readers, that on Wednesday last the sound of the cannon proclaimed the actual commencement of the work on the Grand Gulf and Port Gibson Railroad. The excavation commenced with the first spadefull of earth that morning, and the whole enterprise is now fairly underway. Mr. Orump, the contractor, is on the ground with a large force, and is employing his experience and energies in managing all the minutiæ of the work.

We learn, also, that on Wednesday powdar was burned at Grand Gulf, in honor of the actual commencement of the labor on the road. [Port Gibson (Miss.) Herald, 12th instant.

The Missing Found.—Honora Cochran, the Irish girl whose mysterious disappearance was the cause of the recent riotous proceedings in Charlestown, Mass., has returned to that city in charge of her mother. She had been taken to Philadelphia, and there remained till brought away by her parent.

Arrival of the Daniel Webster.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

The steamship Daniel Webster, Capt. Graffam, arrived on Saturday from San Juan, bringing dates from San Francisco to the 15th ult.

The Webster left San Juan on the 6th inst., and the Prometheus left the same day for New York, with three hundred and fifty passengers.

CALIFORNIA.

We copy from the San Francisco Herald of the 15th ult. the following resume of the news of the previous fortnight:

The news from the interior has been of unusual interest. The Indians on Dry Creek have kept the neighborhood in a high state of excitement and alarm on account of their bold robberies and evident hostility. Some brisk fighting has occurred between them and parties of the whites sent out to chastise them. In these encounters the Indians behaved with great courage; several of the whites were killed, and on one occasion were compelled to retreat, leaving the enemy masters of the field. Reports from the San Joaquin Valley are to the effect that Fort Miller has been attacked, and that several persons are missing in that vicinity. The Indians think that the government of the United States has not acted in good faith with them in failing to carry out the stipulations of the treaty, and they complain that the American have cut off their supplies and reduced them to a state of starvation. Many murders had been committed throughout the mining regions, and daily accounts are received of outrage and robbery. There has been a great excitement in Calaveras county, and a general expulsion of the Mexicans. A band of Mexican marauders have infested the neighborhood, committing all manner of enormities. The robber Joaquin is at the head of these desperadoes, and has become the terror of the country for around. The miners have assembled in force and commenced a systematic search Joaquin has eluded all attempts to capture him; several of his gang have been taken and hung. The entire Mexican population has been driven from San Andreas and the forks of the Calaveras. Mass meetings have been held and resolutions passed approving of the work of extermination. The utmost consternation prevails amongst all foreigners.

The weather throughout the mines has been generally delightful, and the miners are mostly doing well. The small-pox has been prevalent in some parts of the State.

Very extensive canalling operations are going on for the purpose of supplying the gold regions with water. There is every reason to suppose that the approaching season will enable the miners to make amends for their late inactivity.

Measures are being taken to construct a plank road from Marysville to Nevada, and improvements of every description are being effected.

Some beautiful specimens of rubies and emeralds have been found in the interior, and also a magnificent diamond of the first water.

The murderers of the lamented Lieut. Col. Craig were executed at San Diego on the 21st of January. The celebrated Yuba warrior Pasqual was present.

Benicia has been finally fixed upon as the capital of the State.

Phillips's fire annihilator has been tested in San Francisco with unequivocal success.

The Governor's recommendation of an extension of the city front, has met with the entire condemnation of the municipal government and of the citizens at large. A committee has been appointed by the Legislature to investigate the matter, and evidence is now being gathered upon the subject.

The Common Council of San Francisco adopted a resolution enjoining the Commissioners of the Funded Debt from disposing of city property. The Mayor withheld his approval.

The weather in San Francisco during the last two weeks has been delightful in the extreme.

Miss Catherine Hayes is absent for the present on a tour through the interior. The prise ticket for her first concert at Sacramento sold for $1900.

Miss Hauser, the celebrated violinist, is giving concerts at San Francisco Hall.

The second anniversary of the San Francisco Orphan Asylum was celebrated with interesting exercises. The association is in a prosperous condition and very ably conducted.

The California Methodist Conference closed its session on Tuesday last.

A Frenchman named Lemantour has applied to the Land Commissioners to be concirmed in his claim of an immense tract of land, comprising within its limits a goodly portion of the city of San Francisco.

On the 21st of November, there occurred a riot at Amoy, in China; an attack was made upon certain Europeans, and the British marines were obliged to fire upon the natives. The King of Siam acknowledges himself a tributary to China. The rebellion in China is more threatening that ever. The insurgents have progressed with exceeding boldness, and are gathering force. The Viceroy of Canton has been invested with ample powers for conducting operations against the rebel bands.

A Portuguese fleet of forsbis had a fight of two hours with the piratos of Ningpo, off the Fohkien coast.

The steamship Great Britain, or one much like her, was seen entering Hobson's Bay, Australia.

No movement of importance has been made by the British troops in Burmah. The death of Admiral Austin renders Commodore Lambert the senior officer in the Indian seas.

A superior quality of sugar is being manufactured in the Sandwich Islands. A joint stock company to carry on a sugar plantation in the islands, is about to be organized. The proclamation of the new Constitution of the Islands took place with many formalities on the 6th December. The intention of transferring the sovereignty of the islands to the United States has been officially repudiated by the organ of the Government.

We find the following in the Herald relative to the diamond mentioned above:

We have received a communication descriptive of this remarkable stone, which was found within two miles of Columbia, in Tuolumne county. It is to be exhibited in Stockton and this city for a short time, prior to its departure for New York. Our correspondent informs us that it has been carefully and scientifically tested by Dr. F. Banks, a graduate of the Medical University of Louisiana, who pronounced it, beyond all doubt, to be a diamond of very rare purity. It is said to be larger than the Crown Diamond of England, which is valued at ten millions of dollars. We are informed by a gentleman who has seen it, that it is about the size of a pigeon's egg, but is of course still in the rough. Should this turn out to be true, its value will be enormous, and a new source of boundless wealth open to our miners; for this of course cannot be the only stone of the kind in the country. Diamond mines are just as well decked as gold mines.

The steamer New Orleans, Capt. Wakeman, was to leave San Francisco in the latter part of February for Australia. She would be the second steamer from San Francisco for Australia. Many of the California miners, induced by the flattering accounts from that Continent, were preparing to journey thither. It is said that the excitement produced in many parts of California by the letters received from Australia, was equal to that which existed in the Atlantic States, on the first accounts being recived of the wonderful discoveries in the "Eureka State."

The Herald says that a petition was in circulation requesting Gen. Pierce to appoint Gov. Bigler Chargé to the Republic of Chili.

The Tennessee, the steamer which left San Francisco on the 15th ult. for Panama, took $2,250,035 worth of gold dust.

The Mayor of San Francisco, and the officers of the Federal Government, gave a dinner, on the 28th of January, to M. Dillon, "upon," as it is announced, "the accession of Louis Napoleon to the imperial throne," the occasion being seized to pay a compliment to M. Dillon, personally. Nearly all the other foreign Consulsat the port were invited and partook of the banquet.

Later from California.

ARRIVAL OF THE PHILADELPHIA.

The U. S. mail steamship Philadelphia, J. P. McKinstry, commanding, arrived here about 7 o'clock A. M. Tuesday, from Aspinwall, with the California mails, 140 passangers, and $14,000 in gold dust on freight.

The Philadelphia left Aspinwall on the evening of the 7th inst.

The U. S. mail steamships Ohio and Cherokee left there respectively on the 5th and 6th inst., with a full complement of passengers, and the latter with $2,500,000 in gold dust on freight.

Passengers report the health of the Isthmus as being good, and the roads in fine order; enabling them to make the transit with comfort and expedition.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company's new and splendid steamer John L. Stevens had just arrived at Panama, from New York, having made the voyage in the unparalleled space of fifty-three days running time.

The steamship Sierra Nevada had also arrived from New York; running time fifty-eight days.

The San Francisco steamers California and Panama arrived at Panama on the 2d inst., with upwards of seven hundred passengers and $2,000,000 in gold dust on freight.

From Panama.

By the steamship Philadelphia we have received files of the Panama Star and Herald to the 3d inst.

The Star says:

We learn that the railroad will be completed to Gorgona about the middle of April. Some miles on this side of Gorgona will, it is expected, be perfected at the same time.

Owing to sickness among the laborers, the work is considerably retarded at present.

A gentleman informs us that the portion of the road to Barbadoes now in use is perfectly firm.

Capt. J. Dayton Wilson, of the steamship Sierra Nevada, died at Tabago about the 1st inst.

The steamer United States, on her return trip to New York, carried passengers in the steerage at the low rate of two dollars and a half, and twenty-five dollars in the cabin. The steamship companies have reduced the price of passage on the steamers bound to California. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company reduced the price on one of their steamers to fifty dollars in the steerage, while the opposition or independent hold up the price to seventy-five dollars.

Madame Biscaccianti had left Panama for Lima on the British steamer.

There was some excitement at Aspinwall about taxes, and a committee was sent to Panama to lay their grievances before Gov. Seldan. The Governor replied in a temperate and logical address, defending the right to lay taxes, and promising to go to the new town and look into the matter personally.

The Panama Star has the following in relation to the Isthmus canal:

Since we laid before the public some information regarding Mr. Gisborne's survey of the Isthmus canal route, we learn that the British have been busily occupied with the subject.

Two naval officers have been lately sent out from England for the purpose of making a preparatory examination, and a British man-of-war is expected to arrive at Port Escoses, to enable the engineers to make a full and perfect survey of the coast and the route already gone over by Mr. Gisborne. We learn that the man-of-war will remain in Port Escoses or some other convanient harbor, for the purpose of rendering effective aid to the surveyors should they be molested by the Indians in crossing the country.

The British ship Queen had arrived at Panama. The Star says the crew on the passage upset the casks and wasted the water, in order to induce the captain to put into some port for a supply, and give them a chance to desert.

The casks were again replenished with salt water, and, the crew finding this trick was not sufficient to accomplish their end, finally resorted to the attempt of scuttling the vessel, and actually bored a hole in her side with an auger.

The leak was stopped, and, on the arrival of the ship at Panama, the mate and one of the crew stole the boat and deserted. They were subsequently picked up at sea, sailing northward.

It is believed that if the agent of the canal route, on his visit to Bogota, should find that the Government can not concede a grant to the canal, without violating the railroad contract, immediate arrangement will be make with the latter company to admit of such a grant being legitimately given by New Granada.

The Effects of European War upon American Commerce.

From a long and powerful speech made by Mr. Cobden at a late peace meeting in Manchester, which was attended by some six thousand persons, we take the following striking paragraphs relative to the effects of a European war upon American commerce. The position is unquestionably a sound one:

Now, I have heard a great deal of trash talked, and have seen a great deal more written, about what is to be expected from the United States of America, if we declare war with France. Don't deceive yourselves. America is not coming to put herself in alliance with the Anglo-Saxon race to make war with France. [Cheers.] If you go to war with France, I tell you what the United States will do: the first thing they will do, will be to assume a very bold attitude, and require you instantly to abandon the right of search which was claimed and exercised during the last war, and was left an open question even at the peace. Now, you will be obliged instantly to renounce the right of visiting American vessels. America will no longer allow you, with her tonnage now nearly equal to your own, to do what you did forty-five years ago with impunity; and what will be the consequence? America will carry on the commerce of Europe.

Do you think with your navigation laws repealed—now t invite the merchants of Liverpool, whose organs talk so glibly of war, to pay attention to what I say—do you suppose that, with the navigation laws repealed, if there was a war between France and England, and our narrow seas swarm, as they will, with privateers having letters of marque—many and many a proud steamer built on the Atlantic shores coming over here with letters of marque to seize as prizes your merchant vessels—do you suppose that, under such circumstances, any body would be such a fool as to send one ounce of freight under the English flag? Would not the insurance be 20 or 30 per cent. more than the insurance of some American ship? And who in the world do you think could carry on competition in any commodities, if he had to pay 20 to 30 per cent. more than those who brought their goods in any foreigenship? What must be the effect instantly of war? Your ships must leave your harbors and go and enter themselves and get registered either as American ships, or Dutch ships, or Hamburgh ships, and be any thing but English ships; then you may bring your commodities here under some other flag; and what will become of the shipwrights of Liverpool, when all the English ships are gone and no others building? They may follow them, or they may go to the work-house. [Hear, hear.]

That is what will follow a war; that is what will come of this "high handed" and "pitching into France," as the saying is. [Laughter.] And right well would the merchants of Liverpool deserve such a state of things if they sanction such a course of policy, or encourage that tone of the press which invites provocation and war of that kind. Though we have not thought sufficiently of what a war would do for ourselves, have you ever considered what effect it would have upon this district? this busy hive, which subsists entirely upon the industry that is employed upon the raw material brought from abroad? I would be a very different thing to know the country into distress now, for the want of the raw material to what it was some sixty years ago; for our capital has increased four or five fold, and our consumption of the raw material has increased some eight or ten fold to what it was in those days. Don't listen to those papers which talk about "pitching into" France, and don't deludo yourselves with the idea that the United States will ever come to the help of the English in any war that may be carried on. The Americans are too shrewd to fight other people's battles; when you find them fighting it will be for themselves. [Cheers and laughter.]

Archbishop Hughes and Mr. Meagher—Interesting Correspondence.—It will be remembered that some weeks since, T. F. Meagher, Esq., the Irish patriot, made a speech at a dinner of the Meagher Guards, of New York, in which he referred to certain attempts that had been made to silence him in regard to Gov. Kossuth and the principles of civil and religious liberty; and that he repelled with a good deal of indignation such attempts to restrict his freedom of opinion and of speech. An interesting correspondence is said to have passed between him and Archbishop Hughes upon the subject, the substance of which is thus given to the N. Y. Times:

The Archbishop wrote to Mr. Meagher, referring to the speech in question and desiring some explicit information as to the persons referred to as having thus denounced him. He said that by many he had been understood as referring to the Bishops and other officers of the Roman Catholic Church; and his language was so vague as to give no sufficient warrant for the contradiction of the rumor. He requested, therefore, that he would give him some more definite information upon the subject.

Mr. Meagher replied by saying that he had often been asked for similar explanations from various quarters; but he had uniformly refused to give them. The official position and personal character of the Archbishop, however, entitled him to a more full and definite statement of his meaning, which he was quite willing to give. The language used, he said, was intended to be broad enough to cover the cases of all, of whatever character or description, who had dspeuned him for avowing his devotion to the principles of civil and religious liberty. He had been educated in the Catholic schools of Ireland; and one of the lessons most thoroughly impressed upon his mind in those schools, was that England was guilty of outrageous tyranny in requiring, in any form, from the Irish people, conformity to the doctrines and worship of the Established Church. He there learned that freedom of conscience was one of the inalienable rights of man; that religious worship was a thing with which Government had no right to interfere; and that any law making dissent in matters of religion from the religion of the State a crime, punishable by law, was an outrage upon justice and humanity.

He believed these principles to be just and true; and he could not conceive that any consistent Catholic should hold them to be true for Ireland and false for the rest of the world. And yet the Archbishop must be aware that certain papers in the United States, claiming to be representatives of the Catholic Church, and to have the support and sanction of its high authorities—of which he named the NewYork Freeman's Journal, the Buffalo Celt, the Boston Pilot and the Pittsburgh Shepherd of the Valley—had denounced him in the most violent terms for having uttered these opinions, and declared his readiness to stand by them in their application to whatever cases might arise. He thought the Archbishop ought to declare explicitly whether the views of those papers met his approbation. For himself, he considered them utterly false—at war with the principles of liberty—at war with the Archbishop's principles as set forth in his lectnre on the "Catholic Chapter"—un-American, and calculated to place the Catholic Church in a false position before the country and the world.

Visit of the Legislature of Virginia to the Caloric Ship.—The Virginia Legislature visited the Caloric Ship Ericsson, on March 7, at Acquila creek, sixty miles below Washington, pursuant to invitation. A handsome collation was provided for them, and Capt. Ericsson explained the principles and working of the engine.

There was abundance of speech-making and toasting, in which Captains Ericsson and Lowber and Mr. Kitching were enthusiastically remembered. They acknowledged the compliment in appropriate and suitable terms.

The Lieutenant Governor of Virginia, the Hon. Mr. Strother, and State Senator Campbell made short speeches expressing their admiration and confidence in the great discovery.

Ambrose W. Thompson, who formerly proposed to establish a line of steamships between Norfolk and Antwerp, made a speech, in which he said he considered the success of caloric beyond a doubt. He also stated incidentally that since Virginia had shown a disposition to complete the great lines of railway connecting with the Memphis road, foreign capitalists had offered through him the means for that purpose.

Virginia, through her Legislature, has invited Captains Ericsson and Lowber to become the special guests of the State, to which they have assented.

Vancouver's Island.—A return made by the Hudson's Bay Company to the British House of Commons, communicates some interesting particulars respecting Vancouver's Island. One thousand four hundred and seventy-eight acres of land have been sold to eleven persons; the Fur Trade of the company were in possession of 3084 acres, part of which they have sold to their retired servants. The Puget Sound Company have provided four farms to employ emigrants on their first arrival. The Hudson's Bay and Puget's Sound Companies have, at their own expense, sent out 271 males, 80 women, and 84 children since 1848. Those emigrants were mostly agricultural laborers under engagement. One thousand three hundred and fifteen tons of coal had been collected by the Indians, from the surface seams, and had been exported by the Company. The Company had incurred considerable expense in boring for coal without success, until lately, when promising appearances had been discovered about eighty miles north of Fort Victoria, on the east coast of the island, nearly opposite the mouth of Fraser's river. Measnres had been taken to follow out the search, and work the coal if found practicable. The high rate of wages in Oregon and California had tended to the detriment of the Island. Flour had still to be imported for the use of

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

THEY SAY THAT THOU ART POOR.

They say that thou art poor, Louise,
And so I know thou art;
But what is wealth to noble minds,
Or riches to the heart?
Wish all the wealth of Ophir's mines,
Can one great deed be bought?
Or can a kingdom's ransom bring
One pure and holy thought:
No; vain your boasted treasure,
The earth to gold is given,
Gold cannot stretch to measure
The love bestowed by heaven!

They say that thou art poor, Louise,
And so I know thou art;
But why should lack of sordid pelf
Thrust thee and me apart?
The pearls that sparkle on the lawn
Our jewels bright shall be;
The gold that frets the early dawn
Shall fill our treasury!
All ye the proudest minion
Whom gold gives rule o'er earth,
Doth not our broad dominion
Out-bounce all he's worth!

We'll rove beside the brook at eve,
When birds their vespers sing,
Of gentle truth and guileless love
To woods and winds prelong!
And from the morning jeweled cup
Such beautiful draught we'll have
As never met the fevered lips
Of Fortune's gilded slave.
Could Lydia's Cypress, dearest,
As wide a kingdom see
As the fair realm thou hearest
Belongs to thee and me!

I know that thou art poor, Louise,
And so indeed am I;
But not the hoards of ocean's caves
Our poverty could buy!
For wealth beyond the miser's thought
We both alike contest—
The treasure of a priceless love,
The riches of the soul!
Then at this hour divine, love,
So holy echoes given,
Let thy true vows and mine, love,
Be registered in heaven!

OUR NEW ORGAN IN CHURCH.

The village of Westwerwick is situated in the far north of England, and, almost on the coast. The neighboring country is not picturesque, being remarkable chiefly as a coal district. It is true, there are hills in the distance; but they are so distant they look almost like clouds on the horizon. Immediately round the village, it is quite flat, with the exception of the little eminences which generally lead up to the mouths of the coal pits. There is no lack of vegetation to compensate for the want of variety of surface, no shady foliage, no fertile fields, no green meadows, nothing but bleak, sandy moorlands—sometimes bare, sometimes rarely, sometimes, as they approach the sea, partially covered with the stiff, rushy beach-grass; while mounds of ashes by day, and red flames by night, mark the coal pits, and form the distinguishing feature of the country. But this bleak district has a beauty of its own in the sweet summer. From these moors, bold, rocky, ragged cliffs descend, sometimes abruptly into the sea, sometimes on a hard, flat, yellowish beach, on which the waves of the German Ocean roll in for miles and miles. Not above a quarter of a mile from the shore stands the village, with its straggling and dirty "the square" built of stone, and roofed with red tiles. The villagers and their families are chiefly colliers. At one end of the village there is a small new church, without a chancel—too much in appearance like a town church to be interesting—surrounded by a new made grave yard, gaudy, and neatly kept, but with none of those mouldering monuments, and solemn, shadowing yews which bestow a deep though mournful interest.

At the time of which I am speaking, the aristocracy of the village consisted of Mr. Selby, a county solicitor, who practiced in the neighborhood, and family; Mr. Moore, lessee of the coal pits, and his daughter; the surgeon and his wife; and the clergyman and his sister; besides my sister and myself—two middle-aged spinsters, in easy though not wealthy circumstances. The Moores and the Selbys had not been on speaking terms for many years—the origin of the quarrel had been some trifling difference between Mr. Moore and Mr. Selby about a parish road. By degrees, the breach was widened till it had become almost irreparable. Now, at the distance of ten years, there was apparently much less prospect of reconciliation than when the evil was new. Yet neither Mr. Moore nor Mr. Selby was a bad man. The former was warm-hearted and warm-tempered, equally ready to quarrel in his likings and dislikings, ready to forgive when forgiveness was asked, but determined not to be the first to sue for pardon. Mr. Selby was a man of colder temperament, more just, but not so generous. He was high principled, and his reputation as a lawyer was honorable in the extreme. He had been utterly incensed at Mr. Moore, because the latter had, in the heat of passion, said something which seemed to reflect upon his veracity and good faith in some way or other, and he insisted on his making an apology, to which Mr. Moore had replied: "That he had never in his life said anything which required an apology, and that, therefore, he did not intend ever to make one, and he was not going to be domineered over by Mr. Selby." Mr. Selby "would not suffer himself to be insulted with impunity." And thus for the present the affair ended. The quarrel had made them both unhappy, but neither of them would pronounce the few words, which might have terminated it.

It may be imagined that this rupture did not tend to increase the cheerfulness of our little society at Westwerwick. There was always wanting now at our little meeting either the genial mirthfulness of Mr. Moore, or the clear, good sense of Mr. Selby, for they could not be invited together. The surgeon and his wife, and the clergyman and his sister, deplored with my sister and myself the estrangement which had taken place between our village magnates; and many a time, to use a homely phrase, we laid our heads together to devise a plan for a reconciliation; but always in vain. As the young people of the two families grew up, it seemed even sadder. More especially, I pitied poor Ellen Moore. There was a large family of the Selbys, and they made a merry circle of young men and women among themselves; but Ellen was quite solitary, as she had no mother, and during all the day her father was engaged with his business. Often she would come down with her work, and spend the morning with my sister and myself; or, when the health of the former would permit me to leave her—for my sister was a great invalid—I occasionally passed an hour with Ellen at Sea-view House, which was only about a quarter of a mile from the village.

Sea-view House was a very charming residence. It was situated at the top of a high cliff, but at some distance from the edge, the space being filled with a smooth, green lawn, from which a zig-zag path, cut in the rock, led to the smooth sands beneath. The house itself was large, cheerful, and luxuriously furnished, and commanded from almost every window a view of the rock-bound coast, with its innumerable creeks and headlands, washed by the illimitable sea, which spread round and round, and away and away to the far horizon. At the end of the house furthest from the sea, were the garden and green-house; and behind an orchard. As I have said, I had often suspected Ellen was dull; but she never complained. At last, one day, when she and I were sitting at work together in an upper chamber, from which, between the sea-view, there was a glimpse of the public road, along which, just then, a party of the young Selbys on horseback were passing, laughing and talking, she sighed gently. As I looked at her she colored, and then said, with some hesitation: "I know it is wrong, dear Miss Madeline, with so much to make me happy; but I do feel dull sometimes."

"Nothing more natural, my love," I replied. She continued: "I cannot help thinking how I used to enjoy going to the Hall to play with the Selbys, and what friends Kitty and Julia and Robert I used to be. When I was at school I did not think often of those days, but now I seem to be thinking of them always—I feel so lonely sometimes. It is so different with the Selbys. I dare say they never think of me, Miss Madeline."

"Indeed, Ellen, you wrong them. Kitty and Julia often speak of you; and Robert, who, I dare say, you know has returned from Newcastle, and become his father's partner, was asking me very kindly about his old playmate only yesterday. And even Mr. Selby himself remarked the other day, what a sweet, lady-like girl Miss Moore was, and that you always used to be a pet of his." As I spoke, Ellen's face, which before had been somewhat pensive, broke into smiles.

Ellen was a pretty girl, with a slight, flexible figure, gentle, sensitive expression, and massy coils of glossy black hair. Although she [illegible] she did not, however, continue the [illegible] and said, after some minutes' silence: "I have been wishing for a long time we had a new organ and choir in the church: those screeching fiddles, and that poor old John Morris's screeching, are dreadful."

"It would be indeed delightful," I answered—for my ears had suffered martyrdom for some years from causes to which Ellen had alluded—"but I fear there is little hope for us. An organ would be beyond our means, and who would play it, if we had one?"

"Why, you and I, dear Miss Madeline; and perhaps Kitty Selby; she used to play nicely on the piano. And as to the cost, I was speaking to papa about it the other night, and he and I will give fifty pounds as our share; and if you and Mr. Jones could help me to collect as much more, we could get a very nice little organ for a hundred pounds. And then we might teach some of the village children to sing."

"It would be charming, indeed, dear Ellen," I said, "if it could be managed."

"Now don't say if, Miss Madeline: it must and shall be managed."

On my way home I met Mr. Moore, and spoke to him of his daughter's suggestion. "Yes," he said, "was it not a capital idea of Ellen's? I am so glad she thought of it instead of any of the Selbys; because in that case I could have had nothing to do with the business. It would have looked as if I had wished to truckle to these people."

It was agreed by the rest of the village society, who were one and all charmed with the idea of the new organ, that I should break the matter to the Selbys. Accordingly, one fine summer evening I bent my steps in the direction of Westwerwick Hall, as it was more commonly called. The golden rays of a summer sunset were streaming on the lawn, and the purple and crimson clouds were mirrored on the still surface of a small sheet of water which bathed the foot of the green slope. The Selbys were all assembled in front of the house, to enjoy the beauty of the summer evening, and welcomed me cordially. The moment seemed auspicious; and as soon as our mutual greetings were over, I entered on the subject of my mission, merely saying, however, with a sort of diplomatic caution, "It had been proposed."

The notion was hailed with delight by all the party. At last Mr. Selby inquired;

"And let it to you, Miss Madeline, we are indebted for this excellent suggestion?"

"No," I answered, intrepidly hit with some little misgiving; "the credit is due to Miss Moore."

"Miss Moore? I am glad it was Miss Moore. If it had been her father—. But no; one ought not to allow one's private feelings to interfere with the public good. If a thing is right, it ought to be supported, no matter whence it emanates. Fifty pounds, you say, have already been subscribed; you may put my name down for twenty-five."

I then, as I had been instructed, spoke of forming a choir, saying that Ellen Moore, relieved occasionally by myself, was to play the organ.

"Ellen Moore!" cried the girls, in delight.

"Then we shall see dear Ellen Moore again."

"Pretty Ellen Moore!" said Robert Selby. "What a sweet tempered little thing she used to be!"

"Yes," I said, "and still as sweet tempered as ever. She was asking all about her old playfellows the other day."

"Poor thing!" said their father; "she must lead rather a solitary life. I am sure, if she and my young people choose to be friendly, I have no objection, though her father is an insolent, obstinate madman. I do not confound the innocent with the guilty, Miss Madeline. Ellen is only the more to be pitied."

I went home, charmed with the success of my commission, and not without a hope in my heart, that our new organ might in some way or other be productive of a yet more important harmony than that which was to supersede old Jehu Morris and the fiddles. And now nothing was talked of and thought of at Westwerwick but the new organ. Ellen Moore looked livelier than I had seen her for a long time. It struck me she was pleased and excited by the prospect of renewing her acquaintance with the Selbys. Mr. Moore had given his consent that they should meet, "as the Selbys wished it;" Ellen should not have made the advance."

At last the organ arrived, and was put up in the church. I shall not attempt to describe the excitement which prevailed in Westwerwick that day: those only who understand the life of small country places, and who know the immense sensation there produced by the merest trifle, the smallest break in the ordinary monotony, can have any idea of it. It had been for some weeks the chief subject of conversation at every tea-party; we rushed about to each other's houses to consult about every little circumstance regarding it. All our thoughts seemed to bear some reference to the all-absorbing topic. I met the doctor's wife on the day on which it was to leave Newcastle.

"Fine weather this for the organ!" she said.

It came to us the next morning. Man, woman and child turned out to see the wagon in which it was conveyed pass down the street; and all the remainder of the day, while it was in the course of erection, you would have thought some high festival was celebrating in the church, from the numbers that thronged merely to gaze at the organ. There was to be a tea-party that night at the parsonage, to talk over the organ, and arrange about the choir.

I had seen Ellen Moore in the morning; I fancied she looked anxious and excited; but as she said nothing, I thought I might have been mistaken. She was to come for me in the evening, that we might go together to the parsonage; and I saw then that she was excited, for there was a bright spot on each cheek, her eyes shone anxiously, and I could feel, as her hand rested on my arm, that it trembled. "Dear Ellen!" I said involuntarily.

"Oh, Madeline!" she cried: "I think of so many things. I wonder how we shall meet. My heart fails."

We are now at the parsonage, and I hurried into the drawing room, for Ellen looked very pale, and I thought delay was only making matters worse. The Selbys were already come. They all rose and advanced a step as we entered the room, then stopped half-doubtingly. At last Julia, who was always the most self-possessed of the three, said in a friendly voice, and holding out her hand: "How do you do, Miss Moore? I"—— then suddenly stopped, seeing how much Ellen was agitated, and how deadly pale she had become.

"Ellen is thinking of past times! Are you not, dear Ellen?" cried Kitty, affectionately. And in a moment the girls were in each other's arms, and all three sobbing together. At last, Kitty was able to say: "But here is another old friend of yours, Ellen, and he has not forgotten you, I know, any more than Julia and I have."

Ellen, now coloring and smiling through her tears, held out her hand to Robert. I saw the young man's eyes sparkle with pleasure as she said: "Robert too!"

"Yes, Ellen, we have never forgotten you. We constantly spoke of you, and tried to hope you had not forgotten us."

Then Ellen sat down between Robert and Kitty, and they talked together of old days and old scenes; and as they spoke, Ellen's winning smile and gentle gaiety returned, and Robert became more and more animated. Robert Selby was a pleasant, manly looking man, with an intelligent, happy face, which mirrored truthfully all his feelings. I could see at a glance that he was charmed with Ellen, and she, too, looked unusually happy in her gentle way. As I had early begun to anticipate, there was not as much said about the organ as the occasion might have seemed to demand. However, it was arranged that we were to meet in the church three times a week to practice. Robert was to lead the choir, for he had a fine voice.

Weeks and months passed on—the church music prospered. Ellen was a first-rate organist; and when she was prevented from officiating, I supplied her place. Nothing could exceed the friendship of Ellen and the Selbys. I sometimes, indeed, suspected that between some members of the party a warmer sentiment than friendship might exist.

I should have rejoiced at this had my heart had no misgivings when I thought of Mr. Moore and Mr. Selby. I was confirmed in my suspicion one day, when coming from church with Ellen, I learned that I had guessed aright. With many tears, the poor girl told me she and Robert loved each other. "But papa—he will never consent! Oh, Miss Madeline, I could almost wish we had never met!"

I endeavored to console her, but my hopes were not great. "And Mr. Selby?" I asked.

"Robert has spoken to his father, and he says if papa gives his consent, he will not withhold his. Robert is to ask papa to-morrow, but I know it will be in vain."

And in effect, as I feared, it was in vain. There was a terrible scene at Sea-view House. Mr. Moore, in a violent passion, had said that he would "rather see his daughter beneath the waves of the German Ocean than the wife of Mr. Selby's son; and he was not going to permit himself to be flattered into a reconciliation now, when it was so palpably for their own interests the Selbys wished it. All intercourse between the families must cease at once and forever."

Ellen, who had kept his temper for some time, could hold out no longer, and he and Mr. Moore parted in mutual anger.

I did not see Ellen till some days after this catastrophe, and then she looked heart-broken. She tried to smile when she saw me, but the effort was too much for her, and she became hysterical. Poor Ellen! my heart was sad for her; she did not complain, but day by day, and week by week, her eyes became dimmer, and her step feebler. Her father, meanwhile, appeared to be in the state of one who was determined to be blind to what he did not wish to see. Nothing could exceed his devotion to his daughter. He seemed to endeavor to anticipate every desire; but that she was wasting away, body and spirit, he would not see. Meanwhile, Robert Selby, although forbidden by his father, had made several efforts to open a clandestine correspondence with Ellen. Only once she had replied to him, and then it was through me. "Tell Robert," she said, "I shall never marry him or any one. I am my father's only child, he has always loved me dearly, and I cannot, must not quit him. Married without his consent, I should be even more wretched than I am; it is, therefore, better we should meet no more. I shall never forget him, Miss Madeline, but do not tell him that; he must cease to think of me."

I delivered Ellen's message, and Robert declared vehemently, that to give up Ellen Moore was impossible. He would love her to the end of his life, and as long as life lasted; and if she remained unmarried, he should still hope to win her.

And now winter and spring had passed away, and it was summer again. Again the summer bine of the sky was reflected in the sunny sea; again the gay flowers blossomed bright in Eleu's parterres; but the sweet girl herself drooped like a flower cut off in its bloom from the sunshine and the dew. Often I noticed her father's eye turned anxiously upon her. He, too, looked ill. It was evident that some care preyed upon his spirits. I now determined to speak to him myself upon the cause of Ellen's unhappiness. Accordingly, I chose an opportunity one morning, when the latter had left me together alone. Mr. Moore listened to me in excessive agitation, but without anger. When I had finished he hid his face in his hands and groaned.

"It can not be," he said; "it can not be. Now, at least, it is impossible. I thought it was only a girlish fancy—and so it is, I trust. I will take her away. She shall go to Italy—she used to wish to go there. Change of scene will soon make her forget. Miss Madeline, I tell you it is impossible."

I was on the point of answering, when I was prevented by the return of Ellen, equipped in her walking-dress. She and her father accompanied me to the gate on my way home; they said they were going to walk on the sands.

"Have you time before tide comes up?" I inquired.

"Oh, yes—plenty; it will not be high water for an hour or two."

I did not accompany the Moores on their walk; but as I have often heard the particulars of it related, I know what passed almost as well as if I had been present. After having descended the rocky by the zig-zag path, they had walked some distance very slowly along the beach, when Ellen was seized with sudden faintness. For some time her father watched anxiously over her, hoping it might go off; but instead of doing so, it seemed to increase. Nearly an hour she remained in this state, her father not daring to leave her to seek assistance. It was while still bending over the drooping girl, he suddenly felt his feet wet, and, turning hastily around, he found he was standing in a pool newly formed by the advancing wave of the flowing tide. The full horror of his situation now broke upon him. Clasping his half-dead daughter in his arms, he staggered with her in the direction of the zig-zag path; but it was a spring tide, and the dashing waves were hurrying forward so rapidly that he could not have reached it in time to save himself, even had he been alone. He might, perhaps, have made; had he been unencumbered, a desperate effort to climb up the high, frowning cliffs; but with Ellen, this was out of the question; all he could do was to drag her upon a rock, and wait there in the forlorn hope that ere the tide reached them, some one might descry them from above the heights—a road, however, which was little frequented.

A bitterness greater than that of death now took possession of the soul of Mr. Moore. The raging waves, the insurmountable cliff—his daughter, his adored Ellen, so soon to be lying cold beneath those bright, pitiless waters! Then came almost maddening on his memory the speech he had made to Robert Selby: "Rather would I see her beneath the waves of the sea, than the wife of Mr. Selby's son!" This, then, was retribution! so, in that awful moment, it appeared to the wretched man. A whole existence of agony seemed to be compressed in these few moments; all things appeared to him in a new light—his conduct, his motives—it was terrible to see what they had really been, now that it was too late!

At last, above, or rather through, the hollow roar of the sea, he fancied he heard the cheerful sound of a human voice. He called loudly with the energy of despair. Yes, there were certainly figures on the top of the cliff; then they seemed to disappear. His bewildered brain must have been playing him some trick. His heart sickened with despair. But no, one figure only had disappeared; and the other—yes the other was now actually descending the rock with the skill of an experienced orageman. In a few minutes Mr. Moore stood face to face with his mortal enemy; but he forgot it now. "Save Ellen!" he cried.

"My servant has gone to the village for ropes and ladders, and other assistance; he will be back immediately. You are saved!"

And now they were all at Sea-view House. Ellen was lying on a sofa, half insensible; her father and the doctor were bending over her; Mr. Selby and I stood watching at the foot of the couch.

"Only a temporary attack," said the doctor, "occasioned by a great debility and mental distress—no disease."

Her father lifted his eyes in heartfelt gratitude; as they fell they met those of Mr. Selby. "You have saved her life," cried Mr. Moore, "and mine. You have returned good for evil. Can you forgive all the unchristian bitterness of my heart against you?"

"Let us forgive our sins against each other," answered Mr. Selby. "Next to our sin against God, our greatest sin has been against her"—and the enemies clasped hands.

At this moment Ellen looked towards them; an unspeakable smile lighted up her sweet, pale face.

It is a glorious August morning—the sun is shining in a cloudless sky; the sea is sparkling like a sapphire strewed with diamonds; the bells of Westerwick church are ringing a merry peal; all the village are at church, for there is a wedding to-day at Westerwick. I play the organ, for Ellen Moore is differently engaged. She is the bride, and Robert Selby the bridegroom. We have good music in the church now, and the most perfect harmony in Westerwick.

"Who would have thought," said the clergyman's sister, as we gossipped that night over our tea, "that all this joy would have come out of our new organ!"

BEAUTIFUL THOUGHTS.—God has sent his angels into the world, whose office it is to refresh the sorrows of the poor, and to lighten the eyes of the disconsolate. And what greater pleasure can we have than that we should bring joy to our brother; that the tongue should be tuned with heavenly accents, and make the weary soul listen for light and ease; and when he perceives that there is such a thing in the world, and in the order of things, as comfort and joy, to begin to break out of his prison of sorrows at the door of sighs and tears, and slowly begin to melt into showers and refreshments—this is glory to thy voice, and enjoyments fit for the brightest angel. So I have seen the sun kiss the frozen earth, which was bound up in the image of death, and the colder breath of the north, and the waters break from their enclosure and melt with joy, and run in useful channels; and the flies do rise from little graves in the walls, and dance a little while in the air, to tell that joy was within, and that the great mother of creatures will open her stock of new refreshments, become useful to mankind, and sing praises to her Redeemer. So is the heart of a sorrowful man, when under the discourse of wise comfort he breaks from the despair of the grave, and the fetters and chains of sorrow; he blesses God, and blesses thee, and he feels life returning.

Horn Tooke being asked by George III. if he played at cards, replied, "I cannot tell a king from a knave."

SHOWING THE DEAD.—There is a curious custom at Havana of laying out bodies in state during the night before burial. They are placed close to the open window, fronting the street, on a couch raised four or five feet from the ground. The corpse is enrrounded by high wax tapers, and the whole room illuminated. Frequently, when returning from a furtutlia or ball, I have been startled by seeing the fixed and rigid features of some old gentleman or lady, dressed in their best attire, and apparently reclining before the window. It used to appear an unnecessary mockery of death, dressing out a corpse and in a new suit of clothes, with tight patent leather boots, and white neckcloth. I remember one night in particular, I was returning home through one of the by-streets, when seeing the lower windows of a house illuminated and concluding there was a body lying in state, I went towards it. There, close to the window, so close that I could have touched it through the bars, lay the body of a young girl about fifteen years of age. She was dressed as if for a ball, with flowers in her hair, and white satin shoes on her feet, her hands crossed on her breast, her eyes closed, and her mouth slightly opened; and altogether her face and expression was one of the most beautiful I have ever seen. RIOT IN CHARLESTOWN MASS.—Catholic Church Attacked—Mob Dispersed by the Militia, etc.—We find the following in a telegraphic dispatch to the New York papers of the 3d inst. The discussion about the girl alluded to has been for some time carried on; some of the papers asserting that the girl was with her friends, and others that she was not:

Boston, March 2.—Some weeks since, an Irish girl, about seventeen years old, named Honora Coobran, educated in the Catholic faith, but recently converted to Protestantism, mysteriously disappeared from her home in Charlestown. Her disappearance caused much anxiety to her Protestant friends, and her guardian, a wealthy and respectable merchant, has spared no efforts to learn her whereabouts. The community became excited on the subject, and handbills, calling a meeting of citizens "opposed to religious oppression and imprisonment for opinion's sake," were posted about the streets.

The Irish Catholics became excited; and, to prevent riot, the authorities of Charlestown ordered the military and fire departments of the city to be in readiness—one hundred special policemen were also enrolled. Four military companies of Boston were now under arms at their armories, by request of the Mayor of Charlestown. The mob, numbering about five thousand, gathered in the vicinity of the Catholic church, in Richmond street, and began to break down lamp-posts, fences, etc., and commenced the demolition of a small wooden building close to the church. Mayor Frothingham, finding all his efforts to disperse the mob unavailing, then read the riot act, to which no attention was paid. Orders were then sent to the Charlestown Artillery and City Guard, (who were in readiness at their armories,) who promptly appeared at the scene of the riot with their muskets loaded with shell cartridges. The mob gave way to the right and left as the military advanced, and very suddenly dispersed. At a quarter past nine the affair was over, and Richmond street nearly deserted.

At half-past 9 o'clock the bell on Rev. Mr. Ellis's church, on Main street, sounded a fire alarm, and a number of officers immediately repaired thither, when they found a crowd of some three hundred collected about the church, and ascertained some one had broken into the building and rung the bell. The individual was detected in the act of leaving the church, and was arrested by a officer, who was immediately knocked down and the fellow escaped. Additional officers coming, three persons were arrested, and the crowd gradually dispersed, until at half-past 10 o'clock all was comparatively quiet; but few people except those on duty being in the streets.

On the 3d instant, the excitement at Charlestown was on the decrease, awaiting the production of the girl. It is said, on the best authority, that, on the 28th, the priest gave the Catholics orders to stay at home on Wednesday night, and offer no resistance to the destruction of the church by the mob, as it was their intention soon to tear it down, to make room for the erection of a large cathedral, and it was better to have it torn down, and recover damages, than sell it or move it away.

WITCHCRAFT IN PENNSYLVANIA.—The Chambersburg (Pa.) Whig relates a singular instance of superstition, which proves that the belief in witchcraft is not yet done away with. It appears that recently a female member of a denomination called the Christian Church, in Fulton county, Pa., was taken sick, and finally imagined she was bewitched by a sister of the church. A meeting of the session was called in due season, at which the minister presided, and the charge of witchcraft was formally preferred against the lady. Being a new case, and, we presume, not provided for in the discipline, the session was puzzled as to the proper manner to proceed in the case. At length it was proposed that she should be asked to step over a broom-stick, as it had been said that a witch could not do so; but the accused got over it without apparent difficulty. After a consultation it was then agreed that she should be tried in a pair of weigh-scales with a bible to balance her, and if she was a witch the bible would be too heavy for her. Accordingly she was taken to a mill, and the experiment tried, but she proved too heavy for the bible. It was then intimated that probably her cloth ing prevented a fair test, and half a bushel of corn was put on the scales with the bible, to balance the clothing but still the lady was too heavy, and the charge was formally dismissed.

Mr. Gibson, the American gentleman who, in his yacht, the Flirt, it will be remembered, was arrested by the Dutch authorities at Pelambang, Java, on a charge of high treason, in exciting the Rajah of Djambi to war war with the Dutch, and imprisoned at Batavia twelve months, still remains incarcerated. The Court of Justice has on three several occasions pronounced an acquittal, and ordered the schooner to be delivered up to Mr. Gibson, but the Procureur-General, on various pretexts, contrives to keep the accused in jail, without any further trial. Mr. Gibson is about to make another attempt to secure his liberty.

A RAILROAD FEET DEEP!—The St. Louis Intelligencer publishes a letter from an overland emigrant to California, which gives a fearful account of a tremendous snow storm in the mountains near Carson Valley. On what is called the Second Summit, the writer says he might have touched the tops of pine trees, and was confident they were one hundred feet in height. This is an item that might have a bearing upon the question of a railroad to the Pacific through the South Pass. Rails buried in snow a hundred feet deep, would stand little chance of removal by any scraper yet invented.

THE CALL OF ELISHA.

How wonderful the power of imagination! can carry us far into the future, and draw fancy's canvass scenes yet to come. It transport us into the dim misty regions the past, and dress up the events that ried ages ago in the robes of the present.

To-day my fancy has carried me back cen- s, and over thousands of miles. In my I am in the land of Israel—that land ved than classic fame—a land abounding idents before whose interest the adven- of Ulysses must sink into insignificance, all the fabled deeds of Hercules seem as nursery tales that delighted our early in the fields of Shaphat—fields rich the bounties of our fruitful mother earth. green corn waves and dances in the rich ght, and the cool breezes fan the brow the scantide wanderer. It is nearly noon the sky is gorgeous, as only eastern skies To the West lie dark mountains that as if they are immovably penciled the clear sky by the hand of a paih- To the South is an extensive plain, cov- with green grass, on which the calm, ented looking cattle are grazing. Far the North is the still dark forest. In East is a neat village. Along the side of field to the South runs a clear pebbly k, which sweetly murmurs as it flows. hum of bees is in my ear; and the tur- moaning scog is heard in the dim old st. Oh! a scene of plenty, contentment beauty, is before my spirit's eyes.

In the field there are men plowing, and ing to the patient oxen, that ever and reach out their yoked necks and partake the green corn. Shaphat is a man of wealth. are twelve yoke of oxen in that field: of which is directed by Elisha's hand, ugh his father is wealthy. The age has progressed so far as to make it seem de- cable to merit or honor for the son of a man to make himself useful. He is one nature's nobleman." Out in his father's le he has inhaled the pure breath of the al refrigorator—Nature. His form is erect; muscles firm and strong. The blood ows healthfully and strong through his ; his large hazel eye beams with calm ant and intelligence. He stops at the of the furrow, throws back the "cover- from his brow," pushes back the locks of ren hair, and leans on the handle of his . Perhaps he is thinking of the condi- of his beloved land—degraded, sunken idolatry—neglecting the pure worship, and er the rule of an evil King. Sadness ds over his countenance. He looks over father's fair fields, sees the waving corn, rs the plow-man's whistle, and far off sees flocks and herds, and in the edge of the ge his father's spacious home. All this feels is mine. "The lines are fallen to in pleasant places, I have a goodly heri- ge." Yet, O, my beloved land, to raise e from degradation, I would resign all ose pleasant things!

His soul speaks freely within him, and he ls that the real does not lie in this world, which our stay is, at best, but three ee years and ten. Oh! that I could be instrument of causing my countrymen to ow the true good! But, alas! alas! they e sunken so low that it seems like hoping inst hope, to believe that they will ever e from the dust, and assert the true birth- ht of man's freedom from sin, and the rship of the true of God—the source of ght, and the great Elevator of the human e!

As he thus ponders, Elisha is so absorbed that he does not see that there is a man proaching him. To my vision this man ems Michael, or Gabriel, clad in the vest- nts of human nature. He looks to me bout the common stature of man. Sandals on his feet; his flowing robes are girt out his body with a girdle. His long sil- beard hangs down on his breast, and his es are black, and speak the spirit-language plainly that they seem scarcely to veil the ul. This is Elijah, God's prophet; he who been fed by the ravens, at God's word, nd for whom angels have built a fire of coals, and condescended to minister to his ants—so that when the disconsolate prophet ks around he finds meat ready broiled on fire of coals. This is he who bemoaned idolatry of Israel, and thought that he alone was left to worship the true God. He ses the brook, passes by Elisha, and rows his mantle over his shoulders. How Elisha starts from his listless posture, and ks around as if just awakened from slum- r! Far off before him he sees the form of ijah, wending his way toward the moun- ns. "And he left his oxen, and ran after ijah and said, Let me, I pray thee, kiss my ther and my mother, and then I will follow ee."

What a lovely character is here presented our mind! When Elisha feels this mantle round his shoulders, it thrills him like an ctric shock. It seems to wrap him in to d's work, and out from every self-seeking and worldly motive. It is to him a covenant ween his spiritual nature and his God, t earth's honors and wealth shall hence- rth be nothing to him." But dutiful son he is, he can not neglect the claims of his ther and mother. "Let me kiss my father d my mother." So he goes home, gives a at feast, and takes a formal leave of secu- r life, and consistly ministers to Elijah ring his sojourn on earth.

My dream is ended. The skies of Syria are no longer over me; I am at home, in our wn Louisiana. Elisha has long, long ages ago joined his Master in Heaven. Does he regret now that he left an earthly father, ind and rich though he was, in order that he might minister to God's prophet, and be- come instructed in God's will? Was not the promise made by God verified in his case? Did he not find friends, honor and love, with persecution? Was he not favored to see the chariot of God, when it was sent down for Elijah? Who can think of Elijah and Elisha going about doing good, instructing the ignorant, and raising the dead to life, without feeling his heart swell with emotions too big for utterance!

I dream again. And I think of Elisha in Heaven, near by the chrystal river, under the Tree of Life. His father and mother have joined him; with hands clasped they sit and talk of earth. His mother looks toward the Throne and says: "My son, Elisha, it is cause of joy to me always, that I did not by word, or look, strive to hinder you when you were called to the office of a prophet. It was by the help of Jehovah Jesus that I resisted the maternal instinct to throw my arms around your neck and say, O! my son, leave us not, we will be lonely without thee: leave us not! Thanks to the great Giver of strength, I gave thee up to His work. Thou did'st good on earth a few years, and now we have been united ages in perfect bliss—our minds and hearts expanding with knowledge and love. But, my son, as I minister on earth, I see young men called to work for God, yet they will not go, though they are promised a high commission—that of showing forth the love of the great Father in sending the Son to die for man—a commission to explain God's bright dispensation which is so superior to what ours was. And mothers listen to the voice of nature, and hold back their sons from God's work. Elisha, when we visit earth, if the great Father permit, let us visit Louisiana and Mississippi, and as we hover around the paths of the young men of the Church, let us whisper words of courage into their hearts. Let us whisper in their ears, Earth with all its pleasures will soon pass away: life is uncertain; God's heritage lies waste for want of cultivators; souls are blind and ignorant for want of instructors. Up! throw off your sloth and self-seeking; wrap the mantle of Elijah around you; shut your ears to the song of the syren—Ease; drive down to its native hell the devil—Ambition; follow the call of duty. And you, my son, can whisper emphatically that he who gives up all for God, shall have paid back a thousand fold, in the peace and joy that arise in the heart from the knowelge of the approbation of the great Source of Love, Knowledge and Light!

THE LATEST RUSE OF MODERN INFIDELITY.

This is the most significant name we can give to a movement which, for tactical skill in its manngers, and timely adaptedness to some of the superficialities of our age, bids fair to be one of the most mischievous that ever originated in the camp of unbelief. To every well-balanced and well-informed mind its bare exposure is its refutation; and yet with many its very impudence is its strength, while its bold assumption of victory is the very thing which gives it an apparent triumph, and sometimes a real success. It can no longer be called the latest form of infidelity, as it was not long since styled by a learned theologian, himself of the most liberal school of Christianity; for since that day it has ceased to have form altogether. It has retired even beyond the region of negations. It presents no more any thing tangible, any thing that can be reduced to logical statement or definition. It would have astonished the old infidels of the eighteenth century. Hume, and Voltaire, and Paine, would not have known what to make of it: though, doubtless, a kindred instinct would have suffered them to entertain no doubt of its spirit. It has no dogmas, no first or last truths, no premises, no conclusions. But it has abundance of names as shadowy as itself. It calls itself "the new phase of faith"—it is the "breadth and scope of modern thought"—it is the "religion of the intuitions" as distinguished from the dogmas of the "logical understanding"—it is the "old creed," if any would prefer to call it so, but "lifted into higher forms of thought"—it is the "spirit in distinction from the letter"—it is the new translation of the gospel from the "historical" into the "ideal"—it is Christianity come of age, and having outgrown those mythical and miraculous swathing bands that were indispensable to its Jewish infancy—it is the eclectic synthesis of all creeds, the "harmony of all opposite polarities," etc.

For the general mind, however, the chief weapon is the ad captandum assumption that there is something in the modern skepticism far more profound than any thing the world has ever seen, or known or thought before. It is a new and terrible enemy coming up from the "vasty deep" of the future, and already occupying, to some extent, the field of the present. An antagonist as strange as the beast of the prophet's vision, and "speaking great things," is entering the lists, and "Biblical Christianity" is warned, in all friendship, that she must furnish herself with new armor, and cast about for new defences, since now the old will avail her naught.

But who is this "Black Knight," if we may borrow another metaphor, so proudly entering the field with visor closed, and lance in rest, and bearing these "names of mystery" upon his shield? Is it the Old Infidelity?

New-horsed, new-helmed, new-falchioned for the fight?

Oh, no, infidelity, once so called, is vulgar, ribald, coarse, and blasphemous. It had its narrow dogmas as well as the narrow creeds which it assailed. It was unphilosophical—unspiritual. It had no subjective "insight." It was all "outward, like the Christianity it rejected. It belonged to the soulless and faith-lacking eighteenth century. That "old infidelity" is dead and gone, like giants Pope and Pagan. It was a poor, caviling, word-disputing unbelief, as ignoble as the common faith itself.

But what then is this new faith, or this new-be-believing skepticism that so transcends all creeds, all forms, all dogmas, all miracles, all historical facts, all objective statement, all outward literality? Define to us its lineaments—give us, at least, its position in the field. How unreasonable the request they would reply. The very making of such a demand betrays the inveterate influence of the old dogmas. It is the low appeal to the mere "logical understanding." Who can give the infinite in the forms of the finite? Who would attempt to confine within any dogmatic inclosure the limitless intuitions of the "spiritual insight?"

It would be churchly, too, and use a churchly language. Coleridge has made the thing respectable, and some of the latest vagaries of Germanism seem settling in the same direction. Its cloud-built Nephelokokkygia—if we may resort to that Aristophanic mint so rich in names for all similar idealisms—it would style the "Church of the Future," the "Church of the Humanity," the "Church of the New Development." With gracious condescension it admits that the Church is an "immense reality." It "accepts the Church," it tells us; it "adopts the Church;" it most benignly takes under its care a word and an idea which has been so wretchedly misunderstood by almost all in every age who have borne the Christian name.

It would adopt, too, with equal graciousness, the most sacred language of the Scriptures, and employ it with as much familiarity as though it had been its first-formed, first-lisped vernacular tongue. It has its baptism, its regeneration, its incarnation, its redemption, its "at-one-ment," and even its "justification by faith." A late and much-lauded writer of the school "accepts" this doctrine, too. It was thought to have something about it so peculiarly uncompromising as to render impossible all attempts to find an easy and harmonious place for it in the new gospel. But he gives us to understand that all that need be done, is to pull off the deforming disguises in which the ignorance of Paul wrapped the dogma, and it stands forth at the very summit of philosophy. It is the faith by which the individual "comes into unity with the universe." This is a meaning, to be sure, of which apostles never dreamed. It is as much beyond the reach of any of the usual laws of interpretation, whether employed by the learned or the unlearned, as the Jewish Cabala, or Swedenborg's Dictionary of Correspondences. But, then, this only adds to its value; it makes it so much more transcendental an affair than that vulgar dogma which has so long usurped the name.

Here, then, is the secret of success. It is the continual assumption of this unknown approaching power, ever threatening, yet never really grappling with the antagonist it professes to despise. It is the continual putting forth that there is something in this age of ours, its opinions, its science, its peculiar position, far more formidable than any thing the Church or Christianity has ever before encountered. This has has a most powerful effect on certain minds. Its constant reiteration gives it the appearance of something no longer to be called in question. The immense pains that are taken to spread it, in every form, on the wings of our most widely-circulated periodical literature, are producing an impression which is due neither to its argument, nor to its originality. Especially is this the case with the young. They certainly would not be behind the age; and when they are met by this artifice in so many of its ad captandum forms—when they can hardly take up a newspaper of a certain class, or a book of the more popular literature, or read the report of a lecture, without having forced upon them some remark on "obsolete opinions," or a "fossil faith," or "minds in the rear of the modern intelligence," or some eulogy on this "breadth and scope of modern thought"—when, go where they will, there is this incessant and systematic puffing by which the men of the school are keeping one another before the public, and especially when they find some of the professed friends of older truth apparently awed by these impudent assumptions, and disposed to talk of concessions and modifications, and thereby adopt the same style, and even give currency to the same detestable cant—in such circumstances, we say, it is no wonder that the current of the young thought of the age should take a direction which must terminate in a wreck of all true faith in any Biblical or objective revelation.

Another part of the same consists in that affected longing to believe, which is so taking with our young sentimentalists—the representation, they would call it, of a spirit, a noble spirit, "yearning" for faith, yet distressed by those cruel "old dogmas," which its "higher intelligence" can not "accept." There is the struggle of the "transition period," the elevating, though painful, skepticism that vulgar believers can not feel, and which is at the same time the grief and the glory of its possessors. Oh, could we but believe, say some of them,—could we but rest in that simple faith in which our fathers trusted, and which is the consolation of common souls! But alas! alas! our "higher intelligence" is our severe misfortune! The food that once gave nourishment to an Augustine, an Anselm, a Baxter, a Butler, an Edwards, and a Wesley, fails to satisfy the "higher longings" of our famishing spirits! All this has a mighty charm for many souls. It presents a man, especially a young man, in such a very interesting position. It combines so many elements of egotistical vanity, of pseudo-spiritualism, of a false, inflating humility, as far as possible from that repentance which "brings down every high thought, and every vain imagination, in subjection to the cross." No wonder it takes with the young, or when adroitly managed, has a success which the soundest reasoning often fails to command.

Especially is this ruse played off with most appearance of triumph, when an opportunity is presented in a notice or review of some work on the evidences of Christianity. The whole of this department is sometimes ignored with one sweep of the pen. We have nothing more to do with such books. The treatises of Paley, and Lardner, and Chalmers, were very well in their day. They were quite respectable productions, well adapted, perhaps, to meet the objections of the vulgar infidels of the eighteenth century; but similar treatises now do not, and can not, as a matter of course, at all come up to the "new phase of faith," neither are they at all calculated to meet that new and terrible phase of infidelity, whose coming on is betokened by so many signs and forecast shadows of the remarkable age in which we live. 'No, no; the old line of defence is no longer tenable.' The day is past for any longer maintaining the dogma of special Biblical Revelation. "We say it in sorrow," exclaims a writer in the July number of the Westminster Review, "the received theory of the divine origin of Christianity can no more be restored." Let the reader mark the word we have italicised. It contains a dispensation of all argument, and for the shallow admirer of the school, this contemptible trick of rhetoric often stands in the place of all logical proof. "We had hoped," continues this sorrowing apologist, "that our modern defender was about to take up the problem of Christianity with a real appreciation of its altered conditions." But, alas,—we paraphrase instead of quoting farther—it is the old story, to which this enlightened age, with all its immense discoveries in science and philology, can never listen. It is the old argument about miracles and the supernatural. But miracles, or rather the mythical legends so called, were for the infancy of faith. Historical facts, too, if facts they were, were merely its swathing bands. Both must be cast off if we would walk forth into that spiritual freedom which makes the actual of no value in comparison with the ideal; or they must be translated into that higher form of belief which recognizes the divine in nature and humanity alone.

And so on through reviews, essays, lectures, novels, poetry, newspapers, paragraphs, in every form through which the most intolerable sameness of ideas can be combined with the greatest variety of expression. It is the same everlasting round of vaunting assertion with the most sparing amount of proof, the same assumption of a learning which can all be traced to the latest German Encyclopedia or Conversations-Lexicon, the same ill-concealed hatred of the Old Christianity, or what they call a "book revelation," the same insinuations that it has fallen behind the intelligence of the age, and that every man who regards his intellectual credit, must disguise his reception of such a creed by the most essential and important modifications.

All this, we repeat, is very taking; but there have been times—to their disparagement shall we say it, or to their credit?—when its effect would have been just nothing at all. There have been ages which, although far behind us in objective science, would have at least held those who wrote for them to the necessity of having distinct ideas expressed in clear language, fortified by coherent, logical, and probable proof. There have been ages, unscientific, yet of intellectual honesty—prone to believe in the marvelous, yet intolerant of nonsense—ages in which the writers of the transcendental phase of faith would have obtained no hearing from any class, because there was not enough of false learning in the masses to make them pleased with what they did not understand, and yet enough of true learning and logical training in the better educated to enable them to have discovered at once the inanity of its pretensions. The Schoolmen would have dispersed it with one chapter of analysis and definition; the Reformers would have laughed it to scorn for its utter want of all logical as well as moral power; the contemned eighteenth century would have annihilated it with one blow from the hammer of its plain, common sense, "logical understanding." Could such a scene be realized, it would indeed be glorious sport to see how the giants, Horsley, or Warburton, or Butler, would have dealt with this kind of thing. Could we fancy, for example, the immortal author of the Analogy engaged with some of the discourses of Mr. Parker, or Mr. Francis Newman, or with some of the effusions of the numerous newspaper correspondents, and imitators of the Westminster reviewers in our own country, with what astonishment would he at first eye his strange antagonist! How puzzled would be this well-trained, truthful intellect, so superior to all the petty arts of style and tricks of mannerism—how puzzled would be he in determining the best way of taking hold of what seemed to present no tangible mode of logical assault, or whether it was really worth the putting forth an effort for its refutation. But how long, think you, would the conflict be, when one disciplined to rigid thinking, like Butler, or Usher, or our own Edwards, should once get his tight grasp on such an antagonist; and after crushing out his "ideals," his "intuitions," his "new phases of faith," all the meaning that could possibly be obtained from them, should lay himself out in earnest to refute whatever residuum of argument they might seem to possess!

[To be Concluded.]

The Most Important Thought.

While Daniel Webster was one occasion with a party of friends a gentleman said to him, "I want you to tell me what was the most important thought that ever occupied your mind." Mr. Webster, slowly passing his hand over his forehead, replied: "The most important thought that ever occupied my mind, was that of my individual responsibility to God!" and then, for twenty minutes, spoke in advocacy of this sublime thought; after which he retired to his room.

Peace is the evening star of the soul, as Virtue is its sun; and the two are never far apart.

EMINENT PERSONS ABROAD.

JABEZ BUNTING—DR. PUSEY, ETC.

I had a letter of introduction to Dr. Bunting, and called at his house when I was in London, but did not succeed in finding him at home. It was therefore gratifying to me to learn, on my arrival at Oxford, the day before Good Friday, that he was engaged to preach there the next day; and I resolved at once to hear him if it were possible. I accordingly went to the chapel where he was to preach, at the appointed hour, with Mr. Collingwood, printer to the University, an excellent and most gentlemanly man, at whose house I had previously engaged to stay during my visit at Oxford. As we entered the chapel I found a very plain, broad shouldered, rather coarse looking man, reading the Episcopal service; and he read it with an air of such indifference, that I was impatient for the end of it, especially as I thought he was equally so. I took for granted that it was some Methodist brother, of low degree, whom Dr. Bunting had brought in to assist him in the service; and as I had gone to hear Dr. Bunting, it was a disappointment to me to hear any body else.

The Church service being disposed of in due time, this same indifferent reader proceeded to administer baptism to several children, among whom was one of the resident minister's children; and he introduced the service with some remarks that led me to doubt whether it was not the veritable Jabez Bunting to whom I was listening. He began by saying that that was not the time or the place to go into a particular vindication of the doctrine of infant baptism; that he must be allowed now to take this for granted; that those who differed, differed conscientiously, and had the same right to their views as he had to his. He then read the rubric of the English Church on this subject, and pronounced it excellent, especially as requiring that the ordinance should be administered publicly, and called the opposite mode "a kind of smuggling." He proceeded to speak of baptism at some length, first as an ordinance of instruction, and secondly as an ordinance of covenant, and concluded by apologizing to his brother for having said things which he must be supposed so well to know, and so fully to appreciate. The address was of considerable length, and before it was half finished, I did not need any body to inform me that I was listening to the first Methodist preacher in England.

The baptism being over Dr. Bunting ascended the pulpit, and announced as his text that rich and precious passage, "He that spared not His own Son," etc. The discourse was simple in its plan, full of strong evangelical thought, very felicitously and logically presented, and in some parts was even sublimely pathetic and eloquent. The whole service, so far as I witnessed it, was conducted with perfect decorum; but after Mr. Collingwood and myself had retired into the vestry, I was told that there was a prayer offered, during which there were two hundred audible amens, the minister of the place taking the lead. When the service was over Dr. Bunting came into the vestry; and when I was introduced to him, he very kindly expressed his regret at not being at home when I called at his house in London, and said he had directed his son to ascertain at Hackney where I staid that he might call upon me. Though he has the reputation, I believe, of being somewhat of an ecclesiastical dictator, I found him exceedingly pleasant and free in conversation, and no more inclined to take airs than the humblest man I ever met. As he knew that I expected to be at Shrewsbury in the course of the next week, and as he expected to be there also, he expressed a wish that we might meet, and accordingly, he actually did me the favor to call upon me at Shrewsbury, on Sunday evening, after having performed the usual services of the day. If I had been called upon to pronounce judgment upon him in the market-place, without hearing him speak, I should have said that he was a red-faced, well-fed, coarse-grained Englishman; but if my opinion concerning him had been asked after hearing him preach, and seeing him in private, I should have said that while he was not at all lacking in courtesy and kindness, he was one of the most vigorous thinkers and eloquent preachers whom I have ever met.

Sometime in the course of the day I called at Dr. Pusey's door, having a letter of introduction to him from Professor Tholuck; but he sent me word by the servant that he could not consistently see company on account of its being Good Friday, but would be happy to see me the next day. I then called upon Dr. McBride, a professor in one of the colleges, and the author of a learned work, called the "Datesseron;" to whom also I had an introductory letter. He had no scruples about receiving me; and I found him an exceedingly agreeable, whole souled, and intelligent man. When he ascertained that my visit at Oxford was limited to a day or two, he said that I ought to be making the best of my time, and immediately put on his gown and walked with me to show me the most curious and venerable of the colleges. I found that he had no sympathy with the extreme party of which Dr. Pusey was then coming out as a leader, though he thought Dr. Hampden had gone too far in his Bampton Lectures, which had appeared a short before, and were the topic in almost every circle into which I was thrown. Dr. McBride spoke, as Dr. Gregory had done before him, with great respect and and affection of Bishop Mellvaine, and said that he knew no man who possessed qualities to grace the Episcopate more than he.

I went the next day, notwithstanding it was the Saturday after Good Friday, to call upon Dr. Pusey. He seemed to me to be not much more than forty years old. He was small every way; being both very short and very lean; was exceedingly grave in his manner, and much disposed to serious conversation. As he knew I had just come from Germany, he had many inquiries to make in respect to the result of my observations on the religious state of thing there, though I quickly found that he knew much more about it than I did. If I had been obliged to make up my mind, concerning him, merely from his appearance in that interview, which lasted not more than half an hour, I should have been at loss whether he was some great revival man, like Nettleton, in one of his most devout moods, or whether he was wearing the mantle of some monk, and walking in the light of the dark ages. He was, however, civil, and invited me to dine with him; and when I told him I must leave at two o'clock, he proposed to anticipate the usual dinner hour for my accommodation. This was several years before he reached the point of his greatest notoriety; but the leaven was then at work, and I doubt whether anything has occurred since, that was not prophesied of at that time by some who had the best opportunity of estimating his religious tendency.
